

THE
A. F. MORRISON
MEMORIAL LIBRARY

Univ. of California

Clarendon Press Series

THE CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND

IN ITS ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT

BY

WILLIAM STUBBS, M.A.

(1878)

Regius Professor of Modern History

VOL. I.

SECOND EDITION

Oxford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

M DCCC LXXV

[All rights reserved]

TO THE LIBRARY OF MACMILLAN

JM 118
598 1875
v. 7

London

MACMILLAN AND CO.

PUBLISHERS TO THE UNIVERSITY OF

Oxford

THE History of Institutions cannot be mastered,—can scarcely be approached,—without an effort. It affords little of the romantic incident or of the picturesque grouping which constitute the charm of History in general, and holds out small temptation to the mind that requires to be tempted to the study of Truth. But it has a deep value and an abiding interest to those who have courage to work upon it. It presents, in every branch, a regularly developed series of causes and consequences, and abounds in examples of that continuity of life, the realisation of which is necessary to give the reader a personal hold on the past and a right judgment of the present. For the roots of the present lie deep in the past, and nothing in the past is dead to the man who would learn how the present comes to be what it is. It is true, Constitutional History has a point of view, an insight, and a language of its own; it reads the exploits and characters of men by a different light from that shed by the false glare of arms, and interprets positions and facts in words that are voiceless to those who have only listened to the trumpet of fame. The world's heroes are no heroes to it, and it has an equitable consideration to give to many whom the verdict of ignorant posterity and the condemning sentence of events have consigned to obscurity or reproach. Without some knowledge of Constitutional History it is absolutely impossible to do justice to the characters and positions of the actors in the great drama. absolutely impossible to understand the origin of parties, the development of principles, the growth of nations in spite of parties and in defiance of principles. It alone can teach why it is that in politics good men do not always think alike, that the worst cause has often been illustrated with the most heroic virtue, and that the world owes some of its greatest debts to men from whose very memory it recoils.

In this department of study there is no portion more valuable than the Constitutional History of England.

I would fain hope that the labour spent on it in this book may at least not repel the student, and that the result may not wholly disappoint those friends in England, Germany and America, by whose advice it was begun, and whose sympathy and encouragement have mainly sustained me in the undertaking. To them I would dedicate a work which must stand or fall by their judgment. And I would put on record my grateful feeling for the unsparing good will with which my work in other departments has been hitherto welcomed. A more special debt I would gladly acknowledge to the two Scholars who have helped me with counsel and criticism whilst passing the book through the Press; to whom I am specially drawn by their association with my early Oxford ambitions, and whose patient kindness an acquaintance of now nearly thirty years has not exhausted.

KETTEL HALL,
Christmas Day, 1873.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.

1. Constitutional History, p. 1. 2. Its German origin—in France, p. 2. 3. In Spain, p. 4. 4. In Germany, p. 5. 5. In England, p. 6. 6. Analogy of Language, p. 7. 7. Of Religion, p. 8. 8. Of Law, p. 9. 9. Result of the comparison, p. 10.

CHAPTER II.

CAESAR AND TACITUS.

10. Caesar's account of the Germans, p. 12. 11. General bearing of it, p. 15. 12. Germania of Tacitus, p. 16. 13. Traces of constitutional organisation; Land, p. 19. 14. Ranks, p. 21. 15. Administration, p. 26. 16. Councils and Courts of Justice, p. 28. 17. The host, p. 30. 18. Territorial divisions, p. 31. 19. General deductions, p. 31.

CHAPTER III.

THE SAXONS AND ANGLES AT HOME.

20. Appearance of the Franks and Saxons, p. 37. 21. The Angles and Jutes, p. 39. 22. Saxons in Germany as described by Bede, Nithard, Rudolf, and Hucbald; and noticed in the Capitularies, p. 41. 23. Notices of the Angles in Germany, p. 47. 24. The mark system and common husbandry, p. 48. 25. Early system illustrated by the Salian law, p. 53. 26. Further illustrations, p. 56.

CHAPTER IV.

THE MIGRATION.

27. Conquest of Britain, p. 58. 28. Condition of the Britons, p. 59. 29. Theory of earlier German settlements, p. 62. 30. Theory of connexion between Welsh and Anglo-Saxon laws, p. 63. 31. Effect of the conquest on the conquerors, p. 64. 32. Adoption of royalty, p. 66.

CHAPTER V.

THE ANGLO-SAXON SYSTEM.

33. Anglo-Saxon system, p. 69. 34. Continuity of terminology, p. 70. 35. Allotment and division of land, p. 71. 36. Primitive tenure, p. 74. 37. Ranks and classes of men, p. 78. 38. The family, p. 81. 39. The township, p. 82. 40. The parish, p. 85. 41. Tithing and frankpledge, p. 85. 42. The dependent township, p. 89. 43. Court of the township, p. 90. 44. The burh, p. 92. 45. The hundred or wapentake, p. 96. 46. The hundred court, p. 102. 47. The Liberty or sokcn, p. 106. 48. The shire, p. 108. 49. The ealdorman and sheriff, p. 111. 50. The shiremoot, p. 114.

CHAPTER VI.

THE WITENAGEMOT AND THE KING.

51. The witenagemot, p. 119. 52. Its composition, p. 124. 53. Its powers in legislation, p. 126. 54. In grants of land, p. 130. 55. In judicature, p. 132. 56. In taxing and general politics, p. 133. 57. In election of magistrates, p. 133. 58. In election and deposition of kings, p. 135. 59. The king, p. 140. 60. Coronation and unction, p. 144. 61. His promises to his people, p. 146. 62. The oath of the people, p. 148. 63. The comitatus, p. 149. 64. Nobility by birth, p. 150. 65. Nobility by service, p. 152. 66. The ealdormanship, p. 158. 67. Use of the wergild, p. 161. 68. The Bretwalda, p. 162.

CHAPTER VII.

DEVELOPMENT IN ANGLO-SAXON HISTORY.

69. Development in Anglo-Saxon history from personal to territorial system, p. 165. 70. Increase of royal power in intension as the kingdom increases in extension, p. 169. 71. The king becomes lord or patron of the people, p. 175. 72. He becomes the source of justice

p. 179. 73. Jurisdiction becomes territorial, p. 183. 74. The tenure of land affected by the territorialising of judicature, p. 187. 75. Territorialising of military organisation, p. 189. 76. Legislation; absence of personal law, p. 194. 77. Influence of the Danes, p. 197. 78. Influence of Frank legislation, p. 203. 79. No real growth of unity, p. 207. 80. Seeds of national life still preserved, p. 209. 81. National character, p. 210.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE ANGLO-SAXON CHURCH.

82. Growth of the church organisation in England, p. 217. 83. Freedom from the leaven of Roman imperialism, p. 219. 84. Monasticism, p. 222. 85. Divisions of Dioceses and origin of parishes, p. 224. 86. Tithes and endowments, p. 227. 87. Ecclesiastical councils, p. 230. 88. Relations of the church to the state, p. 234. 89. Revival under Alfred, p. 240. 90. The eleventh century, p. 242.

CHAPTER IX.

THE NORMAN CONQUEST.

91. Complex results of the Conquest, p. 247. 92. State of Normandy, p. 248. 93. Growth of Feudalism, p. 250. 94. Feudal ideas of the Conquest, p. 256. 95. National policy of William, p. 257. 96. Introduction of Feudal usages, p. 260. 97. Maintenance of old forms, p. 267. 98. Results of changes of administrators, p. 269. 99. Subordinate changes in judicature, p. 274. 100. In taxation, p. 278. 101. In ecclesiastical affairs, p. 280. 102. Transitional character of the period, p. 288.

CHAPTER X.

POLITICAL SURVEY OF THE NORMAN PERIOD.

103. Points of contention in the Norman reigns, p. 290. 104. Title of William Rufus: struggle with the feudatories, p. 292. 105. Recognition of the rights of the English, p. 295. 106. Absolute tyranny: in Church, p. 297. 107. In State, p. 300. 108. Accession of Henry I, p. 302. 109. Humiliation of the feudatories, p. 306. 110. Alliance of king and people, p. 311. 111. Institution of strong government system, p. 312. 112. Ecclesiastical policy, p. 316. 113. Accession of Stephen, p. 318. 114. His misgovernment, p. 323. 115. The consequent anarchy, p. 327. 116. Scheme of reform, p. 333.

CHAPTER XI.

ADMINISTRATION DURING THE NORMAN PERIOD.

117. New character of the constitution, p. 337. 118. The king, p. 338.
 119. The royal household, p. 343. 120. The justiciar, p. 346. 121.
 The chancellor, p. 351. 122. The great officers, p. 353. 123. The national council, p. 356. 124. Earls, barons, and knights, p. 360.
 125. Legislative, judicial, and other business of the courts, p. 370.
 126. The Exchequer, p. 376. 127. The Curia Regis, p. 387. 128.
 The popular courts, p. 393. 129. The Manor and Honour, p. 399.
 130. Royal demesne and forests, p. 402. 131. The boroughs, p. 403.
 132. The labourer, p. 426. 133. The army, p. 431. 134. Innovation or development, p. 434.

CHAPTER XII.

HENRY II AND HIS SONS.

135. General features of the period, p. 445. 136. Henry II, his character and training, p. 446. 137. His accession and first measures, p. 449.
 138. The years 1158-1163, p. 454. 139. The contest with Becket, p. 460. 140. Constitutions of Clarendon, p. 464. 141. The Assize of Clarendon, p. 469. 142. The year 1170, p. 472. 143. The years 1171-1173, p. 475. 144. The rebellion of 1173-4, p. 475. 145.
 Reforms after the rebellion, p. 482. 146. Later years of Henry II, p. 488. 147. Summary of the reign, p. 492. 148. Richard I, p.
 495. 149. William Longchamp, p. 498. 150. Administration of Walter of Coutances and Hubert Walter, p. 501. 151. Accession of John, p. 513. 152. Loss of Normandy, p. 517. 153. Quarrel with the Church, p. 519. 154. Quarrel with the barons, p. 522. 155.
 The Great Charter, p. 530.

CHAPTER XIII.

ADMINISTRATIVE AND REPRESENTATIVE INSTITUTIONS.

156. Character of the period, 1155-1215; amalgamation and national unity;—in blood, p. 544. 157. In language and law, p. 547. 158.
 The king, p. 551. 159. The National Council, p. 563. 160. Legislation, p. 573. 161. Taxation, p. 576. 162. Military organisation, p. 587. 163. Judicature, p. 594. 164. The institution of Jurics, p. 608. 165. The Towns, p. 623. 166. The Clergy, p. 632. 167.
 Conclusion, p. 637.
-

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.

1. Constitutional History.—2. Its German origin:—in France.—3. In Spain.—4. In Germany.—5. In England.—6. Analogy of Language.—7. Of Religion.—8. Of Law.—9. Result of the comparison.

1. THE growth of the English Constitution, which is the subject of this book, is the resultant of three forces, whose reciprocal influences are constant, subtle, and intricate. These are the national character, the external history, and the institutions of the people. The direct analysis of the combination forms no portion of our task, for it is not until a nation has arrived at a consciousness of its own identity that it can be said to have any constitutional existence, and long before that moment the three forces have become involved inextricably; the national character has been formed by the course of the national history quite as certainly as the national history has been developed by the working of the national character; and the institutions in which the newly conscious nation is clothed may be either the work of the constructive genius of the growing race, or simply the result of the discipline of its external history. It would then be very rash and unsafe to attempt to assign positively to any one of the three forces the causation of any particular movement or the origin of any particular measure, to the exclusion of the other two; or to argue back from result to cause without allowing for the operation of other co-ordinate and reciprocally acting factors.

But it does not follow that cautious speculation on questions of interest, which are in themselves prior to the starting point, would be thrown away; and some such must necessarily be discussed in order to complete the examination of the subject in its

Elements of Constitutional life.

Preliminary questions.

integrity by a comparison of its development with the corresponding stages and contemporary phenomena of the life of other nations. Of these questions the most important, and perhaps the only necessary ones, for all minor matters may be comprehended under them, are those of nationality and geographical position;—who were our forefathers, whence did they come, what did they bring with them, what did they find on their arrival, how far did the process of migration and settlement affect their own development, and in what measure was it indebted to the character and previous history of the land they colonised?

Germanic
origin of the English.

Such a form of stating the questions suggests at least the character of the answer. The English are not aboriginal, that is, they are not identical with the race that occupied their home at the dawn of history. They are a people of German descent in the main constituents of blood, character, and language, but most especially, in connexion with our subject, in the possession of the elements of primitive German civilisation and the common germs of German institutions. This descent is not a matter of inference. It is a recorded fact of history, which those characteristics bear out to the fullest degree of certainty. The consensus of historians, placing the conquest and colonisation of Britain by nations of German origin between the middle of the fifth and the end of the sixth century, is confirmed by the evidence of a continuous series of monuments. These show the unbroken possession of the land thus occupied, and the growth of the language and institutions thus introduced, either in purity and unmolested integrity, or, where it has been modified by antagonism and by the admixture of alien forms, ultimately vindicating itself by eliminating the new and more strongly developing the genius of the old.

Influence of the Germanic races in Europe
generally.

2. The four great states of Western Christendom—England, France, Spain, and Germany—owe the leading principles which are worked out in their constitutional history to the same source. In the regions which had been thoroughly incorporated with the Roman empire, every vestige of primitive indigenous cultivation had been crushed out of existence. Roman civilisation in its turn fell before the Germanic races: in Britain it had perished slowly in the midst of a perishing people, who were able neither to maintain it nor to substitute for it anything of their own. In Gaul and Spain it died a somewhat nobler death, and left more lasting influences. In the greater part of Germany it had never made good its ground. In all four the constructive elements of new life are barbarian or Germanic, though its development is varied by the degrees in which the original stream of influence has been turned aside in its course, or affected in purity and consistency by the infusion of other elements and by the nature of the soil through which it flows.

The system which has for the last twelve centuries formed the history of France, and in a great measure the character of the French people, of which the present condition of that kingdom is the logical result, was originally little more than a simple adaptation of the old German polity to the government of a conquered race. The long sway of the Romans in Gaul had re-created, on their own principles of administration, the nation which the Franks conquered. The Franks, gradually uniting in religion, blood and language with the Gauls, retained and developed the idea of feudal subordination in the organisation of government unmodified by any tendencies towards popular freedom. In France accordingly feudal government runs its logical career. The royal power, that central force which partly has originated, and partly owes its existence to the conquest, is first limited in its action by the very agencies that are necessary to its continuance; then it is reduced to a shadow. The shadow is still the centre round which the complex system, in spite of itself, revolves: it is recognised by that system as its solitary safeguard against disruption, and its witness of national identity; it survives for ages, notwithstanding the attenuation of its vitality, by its incapacity for mischief. In course of time the system itself loses its original energy, and the central force gradually gathers into itself all the members of the nationality in detail, thus concentrating all the powers which in earlier struggles they had won from it, and incorporating in itself those very forces which the feudatories

Constitutional History of France.

Changes in the constitution of France.

had imposed as limitations on the sovereign power. So its character of nominal suzerainty is exchanged for that of absolute sovereignty. The only checks on the royal power had been the feudatories; the crown has outlived them, absorbed and assimilated their functions; but the increase of power is turned not to the strengthening of the central force, but to the personal interest of its possessor. Actual despotism becomes systematic tyranny, and its logical result is the explosion which is called revolution. The constitutional history of France is thus the summation of the series of feudal development in a logical sequence which is indeed unparalleled in the history of any great state, but which is thoroughly in harmony with the national character, forming it and formed by it. We see in it the German system, modified by its work of foreign conquest and deprived of its home safeguards, on a field exceptionally favourable, prepared and levelled by Roman agency under a civil system which was capable of speedy amalgamation, and into whose language most of the feudal forms readily translated themselves.

The working out of feudalism.

Kindred influences of the Goths and other races in Spain.

3. In Spain too the permanency of the Germanic or of the kindred Visigothic influences is a fact of the first historical importance. Here, upon the substratum of an indigenous race conquered, crushed, re-created, remodelled into a Roman province more Roman than Rome itself, is superinduced the conquering race, first to ravage, then to govern, then to legislate, then to unite in religion, and lastly to lead on to deliverance from Moorish tyranny. The rapidity with which Spanish history unfolds itself enables us to detect throughout its course the identity of the ruling, constructive nationality. The Visigothic element is kept to itself at first by its heresy; before the newness of its conversion has given it time to unite with the conquered nation, it is forced into the position of a deliverer. The Moorish conquest compels union, sympathy, amalgamation, but still leaves the apparatus of government in the hands of the Visigothic kings and nobles; the common law, the institutions, the names are Germanic. Although the history of Spain, a crusade of seven centuries, forces into existence forms of civil life and expedients of administration which are peculiar to itself, they are distinctly coloured by the pertinacious freedom of the primitive customs; the constitutional life of Castille is, in close parallel or in marked contrast, never out of direct relation with that of Germany and England, as that of Aragon is with French and Scottish history. To a German race of sovereigns Spain finally owed the subversion of her national system and ancient freedom.

4. In Germany itself, of course, the development of the primitive polity is everywhere traceable. Here there is no alien race, for Germany is never conquered but by Germans; there is much migration, but there is much also that is untouched by migration: where one tribe has conquered or colonised another, there feudal tenure of land and jurisdiction prevails: where the ancient race remains in its old seats, there the alod subsists and the free polity with which the alod is inseparably associated. The imperial system has originated other changes; there are Swabians in Saxony, Saxons in Thuringia: feudal customs in each case follow the tenure, but where the feod is not, there remains the alod, and even the village community and the mark. In the higher ranges of civil order, a mixed imperial and feudal organisation, which like the Spanish has no exact parallel, retains a varying, now substantial, now shadowy existence. The imperial tradition has substituted a fictitious for a true bond of union among the four nations of the German land. To the general reader the constitutional struggle is merely one of nationality against imperialism; of the papal north against the imperial south; but under that surface of turmoil the lower depths of national life and constitutional organism heave constantly. Bavaria, Saxony, Franconia, Swabia have their national policy, and preserve their ancient modifications of the still more ancient customs. The weakness of the imperial centre, the absence of central legislature and judicature, allows the continued existence of the most primitive forms; the want of cohesion prevents at once their development and their extinction. So to deeper study the wonderful fertility and variety of the local institutions of Germany presents a field of work bewildering and even wearying in its character of German Constitutional

General
History.

abundance : and great as might be the reward of penetrating it, the student strays off to a field more easily amenable to philosophic treatment. The constitutional history of Germany is the hardest, as that of France is the easiest, subject of historical study. As a study of principles, in continuous and uniform development, it lacks both unity and homogeneousness.

English Constitutional History a development of Germanic principles in comparative purity.

5. England, although less homogeneous in blood and character, is more so in uniform and progressive growth. The very diversity of the elements which are united within the isle of Britain serves to illustrate the strength and vitality of that one which for thirteen hundred years has maintained its position either unrivalled or in victorious supremacy. If its history is not the perfectly pure development of Germanic principles, it is the nearest existing approach to such a development¹. England gained its sense of unity centuries before Germany : it developed its genius for government under influences more purely indigenous : spared from the curse of the imperial system and the Mezentian union with Italy, and escaping thus the practical abeyance of legislation and judicature, it developed its own common law free from the absolutist tendencies of Roman jurisprudence ; and it grew equably, harmoniously, not merely by virtue of local effort and personal privilege.

The smaller states of Europe.

In the four great nationalities the Germanic influence is the dominant principle : in England, Germany and France directly ; whilst in Spain all formative power is traceable to the kindred Gothic rule. The smaller states share more or less in the same general characteristics ; Portugal with Spain ; Scandinavia with Germany and England, with whose institutions it had originally everything in common, and whose development in great things and in small it seems to have followed with few variations, translating their constitutional systems into language of its own. In Italy the confusion of nationalities is most complete, and there Roman institutions, owing perhaps to the rapid succession of conquerors and the shortlivedness of their organisations as contrasted with the permanency of the papal-imperial system, subsisted with least change. Yet there also, the Northern States through the German, and the Southern through the Norman connexion, both moreover having gone through the crucible of Lombard oppression, retain marks of Teutonic influence. The institutions, national and free in one aspect, feudal and absolutist in another, testify, if not to the permanence, at least to the abiding impressions of the association. The republican history of the North and the feudal system of the South, the municipalities of Lombardy and the parliaments of Naples, are much more German than Roman.

Italy.

¹ Bethmann-Hollweg, Civilprocess, iv. 10. Konrad Maurer, Kritische Ueberschau, i. 47. Gneist, Self-government, i. 3.

6. Nor do the great nationalities return a different answer when interrogated by more convincing tests than that of external history. If language be appealed to, and language is by itself the nearest approach to a perfect test of national extraction, the verdict is in close accordance. The impact of barbarian conquest split up the unity of the Latin tongue as it did that of the Latin empire; it destroyed its uniformity and broke up its constructional forms. But in the breaking it created at least three great languages—the French, the Spanish, and the Italian; each possessing new powers of development which the Latin had lost, and adapting itself to a new literature, fertile in beauty and vivacity, far surpassing the effete inanities that it superseded. The breath of the life of the new literatures was Germanic, varied according to the measure of Germanic influence in other things. The poetry of the new nations is that of the leading race: in South France and Spain Visigothic, in North France Norman, even in Italy it owes all its sweetness and light to the freedom which has breathed from beyond the Alps. In these lands the barbarian tongue has yielded to that of the conquered; in Spain and France because the disproportion of the numbers of the two races was very great; both Franks and Visigoths had become Romanised to a certain extent before the conquest; and the struggle with the native peoples assumed in neither case the character of extermination. In Italy the succession of masters was too rapid to allow a change of language to come into question among the greater and more abiding part of the people. Of the Germans of Germany and the English of early times it is scarcely

Effect of the German and Gothic conquests on language.

and on new literature.

Analogy of language
and polity.

necessary to speak, for whatever may have been the later modifications, the influence of the Latin of the fifth century on the language of either must have been infinitesimal. No European tongue is more thoroughly homogeneous in vocabulary and in structure than that known as the Anglo-Saxon: it is as pure as those of Scandinavia, where no Roman influences ever penetrated, and no earlier race than the German left intelligible traces. Early and medieval German are also alike unadulterated. The analogy between language and institutions is in these cases direct: in Spain and France the outer garb is Roman, the spirit and life is Germanic: one influence preponderates in the language, the other in the polity; and the amalgamation is complete when the Gaul has learned to call himself a Frenchman, when the Goth, the Suevian, the Alan and the Vandal, are united under the name of Spaniard.

Evidence of religion.

7. The most abiding influence of Rome is that of religion; the Roman church continues to exist when the old imperial administration has perished. Spain, Gaul and Italy, even Western Britain and Western Germany, retain the Christianity which Roman missions have planted. Yet in this very department the importance of the new spring of life is specially conspicuous. Spain alone of the four nations owes nothing to German Christianity. Her religious history is exactly analogous to that of her language: after a century's struggle the Visigoth and the Suevian become Catholic. In France and Western Germany, which had been Christianised mainly under the imperial influences, and had developed an independent theology during the Roman period, the influx of the Franks and their subsequent conversion produced a complex result. The Christianity which had stood out against Visigothic indifference or intolerance, withered under Frank patronage. The secular tendencies of the imperial religious administration expanded under the Merovingian imitators, and had it not been for the reformation begun by Boniface and worked out under the auspices of the Karolings, the Gallican church might have sunk to the level of the Italian or the Byzantine. But the same Austrasian influences which revived the composite nationality, breathed influence on the Church.

Germanic

new life into the fainting church, drawing from England and the converted North new models of study and devotion. The labours of English missionaries in German Saxony helped to consolidate and complete in both church and state the Germanic empire of the Karolings. The Austrasian domination was more purely Germanic than the Neustrian which it superseded. Charles the Great, as the reformer of the church and founder of the modern civilisation of France, was a German king who worked chiefly by German instruments.

8. In the domain of Law the comparison is equally clear. The number of possible factors is small: the primitive codes of the conquerors, the Roman law under which the conquered were living, and the feudal customs which were evolved from the relations of the two races. For there remain no original vestiges of the indigenous laws of Spain and Gaul, and it is only from Irish and Welsh remains of comparatively late date that we find that the Celtic tribes had any laws at all.

Influence of German customs on the common law of the nations.

The common law of Spain is throughout the medieval period Germanic in its base: although the written law of the Visigoths is founded on the Theodosian code, and the so-called Roman natives lived by Roman law, the fueros which contain the customary jurisprudence are distinctly akin to the customs of England and Germany; the wergild and the system of compurgation, the primitive elements of election and representation, are clearly traceable¹. It is not until the fourteenth century that the civil law of Justinian supersedes the ancient customs, and then with its invariable results.

Spain.

Medieval France is divided between the feudal customs of the North and the personal law of the South, which last was chiefly based on the Theodosian and earlier Roman jurisprudence. The former territory is more Frank in population, nearer to the German home, and bears more distinct marks of Karolingian legislation; the latter, before the Frank conquest, has borne the successive waves of Visigothic and Burgundian invasion, and has strengthened through them, or imparted to them, its own legal system as developed under the Romans. Of the great expositions of feudal custom, most are from Northern France: the libri feudorum were compiled by Lombard lawyers from the acts of the Franconian and Swabian emperors; and the Assizes of Jerusalem are based on the work of a Lotharingian lawgiver. The essence of feudal law is custom, and custom escapes the jealousies and antipathies that assail law imposed by a legislative centre: it grows and extends its area by imitation rather than by authority: and the scientific lawyer can borrow a custom of feudal jurisprudence where he cannot venture to lay down a principle of Roman law. Hence the uncertainty of detail contrasted with the uniformity of principle in feudal law.

France.

¹ Dunham, History of Spain and Portugal, iv. 109-118: from Edinb. Review, No. 61 (an article attributed to Palgrave). Palgrave, Commonwealth, pp. 128-131, &c. Lea, Superstition and Force, p. 65.

Law in Germany.

Germany, except in the few Capitularies of the Frank sovereigns, has no central or common written law; even the Capitularies are many of them only local in their operation: she does not, except by way of custom, adopt the Roman civil law; her feudal law is, like the feudal law elsewhere, based on the Frank customs. Her common law, whether sought in the jurisprudence of the Alemanni, the Franks and the Saxons, or enunciated in the Sachsenspiegel and the Schwabenspiegel, is primitive, just as all her lower range of institutions may be said to be; it subsists but it does not develop.

English
common law based on early Germanic
usages.

England has inherited no portion of the Roman legislation except in the form of scientific or professional axioms, introduced at a late period, and through the ecclesiastical or scholastic or international university studies. Her common law is, to a far greater extent than is commonly recognised, based on usages anterior to the influx of feudality, that is, on strictly primitive custom; and what she has that is feudal may be traced through its Frank stage of development to the common Germanic sources¹.

General
result.

9. The result of this comparison is to suggest the probability that the polity developed by the German races on British soil is the purest product of their primitive instinct. With the exception of the Gothic Bible of Ulfilas, the Anglo-Saxon remains are the earliest specimens of Germanic language as well as literature, and the development of modern English from the Anglo-Saxon is a fact of science as well as of history. The institutions of the Saxons of Germany long after the conquest of Britain were the most perfect exponent of the system which Tacitus saw and described in the Germania; and the polity of their kinsmen in England, though it may be not older in its monuments than the Lex Salica, is more entirely free from Roman influences. In England the common germs were developed and ripened with the smallest intermixture of foreign elements. Not only were all the successive invasions of Britain, which from the eighth to the eleventh century diversify the history of the island, conducted by nations of common extraction, but, with the exception of ecclesiastical influence, no foreign interference that was not German in origin was admitted at all. Language, law, custom and religion preserve their original conformation and colouring. The German element is the paternal element in our system, natural and political. Analogy, however, is not proof, but illustration: the chain of proof is to be found in the progressive persistent development of English constitutional history from the primeval polity of the common fatherland.

¹ Brunner, in Holtzendorff's Encyclopädie, pp. 226, 227.

The German element is the paternal element in the English polity.

CHAPTER II.

CAESAR AND TACITUS.

10. Caesar's account of the Germans.—11. General bearing of it.—12. Germania of Tacitus.—13. Traces of constitutional organisation; Land.—14. Ranks.—15. Administration.—16. Councils and Courts of Justice.—17. The host.—18. Territorial divisions.—19. General deductions.

Caesar's notices of the Germans.

10. THE earliest glimpses of the social and political life of our forefathers are derived from Caesar, who has in one passage of the Commentaries compressed into a few lines all that he could ascertain about the Germans in general; and in another describes, with very slight variations, the Suevi, whom he believed to be the greatest and most warlike of the kindred tribes. After contrasting the religion of the Germans with that of the Gauls, and praising the industry, chastity and hardiness of their lives, which he describes as divided between hunting and the study of arms¹, he proceeds to remark that they do not devote themselves to husbandry, but live chiefly on milk, cheese and flesh. No one has a fixed quantity of land or boundaries that may be called his own, but the magistrates and chiefs assign annually, and for a single year's occupancy, to the several communities, larger or smaller, whom the tie of common religious rites or consanguinity has brought together, a portion of land, the extent and situation of which they fix according to circumstances. The next year they compel them to move elsewhere. Of this institution many accounts are given; one reason is that the people may not be induced by habitual employment in husbandry to exchange for it the study of arms ; another that they may not devote themselves to the accumulation of estates ; that the more powerful may not expel the meaner from their possessions ; that they may not be led to build houses with too great care to avoid heat or cold ; that they may prevent the growth of avarice and through it the creation of factions and dissensions ; and that the general body of the people may be kept contented, which can be the case only so long as every man sees himself in material wealth on a level with the most powerful of his countrymen¹.

Annual change of land.

¹ Caesar, de Bello Gallico, vi. 21.

Reasons for this.

Of the several political communities, nations or states as they may be called, the greatest glory is the extent of unpeopled land which surrounds their territory, and which they have devastated. They regard it as a peculiar mark of prowess that their old neighbours have fled from their settlements for fear of them, and that no new comer has ventured to approach them. There is policy moreover in the plan ; it is a guarantee of public security ; sudden invasion is an impossibility.

Isolation of the tribal territories.

When one of the states engages in war, offensive or defensive, special officers are chosen to command, with power of life and death ; in time of peace there is no common or central magistracy, but the chiefs of the several divisions, 'principes regionum atque pagorum,' administer justice among their people, and do their best to diminish litigation. Predatory expeditions undertaken beyond the borders of the particular state do not involve any infamy ; on the contrary, they are openly regarded as expedient for the training of the young, and for the encouragement of active enterprise. One of the chiefs offers himself in the public assembly as the leader of such an expedition and calls on volunteers to join him ; as soon as the announcement is made, those warriors who approve the cause and the man rise up and promise their aid, amidst the applause of the assembled people. If any of those who are so pledged betray their engagement, they are regarded as deserters and traitors, and no trust is ever after reposed in them.

Want of common or central organisation.

Warlike expeditions.

¹ Caesar, de Bello Gallico, vi. 22.

Comparison of Germans and Gauls.

The rights of hospitality are held sacred; it is strictly forbidden that any should injure the strangers who for any reason whatever may visit them; they are considered as sacred; every house is open to them, and every one will share his fare with them¹. There had been a time when the Gauls were superior in prowess to the Germans, and even threw their colonies across the Rhine, but matters were now altered; the Germans had retained their simplicity, poverty and hardihood, the Gauls had grown so used to defeat that they had ceased to claim equality in valour².

The Suevi; their tribal divisions and military system.

The description of the Suevi is in one or two points more circumstantial; their normal condition seems to be war, aggression for the purpose of conquest: they have a hundred territorial divisions, or pagi, each of which furnishes to the host a thousand champions; the rest stay at home and provide food for themselves and for the warriors³. After a year's service the warriors return home and till the land; their places are supplied by the husbandmen of the previous year; so agriculture and warlike discipline are perfectly maintained. But private and separate estates of land do not exist, and the term of occupation is restricted to the year. Like the kindred tribes, the Suevi find employment in hunting, live on animal food, and possess great strength and power of endurance⁴. They also are proud of having no neighbours; on one side devastated territory for six hundred miles testifies to their victorious might and forms a barrier against invasion, on another side lies a tributary nation which they have reduced to insignificance in point of power⁵.

No several estates of
land.

This sketch, drawn by one of the greatest statesmen of the world, has a value of its own: and, as a first attempt to characterise the race from which we spring, it has a special interest. But the details are scarcely distinct enough in themselves to furnish a trustworthy basis of theory, and even when inter-

¹ Caesar, de Bello Gallico, vi. 23.

² Ibid. vi. 24.

³ Just as in Alfred's war with the Danes in A.D. 894 he divided his force into two bodies, so that one half was constantly at home, the other half in the field. Chron. Sax. A.D. 894. Cf. Horace, Od. iii. 24. vv. 11-16.

⁴ Caesar, de Bello Gallico, iv. 1.

⁵ Ibid. iv. 3.

preted by later notices they contain much that is obscure. Colouring of Caesar's picture. Caesar wrote from the information of Gallic tribes who naturally exaggerated the qualities of their triumphant rivals; and he himself dwells chiefly on the points in which the Germans differed from the Gauls. To this must be attributed the stress laid on the equality of the common lot, on the discouragement of party struggles and personal litigation, and on the temperance and voluntary poverty which must have especially struck him in contrast with the neighbour nation which was now rapidly becoming mercenary, and, in the decay of liberty, devoting itself to the acquisition of wealth.

11. The general impression derived from the outline is, that the tribes whom Caesar knew by report were in a state of transition from the nomadic life to that of settled cultivation. He saw the tribes in a state of transition. The nations had their defined territory surrounded by a belt of unpeopled or subject land. But within the national area, the customs of pastoral life still prevailed; the smaller communities moved annually in search of fresh pasturage; they cultivated only enough land to supply the year's provision of corn, changing their occupancy every year, and having accordingly no permanent homesteads or substantial dwelling-houses¹. The tie which united these smaller pastoral communities was simply that of kindred; not that the social organisation depended on nothing else, for the maintenance of the common peace and the administration of justice were provided by the tribal magistracy, but that the ideas of settled homes and the obligations of permanent neighbourhood were realised only in the form of relationship. Except for war the tribal communities had no general organisation; in war they followed leaders chosen for the particular occasion. The predatory expeditions which under the approval of the state were carried on by voluntary leaders, were not managed through the machinery of the state, or by warriors who were permanently attached to their captains; they volunteered and were bound by honour to their leaders only for the particular expedition¹. In national wars, like those in which the Suevi lived, the whole population took part in active service and in reserve in alternate years; and their armies were arranged according to the contingents which represented the tribal sub-divisions. The only judicial organisation was that of the sub-divisions; their magistrates allotted the land annually, and administered justice: but, though there was no central magistracy, there was a national council which determined on wars and peace, and gave public sanction to volunteer enterprises.

¹ See Bethmann-Hollweg, Civilprocess, iv. 79. Kemble, Saxons, i. 40, rejects the testimony of Caesar on this point; see, on the whole question, Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungs-Geschichte (Kiel, 1865), i. 93-105.

Small amount of national organisation.

Indistinctness of Caesar's outline.

It is obvious that such a state of things must be transitional: that the determination of the territorial bounds of the nation is not permanently consistent with internal nomadic migrations, but can only allow them so long as the area is vastly too wide for its inhabitants. Nor is it conceivable that war should be the sole occupation of any tribe so far advanced in civilisation as the general description implies. The account of the Suevi can be true only of the populations bordering on Gaul or on the empire, which were kept on the defensive by the news of the approach of the Romans, or were still affected by the great migratory wave which had begun its course half a century before. Of the tribes of interior Germany we learn nothing directly, and can only infer from the looser details that their political and social organisation was very slight; consisting mainly in the tie of kindred and local connexion under numerous chiefs who, whether chosen by the communities or inheriting power from their fathers, were independent one of another, united only by tribal name and of equal rank in the tribal council. We must look to Tacitus for the filling in of details as well for the clearer, broader, and more definite elaboration of the outline².

12. Tacitus wrote about a century and a half after Caesar. During this period the Romans had been constantly in collision with the Germaus, and the knowledge they now possessed of them must have been direct, abundant, and explicit. The Germania is an inestimable treasury of facts and generalisations, but it is not without many serious difficulties; arising partly from the different stages of civilisation and political organisation which the several tribes must be supposed to have reached. In attempting to compress into a general sketch the main features of so large a family of tribes, the historian is scarcely able to avoid some inconsistencies; and it is possible that his eye was caught in some instances rather by the points in which the German institutions were contrasted with the Roman¹, than by those which expressed their essential character. But of the general faithfulness of the outline we have no doubt: the little inconsistencies of detail serve to preserve additional facts; and the generality of statement enables us to obtain the idea of the common Germanic system, which is approximately true of it at every stage of its early development, although there may never have been a time at which the whole description in its exact details was true of any portion of it.

¹ See Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungs-Geschichte, i. 355-357. Bethmann-Hollweg, Civilprocess, iv. 93. Konrad Maurer, Kritische Ueberschau, ii. 418.

² On the relation between Caesar and Tacitus in this point see Zeuss, Die Deutschen und die Nachbarstämme, pp. 52 sq.; Bethmann-Hollweg, Civilprocess, iv. 71, 72.

Germany as described by Tacitus was a vast congeries of tribes, indigenous and homogeneous throughout: speaking the same language, worshipping the same gods; marked by common physical characteristics and by common institutions, but having no collective name in their own tongue and no collective organisation². They were singularly free from the commixture of blood with foreign races; their primitive traditions and mythology were altogether their own. They had, as in Caesar's time, their own breeds of cattle, and their only wealth was the possession of herds³. Money and merchandise were of little

The Germania of Tacitus.

Physical and religious unity of the German races.

¹ No one now believes the Germania to be a satire on Rome, as was once the case. Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, i. 21. See also Guizot, Civilisation in France (ed. Hazlitt), i. 418.

² Tac. Germania, cc. 1-3. On the origin of the name Germania see Waitz, D. V. G. i. 24; he rejects all German derivations, and concludes that it is originally Gallic, the name given (as Tacitus indicates) by the Gauls first to the Tungri and afterwards to all the kindred tribes. The meaning may be either 'good shouters' (Grimm, Geschichte der Deutschen Sprache, p. 787), or, according to other writers, 'East-men' or 'neighbours.'

³ Tac. Germ. c. 5; Caesar, de Bello Gallico, vi. 26; Grimm, Geschichte der Deutschen Sprache, pp. 28-42.

Common
features of
German life.

account with them. They had no cities, nor even streets in their villages; their buildings were rudely put together from rough undressed materials¹. Their chastity and regard for marriage, the plainness and simplicity of their dress, their general temperance and sobriety, are still strongly marked. In most of these points there is no difference between the accounts of the two great historians; but in the time of Tacitus the love of hunting has declined, and the warriors spend the seasons of peace in lazy enjoyment²; they have begun to use wine and that not in moderation, and they have become inveterate and business-like gamblers³. Agriculture of a simple description, and for the growth of wheat only, would seem to have increased; and the freemen and slaves alike have settled homes. Local organisation, too, is either much more largely developed, or forms a more prominent part of the general description.

Advance on the state of things described by Caesar.

It would be rash to affirm that these latter particulars prove a definite progress in civilisation since the days of Caesar; but in some respects such an advance was a necessity. The increase of population and the extension of settlements involve the diminution of the number of animals of chase, and may account for the disuse of hunting and the absolute necessity of enlarged agriculture. The continuous struggle with the Romans may account alike for the creation of a more purely military spirit among the warriors, and for the misuse of their scarce and ungrateful seasons of leisure. But further than this it is scarcely safe to go; and it is unadvisable to undervalue the quantum of civilisation which had been attained in the time of Caesar, in order to point more graphically the bearing of Tacitus's *encomium*⁴. With all the drawbacks he mentions, there can be no doubt that the general tone of society and morality, so far as he knew it, was far higher in Germany than at Rome, 'plus-que ibi boni mores valent quam alibi bonae leges'⁵. It is, how-

¹ Tac. Germ. c. 16.

² Ibid. cc. 15, 22.

³ Ibid. c. 24.

⁴ Niebuhr thought that the Germans of Tacitus's time were not more uncivilised than the Westphalian and Lower Saxon peasants of his own time. Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungs-Geschichte, i. 29; Bethmann-Hollweg, Civilprocess, iv. 71, 72.

⁵ Tac. Germ. c. 19.

ever, on points of social and political organisation that our greatest debt to Tacitus is owing.

13. Although the pursuit of agriculture is now general, the wealth of the Germans consists chiefly if not solely in their herds of cattle: for these the vast tracts of forest and unclosed land afford abundant pasturage, and for the purpose of pasturage no particular appropriation of the soil is needed. The wide forests and untilled plains are common property. But there is not yet apparently any separate ownership even of the cultivated land. True, we read no longer of the annual migrations of families or small communities from one portion of the territory of the tribe to another. The village settlements are permanent, and the dwellings substantial and extensive. But the arable land is occupied by the community as a body, and allotments, changed annually, are assigned to the several freemen according to their estimation or social importance¹. The extent of waste land prevents any difficulty in the supply of divisible area. The arable area is changed every year, and there is abundance over²; for they do not attempt to utilise by labour the whole productive power or extent of the land, in planted orchards, divided meadows, or watered gardens; the only tribute levied on the soil is the crop of corn³.

Still, property in land can scarcely be said to be altogether unknown⁴. The villagers choose places for their homesteads as Common property in land.

Character of the village settlements.

Several property in land.

¹ Tac. Germ. c. 26: 'Agri pro numero cultorum ab universis in vices (al. vici) occupantur, quos mox inter se secundum dignationem partiuntur.' If the reading 'in vices' be retained and the annual change of allotment be understood, this passage must be translated, 'The fields are alternately occupied by the whole body of cultivators according to their number, and these they afterwards divide among themselves according to their individual dignity.' But Dr. Waitz, with good MS. authority, prefers to read vici, and to understand the statement as referring to initial occupation;—'The lands are occupied by the collective townships according to the number of cultivators, and these they afterwards divide among themselves (the cultivators) according to their dignity.' The passage is confessedly one of great difficulty. See for an account of the very numerous interpretations Waitz, D. V. G. i. 132-137. See also G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. pp. 5, 6.

² Tac. Germ. c. 26: 'Arva per annos mutant et superest ager.' See Kemble, Saxons, i. 40. and p. 15 above.

³ Tac. Germ. c. 26.

⁴ Private possession of land is regarded as introduced after the Völkerwanderung (Bethmann-Hollweg, Civilprocess, iv. 15), and, in regions not affected by that change, as a development consequent on the improvements the supply of water, wood, or pasture tempts them. Their buildings are not crowded upon one another¹: in collective villages or in solitary farmsteads each man has his own house and a space of ground surrounding it. Even if this arrangement, as Tacitus states, is the result of their dislike of neighbours or of their fear of fires, it is unnecessary to limit it by such considerations: the homestead of the rich and poor freemen alike must have included granaries, cow-houses, and stack-yards². And in this no one but the owner could have any right. It is possible that it contained land enough to furnish hay for the winter, for Tacitus mentions no annual re-apportionment of meadow-ground, although it is more probable that that was allotted on the same principle as the arable. But on any hypothesis the freeman had complete and several property in his homestead; he had a definite share in the arable field, annually assigned by the community itself, varying in situation and quality, but permanent in every other particular; and he had an undefined but proportionate right to the use of the common woods and pastures³.

The homestead.

Relation of Caesar's statement to that of Tacitus.

In this very general statement it may be thought that a distinct advance may be traced on the land system described by Caesar; the nomad stage has ceased⁴, the communities have settled seats and each man his own home. It is however uncertain whether the tribes which Caesar describes as nomad are the same as those which Tacitus describes as settled; it has been contended that Caesar misled Tacitus and that Tacitus misunderstood Caesar. But the mere interpretation of the relation between the two authors does not affect the material truth of Tacitus's picture. The member of the community had a fixed of agriculture, and strictly regulated by jealous custom. Bethmann-Hollweg, Civilprocess, iv. 16; G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. pp. 93 sq.; Palgrave, Commonwealth, pp. 71, 93, &c.

¹ Tac. Germ. c. 16. The houses in the villages are separated from one another; other houses are built apart wherever the settler chooses: the difference between the village-life and the separate farm-life already appearing. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 108-110.

² See Waitz, D. V. G. i. 113. Tacitus (Germ. c. 16) mentions subterranean storerooms.

³ Waitz, D. V. G. i. 115-118; G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. pp. 139-152.

⁴ Waitz, D. V. G. i. 33.

share of a changing area of cultivated land, a proportionate share in the common pasturage, and a house and homestead of his own¹.

14. But was this absolute equality in the character of the hold on land a sign of social equality in other relations of life? Differences of ranks. Although there is apparently no difference in the political status of all the fully qualified freemen, there are unmistakable grades of class and rank. There are distinctions of wealth, although wealth consists of cattle only. There are distinctions of blood, some are noble and some are not; and of status, there are nobiles, ingenui, liberti, and *servi*². There is further a distinct array of official personages, principes, duces, sacerdotes, *reges*³. Of these differences, that based upon wealth does not require discussion, except so far as it implies a pre-eminence which would be marked by a larger allotment of arable land, and the possession of a larger homestead. Tacitus, in the obscure passage in which he describes the apportionment of the land, mentions the *dignatio*⁴, or estimation of the individual, as one of the principles of partition. The annual re-allotment involves an equality of Possible inequality of allotments. subdivisions, but does not preclude the possibility of two or more subdivisions being assigned to the same person. The wealth in cattle involves of necessity a proportionate enjoyment of pasture and meadow, and the employment of servile cultivators implies an inequality in the shares of the arable which they cultivate for their respective masters. And the privilege which of necessity is granted to the rich man, can scarcely be withheld from the nobleman or magistrate who may demand it, if he possesses servants enough to cultivate a larger share than that of the simple freeman. But the inequalities in the use or possession of the land involve no inequalities in social and political rights⁵.

¹ The whole property, homestead, arable and pasture together, bore the name of Hube, hoba, in Germany; and was the higid, terra familiae, mansus, cassate or hide of the Anglo-Saxons. G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. pp. 126-134.

² Tac. Germ. cc. 7, 24, 25, 44; Grimm, Rechtsalterthümer, pp. 227, 308.

³ Tac. Germ. cc. 7, 10, 11, 14, &c.

⁴ Ibid. c. 26; dignitatem is Grimm's reading; dignationem the common one.

⁵ Waitz, D. V. G. i. 218. Kemble (Saxons, i. 135) seems to confound the nobilis with the princeps. See too Grimm, R. A. p. 280.

Character
and rights of nobility.

The distinction between the nobiles and the ingenui must be taken in its ordinary sense: the nobility can be only that of descent, either from ancient kings, or from the gods, or from the great benefactors and military leaders of the race¹. It is on the ground of nobility that the kings are chosen in the tribes that have adopted a monarchical government²; pre-eminent nobility, like great age, entitles a man to respectful hearing in the tribal councils, and to special rank in the comitatus of the magistrate to whom he attaches himself³; but it confers no political privilege, it involves no special claim to the office of magistrate or leader in war⁴, or to the right of having a comitatus or following such as belongs to the magistrate. The ingenuus or simple freeman is in every point except descent the equal of the noble. But it may be questioned whether freedom or nobility of birth implies in itself the possession of political rights. The young men are, until they are admitted to the use of arms, members of the family only, not of the state⁵. When they come to years of discretion, and the voice of the nation permits it, they are formally invested with a shield and spear either by the magistrate, or by father or kinsman, in the assembled Council. This investiture, or emancipation as it may be deemed, may entitle them to an honourable place in the host, but scarcely to a voice in the Council until they have obtained by inheritance or allotment their share in the common land⁶.

The freed-
men.

On this point however Tacitus is silent. Nor can we discover from his words whether the liberti or freedmen, whom he mentions as constituting an important element in the tribes that are governed by kings⁷, possessed more than merely personal

¹ Bethmann-Hollweg, Civilprocess, iv. 85. Cf. Tac. Germ. c. 13, 'magna patrum merita.' Waitz, D. V. G. i. 189-191; Grimm, R. A. pp. 265 sq.

² Tac. Germ. c. 7.

³ Ibid. cc. 11, 13.

⁴ Yet most of the principes mentioned in Tacitus are of noble birth: hence it is argued that nobility gave a presumptive if not exclusive claim to office. See Bethmann-Hollweg, Civilprocess, iv. 90. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 221, maintains that there is no such connexion, and it cannot be proved.

⁵ Tac. Germ. c. 13. 'Ante hoc domus pars videntur, mox reipublicae.'

⁶ Waitz, D. V. G. i. 323, 324; Sohm, Fränkische Reichs- und Gerichtsverfassung, pp. 545-558.

⁷ Tac. Germ. c. 25. Cf. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 174.

freedom. It is most improbable on all analogies that they possessed any political rights.

The unfree or servile class is divided by Tacitus into two¹: The servile classes.

one answering to the coloni of Roman civilisation, and the other to slaves. Of the former each man has a house and home of his own. He pays to his lord a quantity of corn, of cattle, or of clothing; he must therefore hold land on which to grow the corn and feed the cattle, and this land is of course a portion of his lord's. Possibly the more dignified and richer freemen cultivate all their lands by these means; but if the analogy with the Roman coloni holds good², the servus is personally free except in relation to his lord and his land, neither of which he can forsake. His condition is not a hard one; he is very rarely beaten or forced to labour; but if his lord kill him, as sometimes may be done in passion, it is done with impunity; no satisfaction can, it would seem, be recovered by his family. The origin of this servile class may be found in the subjugation, by the tribe, of the former occupiers of the land; a process which, in the nomadic and warlike phase of public life that had now passed away, must have been by no means uncommon, and which may have even created a subject population, cultivating the land of the tribe in immediate dependence on the state or king. There is no reason to suppose that the depressed population were other than German in origin, although of course unconnected by any tribal tie with their masters. Even the sons of the poorer freemen may be supposed to have taken service as cultivators under the richer men or on the public lands. The cultivating class.

The second class of servi contained those who had lost their The slaves. freedom by gambling; possibly also prisoners of war: of penal servitude there is no distinct trace. This cannot have been a large body : the gamblers were generally sold, the possession of such victims being no credit to the owner¹.

¹ Tac. Germ. cc. 24, 25; Grimm, R. A. pp. 300, 301; G. L. von Maurer, Hofverfassg. i. 5 sq.

² Savigny has collected and arranged all the materials for the history of the colonus in a paper translated in the Philological Museum, ii. 117: he carefully points out that, notwithstanding a close analogy, there is no historical connexion whatever between the Roman coloni and the German serfs; pp. 144, 145. See also Waitz, D. V. G. i. 175 sq. G. L. von Maurer, Hofverfassg. i. 27-37, 385-387.

The official magistracy.

The principes, or official magistracy, have of course pre-eminence in dignity and privilege. They are elected in the national assemblies, and receive a provision in the shape of voluntary offerings or distinct votes of corn and cattle, made by the state itself². Such votes imply the existence of some state domain or public land, the cultivation of which must have been performed by servi or coloni; and the natural tendency of such an arrangement would be to annex some portion of the territory as an official estate to the dignity of the princeps. It is clear that it had not reached this stage in the age of Tacitus³. Outside of his official authority, the chief or only privilege of the princeps was the right of entertaining a *comitatus*⁴.

The comitatus.

This was a body of warlike companions, who attached themselves in the closest manner to the chieftain of their choice. They were in many cases the sons of the nobles who were ambitious of renown or of a perfect education in arms. The princeps provided for them horses, arms, and such rough equipment as they wanted. These and plentiful entertainment were accepted instead of wages⁵. In the time of war the comites fought for their chief⁶, at once his defenders and the rivals of his prowess. For the princeps it was a disgrace to be surpassed, for the comites

¹ Tac. Germ. c. 24.

² 'Eliguntur in iisdem conciliis.' Tac. Germ. c. 12. 'Mos est civitatibus ultro ac viritum conferre principibus quod pro honore acceptum etiam necessitatibus subvenit.' Ibid. c. 15. This is the origin of the naturalia of the Frankish, and perhaps of the feorm-fultum of the Anglo-Saxon, kings. Kemble, Saxons, ii. 31.

³ Waitz, D. V. G. i. 255.

⁴ Whether the right of comitatus was attached to the office of king and princeps is a matter of dispute; Bethmann-Hollweg, Civilprocess, iv. 93. Waitz (D. V. G. i. 228-237) regards it as exclusively so. Konrad Maurer, arguing that in an early stage of society the companions and free servants of the princeps would be the same, inclines to regard the comites of the princeps as corresponding with the servants of private persons. Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 396-403. However this may be, it is enough for our purpose to remark that it was only the princeps who could give a public status and character to his comites.

⁵ 'Nam epule et quanquam incompti, largi tamen, apparatus pro stipendio cedunt,' Tac. Germ. c. 14. The warhorse and spear were the gift of the princeps and the origin of the later heriot.

⁶ 'Principes pro victoria pugnant, comites pro principe.' Tac. Germ. c. 14.

it was a disgrace not to equal the exploits of their leader, and perpetual infamy to retire from the field on which he had fallen. They were bound by the closest obligation to defend and protect him, and to ascribe to his glory their own brave deeds¹. In the body thus composed, there were grades of rank determined by the judgment of the *princeps*²: and a high place in the comitatus was an object of ambition to the noble youth just as much as the possession of a numerous and spirited body of retainers was to his patron, who found that his dignity, strength, glory, and security depended in no small degree on the character of his followers. The princeps who entertained such a company, was renowned both abroad and at home; he was chosen to represent his nation as ambassador; he was honoured with special gifts; and sometimes the terror of his name would put an end to war before blood had been shed. War was the chief if not the sole employment of the comites: when there was peace at home, the youth sought opportunities of distinguishing and enriching themselves in distant warfare. In the times of forced and unwelcome rest they were thoroughly idle; they cared neither for farming nor for hunting, but spent the time in feasting and sleep³. The comitatus is one of the strangest but most lasting features of early civilisation, partly private and partly public in its character, and furnishing a sort of supplement to an otherwise imperfect organisation. The strong and close bond of union thus described by Tacitus can scarcely be the same institution as the voluntary and occasional adhesion to a military leader, which Caesar mentions in connexion with the aggressive expeditions of his own time⁴; but the one may have grown out of the other. Glory

Tie of the comites to the princeps.

Their employments.

¹ Tac. Germ. c. 14: 'Sua quoque fortia facta gloriae ejus assignare praecipuum sacramentum est.' Waitz understands this to imply an actual oath. D. V. G. i. 347.

² Tac. Germ. cc. 13, 14. The difficult passage 'Insignis nobilitas aut magna patrum merita principis dignationem etiam adolescentulis assignant' is commented on at great length by Waitz, D. V. G. i. 260-270; and Sohm, Fr. R. G. V. pp. 555-558; both of whom give a transitive sense to dignationem. Kemble translates 'principis dignationem assignant,' 'give the rank of princes.' Saxons, i. 166.

³ Tac. Germ. c. 15: a passage which does not refer exclusively to the comites.

⁴ Caesar, de Bello Gallico, vi. 23; above, § 11. The idea of Sybel and others that Caesar describes an earlier form of the institution is rejected by Waitz, D. V. G. i. 357; K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 418.

The comitatus.

and booty seem to have been the chief end of the expeditions organised by both, and the tie of personal honour and attachment the common bond; but in Caesar's account the leadership is not restricted to the official magistrate, and the engagement of the follower is for a single campaign only. That the relation to the princeps implies personal dependence is clear: no one need blush, says Tacitus, to be seen among the *comites*¹; but the fact that it was necessary, from the Roman point of view, to say so, involves of necessity some idea of diminution of status. It may be questioned whether any one in this relation would be regarded as fully competent to take part in the deliberations of the tribe, but it is scarcely reasonable to suppose, as has been sometimes maintained, that a position of so much honour, and so much coveted, could only be obtained by the sacrifice of freedom². But the importance of the comitatus lies mainly in the later history, and in its bearing on kindred but distinct developments.

The priests.

Of the priests of the German races we learn little more from Tacitus than that they formed a distinct class of men who presided at the sacrifices, took the auspices for public undertakings, proclaimed silence in the assembly, and in the name of the god of war discharged the office of judge and executioner in the host³.

It is, however, in relation to the administration of government that the notices of the Germania have their greatest value.

The tribal constitution.

15. There was not in the time of Tacitus, any more than in that of Caesar, any general centre of administration, or any federal bond among the several tribes, although the great kindred races had common religious rites and sanctuaries. Each nation had a constitution of its own. In some there was a king with kindred nobility and of course a personal comitatus, the patron of freedmen and serfs⁴. But the king was by no means vested with ir-

Royalty.

¹ Tac. Germ. c. 13: 'Nec rubor inter comites aspici.'

² This seems to be Kemble's view; Saxons, i. 173; 'it is clear that the idea of freedom is entirely lost,' being replaced by that of honour. It is entirely rejected by Waitz, D. V. G. i. 348, and K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 394.

³ Tac. Germ. cc. 7, 10, 11. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 257, 258.

⁴ Tac. Germ. cc. 7, 25. The essence of German kingship was not in the command of the host, or in the leadership of a comitatus, or in the union of several tribes under one sceptre, or in an authority more efficient than that of the princeps; but in its hereditary character, or in the choice, by the people, of a ruler from a distinct family. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 288-293.

responsible or unlimited powers¹. He was elected from the body of the nobles, for strictly hereditary succession was confined to private property: he had not the sole command in war; that was engrossed by the duces, who also owed their position to election, determined by the renown they had already earned, and sustained by the willing obedience of their companions in arms². He might take a leading part in council, but others qualified by age, nobility, honour, and eloquence had a not inferior claim to be heard³. He received a portion of the fines imposed in the courts of justice, but he did not appoint the judges⁴. His position was dignified and important, as impersonating the unity of the tribe and implying a dominion more extensive than that held by the other non-monarchical communities; but unless he were personally endowed with the gifts or reputation of a military leader, it could be one only of simple honour. There was no such relation between him and the *principes*⁵ as there was between the principes and their comites: the principes fought not for him, but for victory, and the only treason, except that which consisted in the betrayal of the voluntary tie, was that which was committed against the nation⁶.

Limited character of royalty.

We may understand that a tribe which had adopted monarchy must gradually have modified these conditions; that a king strong enough to maintain his position at all, must have gathered the chiefs of the land into a comitatus of his own; but there is no sign as yet that this was done: nor is there any indication that the king exercised, except in the case of auguries⁷, any such

K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 419-423. This hereditary character is absolutely inconsistent with the supposition that royalty originated in the comitatus: and is in distinct contrast with the elective principle applied in the case of the principes.

¹ Tac. Germ. c. 7: 'Nec regibus infinita aut libera potestas.'

² 'Duces ex virtute sumunt . . . et duces exemplo potius quam imperio . . . praesunt.' Tac. Germ. c. 7. Waitz however maintains that the king was the regular general for the monarchic tribes; D. V. G. i. 310 sq.

³ Tac. Germ. c. 11.

⁴ 'Pars mulctae regi vel civitati, pars ipsi qui vindicatur vel propinquis ejus exsolvitur.' Ibid. c. 12.

⁵ Nor were the nobiles the king's comitatus: but the question belongs to a later stage. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 365 sq.

⁶ 'Proditores et transfugas arboribus suspendunt,' &c. Tac. Germ. c. 12.

⁷ Ibid. c. 10.

sacerdotal influence as in ancient times might be supposed to console a sovereign whose power bore no proportion to his dignity. But it is not easy to argue with certainty from the words of Tacitus, that those tribes in which the power and pre-eminence of the principes were of so great importance, were really subject to kings at all.

The central administration was in the civitas whether monarchic or not.

For a very large proportion of the tribes dispensed altogether with royalty: the state or *civitas*¹ was a sufficient centre, and the tie of nationality a sufficient bond of cohesion. In these still, as in Caesar's time, the principes chosen in the national councils acted independently of one another in peace, and in war obeyed the leader whose valour marked him out for election. Under this system the state received the portion of the mulcts which in the monarchies fell to the king²: there is no evidence that the election of the principes was influenced by the hereditary principle³, or that their status involved any of the honours of royalty. In the monarchical tribes it is probable that the king may have gradually appropriated the powers and honours of the principes, but in the non-monarchical ones there is nothing to show that the principes were more than the elective magistrates of free and kindred communities.

The principes of the non-monarchic tribes.

The central assembly of the civitas, a gathering of the host.

16. Under both systems the central power was wielded by the national assemblies. These were held at fixed times, generally at the new or full moon⁴. There was no distinction of place⁵: all were free, all appeared in arms. Silence was proclaimed by the priests, who had for the time the power of enforcing it. Then the debate was opened by some one who had a personal claim to be heard, the king, or a princeps, or one whose age, nobility, military glory, or eloquence entitled him to rise. He took the tone of persuasion, never that of command. Opposition was expressed by loud shouts; assent by the shaking of spears; enthusiastic applause by the clash of spear and shield.

¹ Tacitus uses the word civitas to express the tribe in its constitutional aspect, in the Germania, cc. 8, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 19, 25, 30, 41; and Annales, i. 37. Genus is also used in the same sense, but not so pagus, which always means a subdivision; as in Caesar, de Bello Gallico, i. 12, 'Omnis civitas Helvetia in quattuor pagos divisa est.' Waitz, D. V. G. i. 140. Sohm (Pr. R. G. V. pp. 1-8) carefully works out the position that whereas the unity of the German race was one of blood and religion only, the tribal or state unity exhibited in the councils was political, and that of the pagi or hundreds simply a judicial organisation.

² Tac. Germ. c. 12. ³ See above, p. 22, n. 4. ⁴ Tac. Germ. c. 11.

⁵ Possibly they arranged themselves, as in the host, in kindreds. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 325.

Of matters of deliberation the more important were transacted in the full assembly, at which all the freemen were entitled to be present. But the business was canvassed and arranged by the principes before it was presented for national determination; and matters of less import and ordinary routine were dispatched in the limited gatherings of the magistrates. Of the greater questions were those of war and peace, although these, together with proposals of alliance and elections of magistrates, were frequently discussed in the convivial meetings which formed part of the regular session of the council¹. The magistrates for the administration of justice in the pagi and vici were elected in the general council. It also acted, in its sovereign capacity, as a high court of justice, heard complaints and issued capital sentences².

Deliberations of the council of the civitas.

The local courts of justice were held by the elected principes in the larger divisions or pagi, and in the villages or vici. But their office was rather that of president of the court than of judge. The princeps had, in the pagus at least, a hundred assessors or companions to whom he was indebted not only for advice but for authority also³: doubtless they both declared the law and weighed the evidence. Capital punishments were not rare; hanging was the reward of treason and desertion: the coward and the abandoned person were drowned or smothered

Judicial assemblies of the pagus.

¹ 'De reconciliandis invicem inimicitii et jungendis affinitatibus et adiscendis principibus, de pace denique ac bello, plerumque in conviviis consultant.' Tac. Germ. c. 22. Whether the custom of drinking the fines for non-attendance, which was a time-honoured practice in the German mark-courts (G. L. von Maurer, Markenverfassg. p. 275), and still prevails in England in rural clubs, can be traced to this usage, need not be discussed. It certainly seems that the manorial courts still support their existence by dinners after business: and so in the time of Athelstan the 'bytt-fylling,' 'impletio vasorum,' was an important part of the proceedings of the local gatherings. The vexed question of scot ales and church ales, and the functions of the ale-taster connect themselves with the primitive practice: and so also the guilds. See Chap. xi, below.

² Tac. Germ. c. 12. See Sohm, Fr. R. G. V. p. 5.

³ 'Eliguntur in iisdem conciliis et principes, qui jura per pagos vicosque reddunt. Centeni singulis ex plebe comites consilium simul et auctoritas adsunt.' Tac. Germ. c. 12.

Fines in compensation for offences.

under hurdles : other offences were expiated by fines, of which one portion went to the king or the state, the rest to the injured person or his relations. The system of compensation extended even to the reconciliation of hereditary quarrels: homicide itself might be atoned for by a fine of cattle : the whole house of the slain man joined in accepting it as an indemnity, and the breach of the public peace was healed by a fixed share¹.

Organisation in time of war.

17. In war the compulsory maintenance of discipline was tempered greatly by the spirit of the comitatus. The leader of the host was the chosen champion ; not necessarily the king or the local magistrate, but the dux whose prowess had earned the confidence of the nation, and who as princeps was followed by the largest train of companions². From each pagus a hundred champions were sent to the host³, just as the hundred assessors were furnished to the court of justice. Well-trained infantry were thus supplied ; they took the van in battle and were supported by or mingled with the cavalry. The chief burden fell on the *duces*⁴, who had to set an example rather than to enforce command, and on the principes with their mounted *comites*⁵. The maintenance of discipline in the field as in the council was left in great measure to the priests⁶ ; they took the auguries and gave the signal for onset, they alone had power to visit with legal punishment, to bind or to beat. Otherwise the cohesion and order of battle was kept up by the voluntary regularity of the armed freemen, who arranged themselves, when not otherwise tied, in families and affinities⁷. Three principles at least seem to be at work in this system ; the national force

¹ The passages that illustrate this are of great importance on the whole subject of German criminal law ; the wer-gild, the bót, the wite, the character of the peace, the idea of the right of private war, the so-called fehde-recht, and the position of the king as guardian of the peace, and of the kindred as sharers in the feud. Tac. Germ. cc. 12, 21, 22. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 389-420. K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, iii. 26-36.

² 'Ipsa plerumque fama bella profligant.' Tac. Germ. c. 13.

³ 'Centeni ex singulis pagis.' Ibid. c. 6.

⁴ 'Si prompti, si conspicui, si ante aciem agant.' Ibid. c. 7.

⁵ The war-horse of the comes was the gift of the princeps as well as his arms. Ibid. c. 14.

⁶ Ibid. c. 7.

⁷ 'Non casus nec fortuita conglobatio turman aut cuneum facit, sed familie et propinquitates.' Ibid. c. 7.

consisting of the dux and chosen centuries of infantry ; the professional warriors with their trains of disciples, the principes fighting for victory, and the comites for their princeps ; and the mass of the freemen arranged in families fighting for their homesteads and hearths. It is to these last, according to Tacitus, that the strength of the force and the confidence of earnest valour is chiefly due, whether the immediate excitement be the rivalry of jealous neighbours or the urgency of common interests. The host is thus the whole nation in arms.

18. And the nation in its territorial aspect is not altogether unlike the host in permanent encampment : the pagus and vicus are rather the divisions of the people than of the land, and may be reasonably supposed to have been marked out with reference to the numerical arrangement of the host, and in that strict adherence to definite numbers which appears so constantly in new or loosely settled communities, whether civilised or not. The hundred warriors and the hundred judges of the pagus, may on this supposition represent the hundred free families to which the pagus was originally allotted, that primitive institution of the hundred which appears in every branch of the Germanic race in its earliest historical form ; not yet a definite geographical division, but a social and political one¹. The vici may be subdivisions in equal proportions, both of the personalities and of the territorial allotment of the hundred : and their subdivision by re-allotment may have been equally symmetrical. But it would be wrong to state this as more than a theory.

Personal
basis of these arrangements.

19. With very few exceptions, by way of inference, this description is a mere abstract and paraphrase of the language of the Germania. The general features of it are clear if not minute. It will probably always be a favourite exercise for learned ingenuity to attempt to trace distinct reference to the later institutions of the race : and it is quite lawful to work back, through obvious generalisations and comparisons with the early phenomena of society in other nations, to the primitive civilisation of the Aryan or the Indo-Germanic family. It would be foreign to our present purpose to attempt the latter task : and the former can only be partially undertaken in a work, the object of which is historical rather than philosophical. But the words of Tacitus require interpretation, and the unity of his sketch demands, for intelligent comprehension, some reference to the early principles of social development.

¹ Waitz, D. V. G. i. 154, understands the hundred companions of the princeps in judgment to be the fully qualified members of the community ; no special stress is to be laid on the number, as Tacitus himself warns us. They formed then a full hundred-court, and not a mere council of assessors, as Tacitus supposed. Bethmann-Hollweg takes the same view (Civil-process, iv. 102). The older view, regarding them as a committee of the freemen, is on the whole less likely. The principle that in these courts all the suitors are judges is very ancient. See also Waitz, D. V. G. i. 333.

Prospective and retrospective value of the Germania.

No principle works in isolation.

Among the first truths which the historical student, or indeed any scientific scholar, learns to recognise, this is perhaps the most important, that no theory or principle works in isolation. The most logical conclusions from the truest principle are practically false, unless in drawing them allowance is made for the counter-working of other principles equally true in theory, and equally dependent for practical truth on co-ordination with the first. No natural law is by itself sufficient to account for all the phenomena which on the most restricted view range themselves within its sphere. And with respect to primitive society, this is especially noteworthy. The patriarchal theory, as it is called, will certainly not account for any great proportion of the phenomena of the social system under any of its phases : yet there are in the Germania some traces of the idea on which it is based ; the union for some purposes of sacerdotal with royal functions¹, and the vast and permanent importance of the family tie². Of the four chief forms of political life, which in their earlier stages are compatible with the existence of a people in the pastoral, the hunting, and the predatory stages of its development, the most complex, that of the city, is expressly excluded by the words of Tacitus ; the Germans had no cities³, no fortified places of resort or refuge ; and when at a later period they adopt a city life, its

Traces of primitive society.

¹ Tac. Germ. c. 10.

² In relation to the host, Tac. Germ. c. 7 ; to feuds, e. 21 ; to inheritance, c. 20 ; the relations witness the punishment of the unfaithful wife, e. 19 ; marriages with alien nations are unusual, e. 4. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 49-92.

³ Tac. Germ. c. 16. They regarded them as 'munimenta servitii.' Tac. Hist. iv. 64.

constitution is based on that of the ancient villages rather than on any imported idea of the classical municipality¹. The lordship,—that quasi-manorial system, in which the lord of the land lives among his free tenants and cultivates his proper demesne by serfs or hired labourers, possessing the original title to the whole, waste as well as cultivated, with jurisdiction over and right to service from all who dwell within the boundaries,—is only in very few particulars reconcileable with the sketch of Tacitus. The village system in which, the tie of community of land not necessarily existing, the freer and simpler institution of a common machinery for the preservation of peace, the administration of justice, and the fulfilment of public duties as part of a wider organisation, is the direct and primary bond, does fall in more easily with the general tenour of the description. The vici or villages exist and have justice administered by the principes. But further references, irrespective of the question of the land, are scanty and open to much discussion. The idea of the Mark System, as it is called, according to which the body of kindred freemen, scattered over a considerable area and cultivating their lands in common, use a domestic constitution based entirely or primarily on the community of tenure and cultivation, is an especially inviting one, and furnishes a basis on which a large proportion of the institutions of later constitutional life may theoretically be imposed. And there are nations in which such a system has ever been the rule, although they are not those whose progress has made a part of the world's history², whilst the very fact of their permanent insignificance may be regarded as a positive refutation of the claim of their system to include all the germs of greater and more active free institutions. But this system, in its bare simplicity, is scarcely consistent with the general sketch of the Germania, and totally insufficient as a key to the whole. The German communities, although they hold their Germs of later institutions contained in the Germania. The manor.

The village.

The Mark.

¹ See this worked out by G. L. von Maurer, Städteverfassg. i. 134 sq. : he rejects the idea of Roman municipality, of the manorial system, of the Schöffenthum, or of the guild, as the origin of city life among the Germans, and traces it to the Mark.

² See, especially in reference to India, Sir H. S. Maine's Lectures on Village Communities, London, 1871.

land in common, are scarcely described as those of an agricultural people: while the mark system is wholly and entirely an agricultural one, and must, if it had existed in its integrity in Tacitus's time, have impressed its leading features more distinctly upon his memory. Nor can a mixture of the systems of the lordship, the village and the mark, claim a greater probability; we have no one of the three in its completeness and cannot be warranted in supposing the co-existence of all.

The sketch of Tacitus contains the several principles of later society.

It is only by viewing the description of the Roman historian as referring to a stage and state of society in which the causes are at work which at different periods and in different regions develop all the three, that any approach can be safely made towards bringing it into relation with the facts of historical sociology. We have not the mark system, but we have the principle of common tenure and cultivation, on which, in India, the native village communities still maintain a primitive practice much older probably than the Germania, and of which very distinct vestiges exist still in our own country, in Switzerland, and in Germany¹. We have not the village system in its integrity, but we have the villages themselves, their relation to the paji, and through them to the civitas, and the fact that they were centres for the administration of justice. We have not the manor, but we have the nobleman, we have the warlike magistrate with his attendant comites, whose services he must find some way of rewarding, and whose energies he must even in peace find some way of employing. The rich man too has his great house and court, and his family of slaves or dependents, who may be only less than free in that they cultivate the land that belongs to another. We dare not say that we have a perfect alodial system, although the land, so far as it may be held in severalty, is held alodially: we cannot say that we have feudality, for the tie between the lord and his dependent is distinctly not one of which land is either the exponent or the material basis.

¹ See below pp. 49-51. It appears rash to make the mark system, pure and simple, the basis of Germanic society. No doubt in some cases not only villages, but hundreds, and still larger territories possessed common lands, and the English folk-land is in a manner the mark-land of the nation: but it does not follow that in these all constitutional relations were based upon it. Still less in other regions where not so much as even this can be proved.

But we have germs and traces of all. The military princeps has but to conquer and colonise a new territory, and reward his followers on a plan that will keep them faithful as well as free, and feudalism springs into existence. The members of the village society have but to commute their fluctuating shares in the annual redistribution of land for a fixed allotment with definite duties incumbent upon them as independent owners, and we have the alodial system of village life; let the warriors of the tribe sink their predatory ardour in the fulfilment of immediate duties, cultivate their land and live on the produce of it, and they will probably fall back into the simplicity of the primitive mark life, out of which they emerged, and into which their descendants, in many cases, when civilised and humanised by the arts of peace, chose, in the prospect of freedom and social independence, to return.

If the free village organisation seems to recommend itself as the most adequate explanation of the facts recorded, it must be remembered that its plausibility depends on its obscurity and indefiniteness. It may contain or it may exclude the principle of common tenure and cultivation; it may include or exclude the estates of the rich men and their slaves, the halls of the principes and their companions. We can affirm little more than that the vicus was a community of common cultivators; a centre or a subdivision of the pagus for the purposes of police or judicature. On the analogy of the pagus we may infer that it furnished in its elders a body of assessors to assist the princeps on the bench of justice, and in its young men a contingent towards the chosen centuries of the host. All beyond this is theory, or derived from interpretation by later facts¹.

¹ Sohm (Fr. R. G. V. pp. 1-8) combats the idea that the constitution of the race (Stamm), that of the civitas (Volk), and that of the pagus (Hundert-schaft), are based on the same principle, so that one is the reproduction of the other on a different field. He contends that, in the Germania, they exhibit the people in three different phases: the religious, the political, and the judicial. 'The old German constitution is characterised by the organic connexion in which the different sides of the national life stand to the different stages of the national organism.' Grimm (R. A. p. 745) and Waitz (D. V. G. i. 316) are inclined to regard the several constitutions as conver-sant, in the main, with the same matters.

The three principles of kindred, community, and personal influence.

But the looseness and unjointed character of the upper organisation is by itself sufficient to prevent us from accepting a symmetrical theory. If the villages and the pagi are arranged on one principle, the supreme authority seems to be exercised at least on three. The king in the monarchic states does little more than represent the unity of race; he has a primacy of honour but not of power; he reigns but does not govern. The national council under the elective principes is sovereign in peace, but in war its powers are vested in the dux; and yet the authority of the dux over his comites does not rest on the election of the nation, but on the personal tie by which they are bound to him. Just so in each subordinate portion of the fabric, the three principles of the kindred, the community, and the personal influence, complement and complicate each other's action. The lower organisations are more coherent than the upper, because it is more possible for them to exist unmixed, or in personal union: the kindred may be the community, and the personal and official influence of the wise man or champion may be united in the chief of the family settlement. But even here the cohesive force may be exaggerated.

The conclusion that such a survey suggests, especially with a view to later history, is this: A great family of tribes whose institutions are all in common, and their bonds of political cohesion so untrustworthy, are singularly capable of entering into new combinations; singularly liable to be united and dissolved in short-lived confederations, and to reappear under new names, so long as they are without a great leader. Yet in that very community of institutions and languages, in the firmness of the common basis, and the strength of the lower organisation, if a leader can be found to impress on them the need of unity, and to consolidate the higher machinery of political action into a national constitution, instead of small aggregations and tumultuary associations, they possess a basis and a spring of life, from and by which they may rise into a great homogeneous people, symmetrically organised and united, progressive and thoroughly patriotic.

CHAPTER III.

THE SAXONS AND ANGLES AT HOME.

20. Appearance of the Franks and Saxons.—21. The Angles and Jutes.—
22. Saxons in Germany as described by Bede, Nithard, Rudolf, and Hucbald; and noticed in the Capitularies.—23. Notices of the Angles in Germany.—24. The mark system and common husbandry.—25. Early system illustrated by the Salian law.—26. Further illustrations.

20. For nearly two hundred years after the age of Tacitus very little is known of the internal history of the German tribes, and nothing new of their political institutions. From the facility with which the latter, when they reappear, may be made to harmonise with the account of the great historian, it is almost necessarily inferred that they had continued without change; nor is there any occasion to presume a development in the direction of civilisation. The Germans of Caesar's time were very far from being savages, but those of the fourth century were still a very long way from the conditions of modern society. How very long the institutions of a half-civilised nation may remain stationary we have both in the East and in the West very abundant evidence.

Reappearance of the German tribes under new names.

During these centuries, at various periods, the Roman empire was alarmed and shaken by the appearance on her borders of nations great in mass and strength, as their predecessors had been, but bearing new names. In the reign of Caracalla Rome first heard of the Goths and Alemanni¹; a little more than half a century later the Franks appear; and about the same time the Saxons, who had been named and placed geographically by Ptolemy, make their first mark in history. They are found employed in naval and piratical expeditions on the coasts of Gaul in A.D. 287¹.

¹ Ael. Spartianus, Caracalla, c. 10; Zeuss, Die Deutschen und die Nachbarstämme, pp. 304, 401.

Indeterminateness of the collective names.

Whatever degree of antiquity we may be inclined to ascribe to the names of these nations, and there is no need to put a precise limit to it, it can scarcely be supposed that they sprang from insignificance and obscurity to strength and power in a moment. It is far more probable that under the names of Frank and Saxon in the fourth century had been sunk the many better-known earlier names of tribes who occupied the same seats, as the Sigambri, the Salii and the Ubii were all now known as Franks², so the Cherusci, the Marsi, the Dulgibini, and the Chauci³ may have been comprehended under the name of Saxons. The nations of the Germania had no common name recognised by themselves, and were content, when, ages after, they had realised their unity of tongue and descent, to speak of their language simply as the Lingua Theotisca, the language of the people⁴ (theod). The general name by which the Romans knew them was one which they had received from their Gallie neighbours. Much of the minute and obscure nomenclature of the early geographers had probably a similar origin. The freemen of the gentes and cognationes might not care much about the collective name with which perhaps a casual combination under some great warrior had temporarily endowed them. So long as they retained amongst themselves their family or gentile names, it mattered little whether the foreigners called them Ingaevones⁵ or Cherusci, Germans or Saxons.

¹ Eutropius, ix. 13; Zeuss, p. 381; Grimm, Gesch. der D. Spr. p. 625.

² Grimm, Gesch. der Deutschen Spr. pp. 520 sq.; Zeuss, pp. 326, 329.

³ Grimm, Gesch. der Deutschen Spr. pp. 614, 624.

⁴ Whence the name 'Deutsch.' Zeuss derives it rather from the root of 'deuten,' to explain, so that theotise should mean 'significant.' But the root of theod and deuten is the same. See Max Müller, Lectures on the Science of Language, ii. 230; Grimm, Gesch. der Deutschen Spr. p. 790; Waitz, D. V. G. i. 28. All decide against the connexion with the Teutones.

⁵ Grimm's identification of the Ingaevones with the Saxons, of the Iscaevones with the Franks, and of the Herminones with the Thuringians is convenient: Pref. to his edition of the Germania, p. iv. Gesch. der Deutschen Spr. pp. 829, 830; Waitz, D. V. G. i. 9-11; Max Müller, Lectures on the Science of Language, ii. 502, 503. There is, I believe, no etymological objection to connecting the Ing of the Ingaevones with the Ang of the Angles and the Eng of England.

It is possible that the sudden prominence of new names sometimes signified the acquisition of dominion by a rising tribe; that the later career of the Franks may be but the fulfilment of a destiny that had begun to work centuries earlier; it is not impossible that a confederation of free and neighbour tribes may have become known to the world by a collective name which they were scarcely conscious of bearing¹: nor is it unlikely that in some cases the collective name itself testifies to a series of rapid subjugations and annexations. But, however this may be, the bearing of the common name was in itself a long step towards political unity: the Saxon communities might have no yearning towards it themselves, but when they found that their neighbours treated them as one, they would find it gradually necessary to act as one. It is needless for us to attempt now to generalise on the widely varying causes that led to this constitution of the later nationalities. Some had originated in the necessity of defence against Rome, some in the tempting prospect of rich booty; the later ones perhaps in the turmoil which accompanied the great upheaval in Central Asia that first threw the Goths upon the empire. It is safer to ascribe them in general to some such external cause than to suppose them to have proceeded from, or even to have evinced, a tendency towards political union. The very causes which made combination easy would seem to preclude the possibility of any conscious active tendency towards it. Whilst the nations on the Lower Rhine were all becoming Franks, those between the Rhine and the Oder were becoming Saxons; the name implied as yet no common organisation, at the most only an occasional combination for attack or defence.

21. In close neighbourhood with the Saxons, in the middle of the fourth century, were the Angli, a tribe whose origin is more uncertain and the application of whose name is still more a matter of question. If the name belongs, in the pages of the

Importance
of the new collective names.

They are not to be referred to actual confederation.

The Saxons.

The Angles.

¹ Waitz, D. V. G. i. 342, rejects the idea of anything like federal constitutions in these early times. But a long alliance may, for foreign nations, easily bear the appearance of a confederation. See also Grimm, Gesch. der Deutschen Spr. p. 518.

Movements of the Angli
in Germany.

several geographers, to the same nation, it was situated in the time of Tacitus east of the Elbe ; in the time of Ptolemy it was found on the middle Elbe between the Thuringians to the south and the Varini to the north ; and at a later period it was forced, perhaps by the growth of the Thuringian power, into the neck of the Cimbric peninsula. It may however be reasonably doubted whether this hypothesis is sound, and it is by no means clear whether, if it be so, the Angli were not connected more closely with the Thuringians than with the Saxons¹.

The Jutes.

To the north of the Angli, after they had reached their Schleswig home, were the Jutes, of whose early history we know nothing, except their claim to be regarded as kinsmen of the Goths, and the close similarity between their descendants and the neighbour Frisians². All these tribes spoke dialects of the language now known as the old low German, in contrast with the Suevic or Swabian tribes, whose tongue was the basis of the high German, and with the Frank, whose language, now almost entirely lost, seems to have occupied a middle position between the two. That of the Goths was outside, but still akin to all the three varieties.

Language of the three tribes.

These tribes colonised Southern Britain.

It was by these tribes, the Saxons, the Angles, and the Jutes, that Southern Britain was conquered and colonised in the fifth and sixth centuries, according to the most ancient testimony. Bede's assertion³, although not confirmed by much independent authority, is not opposed by any conflicting evidence ; and such arguments as can be gathered from language and institutions are in thorough harmony with it.

Of the three, the Angli almost if not altogether pass away into the migration : the Jutes and the Saxons, although migrating in great numbers, had yet an important part to play in their own homes and in other regions besides Britain ; the former at a later period in the train and under the name of the Danes ; the latter in German history from the eighth century to the present day⁴. The development of the Saxons, however, was more

¹ Grimm, Gesch. der Deutschen Spr. pp. 641, 642.

² Ibid. pp. 735, 736.

³ Hist. Eccl. i. 15.

⁴ The name of Ambrones, given by Nennius as equivalent to 'Ald rapid, and is much more fully illustrated by history in England than in Germany; and the traces of Anglian institutions in their ancient home are of the most insignificant character.

22. There are several notices extant of the social and political condition of the continental Saxons at the time when they first came into collision with the Frank empire, and when their conversion was first attempted. These seem to show that they had remained until then altogether free from Roman influences, and from any foreign intermixture of blood or institutions. They had preserved the ancient features of German life in their purest forms. Of these witnesses Bede is the most ancient. He wrote whilst they were still unconquered, from the report of the English missionaries. They are not only unconquered, but unconsolidated. 'These same old Saxons,' he writes, 'have not a king but a great number of satraps set over their nation, who in any case of imminent war cast lots equally; and on whomsoever the lot falls, him they all follow as leader during the war; him they obey for the time; but when the war is over all the satraps again resume their equal power¹.' Except the method of selection by lot, instead of election by merit, this description is in close harmony with that of Tacitus. The military leader is chosen for the time only: his success does not make him a permanent ruler or king: the union of the gentes or nations is temporary and occasional only; when the emergency is over each tribal ruler is independent as before. In connexion with the same story, the venerable historian describes one of these satraps as acting with summary jurisdiction on the inhabitants of a vicus which was under the mediate

Historical notices of the old Saxons.

Bede's statement.

Saxones,' and applied to the Northumbrians of the seventh century (M. H. B. p. 76), is found in Livy and Plutarch in connexion with the Teutones. Zeuss (Die Deutschen, &c. pp. 147, 151) collects the passages where the name occurs, and conjectures that it was a traditional name of the people known later as Saxons.

¹ Hist. Eccl. v. 10. 'Non enim habent regem iidem Antiqui Saxones, sed satrapas plurimos suae genti praepositos, qui ingruente belli articulo mittunt aequaliter sortes, et quemcumque sors ostenderit, hunc tempore belli ducem omnes sequuntur, huic obtemperant; peracto autem bello rursum aequalis potentiae omnes fiunt satrapae.' The word duces is translated by Alfred 'to heretogan' and 'to laththeowe.' Smith's Bede, p. 624.

The township among the Old-
Saxons.

government of a *villicus*¹. King Alfred when he translated Bede had no difficulty in recognising in the satrap the caldorman, in the villicus the tungerefa, in the vicus the tunscipe of his own land; possibly the same names were used in both the continental and the insular Saxonies².

Statement of Nithard.

The next historical witness is Nithard. The grandson of the great Charles, writing about A.D. 843, describes the nation that his grandfather had converted as one of most ancient nobility and most brilliant military skill. The whole race is divided into three ranks, edhilingi or nobiles, frilingi or ingenuiles, lazzi or *serviles*³. It was by promises made to the frilingi and the lazzi that the Emperor Lothar gained their aid against his brothers: he undertook to restore to them the old law under which they had lived before their conversion. Thus encouraged they rose against their lords, and having expelled them nearly all from their country, lived under their ancient law, each man as he pleased. In the division of noble, free and unfree, which is preserved also in a Capitulary⁴ of A.D. 797, as the nobilis, the ingenuus and the litus, we have a clear maintenance of Tacitus's distinction of the nobilis, the ingenuus, and the servus or colonus—the eorl, the ceorl and the læt of the Kentish laws two centuries earlier in date.

Three classes of men among the Saxons.

Later
notices of an earlier state of things.

Bede and Nithard both state the facts existing in their own day; but we have two very valuable evidences of a much earlier condition of things from writers of later date. Rudolf, the

¹ 'Qui venientes in provinciam, intraverunt hospitium cujusdam villici, petieruntque ab eo ut transmitterentur ad satrapam.' Hist. Eccl. v. 10.

² 'Da hi ða on cald Seaxan comon ða eodon hi on sumes tungerefan gæstern, and hine bædon that he hi onsende to ðam caldormen.' Smith's Bede, p. 624.

³ Nithard, Hist. iv. 2: 'Saxones . . . qui ab initio tam nobiles quam et ad bella promptissimi multis indicibus sæpe claruerunt. Quæ gens omnis in tribus ordinibus divisa consistit; sunt enim inter illos qui edhilingi, sunt qui frilingi, sunt qui lazzi illorum lingua dicuntur; Latina vero lingua hoc sunt, nobiles, ingenuiles atque serviles.'

⁴ Capitulare Saxonum, Baluze, i. 199, 200; art. 3: 'Item placuit omnibus Saxonibus ut ubicunque Franci secundum legem solidos duodecim solvere debent, ibi nobiliores Saxones solidos duodecim, ingenui quinque, liti quatuor componant.' In art. 5: 'Si quis de nobilioribus ad placitum mannis venire contempserit, solido quatuor componat, ingenui duos, liti unum.' See Richthofen, Zur Lex Saxonum, p. 346.

author of the Translatio Sancti Alexandri, writing about A.D. 863, describes the Saxons of the early Frank empire as a nation 'most unquiet and hostile to the settlements of neighbours, but at home peaceable and benevolently mindful of the interests of their own people. Of the distinctions of race and nobility they are most tenaciously careful: they scarcely ever (and here the writer quotes the Germania) allow themselves to be infected by any marriages with other or inferior races, and try to keep their nationality apart, sincere and unlike any other.' Hence the universal prevalence of one physical type. 'The race consists of four ranks of men, the noble, the free, the freedmen, and the servi. And it is by law established that no order shall in contracting marriages remove the landmarks of its own lot; but noble must marry noble, freeman freewoman, freedman freedwoman, serf handmaid. If any take a wife of different or higher rank than his own, he has to expiate the act with his life'. 'They used also most excellent laws for the punishment of evildoers, and had taken pains to cultivate many institutions beneficial and accordant with natural law, which might have helped them in the way to true bliss, if they had not been ignorant of their Creator and aliens from the truth of His worship.' Whatever this statement loses by the close imitation of the words of Tacitus, it more than gains by the clear identification of the Saxons as peculiarly answering to his account of the Germans generally.

Statement of Rudolf.

Hucbald, the biographer of S. Lebuin, writing in the middle of the tenth century of the Saxons of the eighth, draws the following remarkable picture. 'In the nation of the Saxons in the most ancient times there existed neither a knowledge of the most High and Heavenly King, so that due reverence should

Statement of Hucbald.

¹ 'Quatuor igitur differentiis gens illa consistit, nobilium scilicet et liberorum, libertorum atque servorum. Et id legibus firmatum ut nulla pars in copulandis conjugiiis propriae sortis terminos transferant, sed nobilis nobilem ducat uxorem et liber liberam, libertus jungatur libertae et servus ancillae. Si vero quispiam horum sibi non congruentem et genere praestantiorum duxerit uxorem, cum vitae suae damno componat.' Rudolf, Transl. S. Alex.; Pertz, ii. 674. See Waitz, D. V. G. i. 213. Richthofen, Zur Lex Saxonum, pp. 223-229.

Huebald's
description of the Old-Saxons.

Their ranks, government,

and annual councils.

Development of the principle of representation.

be paid to His worship, nor any dignity of honour of any earthly king by whose providence, impartiality, and industry the nation might be ruled, corrected and defended. The race was, as it still is, divided into three orders; there are there those who are called in their tongue Edlingi; there are Frilingi; and there are what are called Lassi; words that are in Latin nobiles, ingenui, and serviles. Over each of their local divisions or pagi, at their own pleasure and on a plan which in their eyes is a prudent one, a single princeps or chieftain presides. Once every year, at a fixed season, out of each of these local divisions, and out of each of the three orders severally, twelve men were elected, who having assembled together in Mid-Saxony, near the Weser, at a place called Marklo, held a common council, deliberating, enacting, and publishing measures of common interest according to the tenour of a law adopted by themselves. And, moreover, whether there were an alarm of war or a prospect of steady peace, they consulted together as to what must be done to meet the case¹. The Saxons then in the tenth century could look back on a time when they were under this primitive constitution. The orders of men were what they had been in the days of Tacitus, although the servile class had got a new name and a far superior condition, which gave them some share even of political power. Still the principes ruled each his own pagus, and the national council was held once a year. That council alone expressed the national unity; there was no king; each chieftain ruled by the custom of the nation. The assembly was a representative council of the most perfect kind; and, stated simply, must have been as much in advance of the constitutional system of other countries in the tenth century as it had been in the eighth: for the double principle of representation, local and by orders, involves the double character of the gathering : in one aspect it is an assembly of estates, in another the concentration of local machinery : and in either it is a singular anticipation of politics which have their known and historical development centuries later. It may indeed be reasonably doubted whether such a complete and symmetrical system can have existed ; it would be as startling a phenomenon if it existed only in the brain of the Frank monk, as it would be in proper history¹. Nor have we any distinct information about it from any other source.

¹ 'Sunt denique ibi qui illorum lingua Edlingi, sunt qui Frilingi, sunt qui Lassi dicuntur, quod in Latina sonat lingua nobiles, ingenui, atque serviles. Pro suo vero libitu, consilio quoque ut sibi videbatur prudenti, singulis pagis principes praeerant singuli. Statuto quoque tempore anni semel ex singulis pagis, atque ex iisdem ordinibus tripartitis singillatim, viri duodecim electi et in unum collecti, in media Saxoniam secus flumen Wisram et locum Marklo nuncupatum, exercebant generale concilium.' V. S. Lebuini ap. Surium, iv. fo. 90. The opening words are of course from Nithard: above, p. 42, note 3.

The Capitularies of Charles the Great, the Lex Saxonum, and other monuments of later Saxon jurisprudence down to the Sachsenspiegel, preserve a few traces of primitive law, and furnish now and then contrasts and analogies that illustrate the institutions of England. It would be premature in this place to enlarge upon these. The particulars in which they coincide with the traditions of the historians already quoted are sufficient to show the main points that are now of importance, the primitive character of the polity, the careful exclusiveness of the pure Saxon race, the existence of the general assemblies, and the threefold division of classes, with the exceptional position of the lowest of the three. The Capitulatio de partibus Saxoniae, issued immediately after the conquest, and during the process of conversion, is strictly devoted to ecclesiastical regulations. Amongst its clauses are two which direct the contribution of the litus towards the maintenance of the clergy on the same principle as that of the nobilis and ingenuus ; the litus is fined for neglect of baptism, for transgression of the law of marriage, and for the observance of heathen rites, and in a fixed proportion ; he pays half the mulct of the ingenuus, a fourth of that of the noble. Another clause forbids the Saxons to hold any public assemblies unless authorised by a royal Missus ; and in this may be

Illustrations
from the Ca-
pitularies.

¹ Waitz, D. V. G. i. 178, 341, allows that the passage is suspicious, but declines to follow Schaumann in rejecting it altogether. See also vol. iii. p. 114. Richthofen, Zur Lex Saxonum, pp. 277, 278, regards it as problematical, especially with reference to the liti, but allows that a uniform rule respecting them did not prevail in the German tribes.

Illustrations
from the Ca-
pitularies.

traced a possible reference to the free national gatherings mentioned by Hucbald; for the count, as the king's deputy, is still allowed to hold pleas and do justice in his own government¹. The Saxon Capitulary of A.D. 797, which places the noble Saxon in the point of pecuniary mulcts on a level with the Frank, and regulates the exercise of supreme jurisdiction, again recognises the position of the liti. Where the noble pays four solidi, the ingenuus pays two, and the litus one². The same conclusions may be drawn from the Lex Saxonum, which furnishes besides some interesting coincidences in regard to payment for personal injuries with the earliest English code. The lord of the litus answers only for actions done at his command; in other cases the litus must prove his innocence like a freeman: a litus of the king may buy a wife wherever he pleases³. In each case the litus appears to be distinctly recognised as a member of the nation; he is valued for the wer-gild, summoned to the placitum, taxed for the church, allowed the right of compurgation and choice in marriage. It is probable from other evidence and on analogy that his services furnished part of the military resources of his country⁴. Instead of being a mere dependent with no political rights, the remnant of a conquered alien people⁵, he is free in relation to every one

From the
*Lex Saxo-
num*.

Position of
the litus.

¹ 'Capitulatio de partibus Saxonie,' Baluze, i. 181, artt. 15, 17, 20, 21. Art. 34 is this:—'Interdiximus ut omnes Saxones generaliter conventus publicos nec faciant nisi forte missus noster de verbo nostro eos congregare fecerit. Sed unusquisque comes in suo ministerio placita et justitias faciat; et hoc a sacerdotibus consideretur ne aliter faciat.' Cf. Richthofen, Zur Lex Saxonum, p. 171. Richthofen, p. 216, assigns A.D. 777 as the date of this act: Pertz fixes A.D. 785, Waitz, A.D. 782.

² Above, p. 42, note 4.

³ Lex Saxonum, ap. Lindenbrog, pp. 474-478. The wer-gild is 120 shillings, cap. ii. 3. See also cap. ii. 5; x. 1: 'Lito regis liceat uxorem emere ubicunque voluerit, sed non liceat ullam feminam vendere,' cap. xvii. Richthofen, Zur Lex Saxonum, pp. 331 sq., fixes the date of this code between A.D. 777 and A.D. 797; perhaps in A.D. 785.

⁴ See Waitz, D. V. G. iii. 115. He regards the high position of the adalings and the superior condition of the lazzi as Saxon peculiarities. They were an essential part of the Saxon people, iv. 299. A case in which they went to the host is given iv. 508; see also iv. 454.

⁵ It is argued that the Saxon lazzi were not pure Germans, from the words of Nithard: 'Schlavi propter affinitatem Saxonibus qui se Stellinga nominaverant.' Hist. iv. 2. Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, ii. 235. But both frilingi and lazzi were named Stellinga, and affinity does but his lord, and simply unfree as cultivating land of which he is not the owner. The slave, servus or knecht, is in a very different plight. In this it may well be we have a proof of the freedom of the ancient life, notwithstanding the preponderance of the nobles: liberty is more penetrating and more extensive than elsewhere, and the condition of the liti has no small importance in its bearing on the history of the colonisation of Britain.

23. Of the history of the Angli unconnected with that of England we have no details; but a code of laws is extant, dating perhaps from the eighth century, and entitled, The Laws of the Anglii and Werini¹. This document preserves several noteworthy details which may be regarded as subordinate links in the chain between England and the Germania. Such are the proportions of the wer-gild and the money-fines; and the classification of the free people as adalings and liberi. Of the ingenuus and litus as opposed to one another there is no trace: the wer-gild of the adaling is thrice that of the free man; the corresponding payment for the slave is one-twentieth of that of the adaling; the slave is atoned for with thirty solidi, the freedman with eighty, the freeman with two hundred, and the adaling with six hundred². The litus apparently does not exist. But although these points have a certain interest in themselves, they form part of a subject-matter which is common to all the Germanic races, and rest on an authority the exact value of which is too uncertain to make it worth while to examine them in detail. If we possessed a complete Mercian or Northumbrian code, and were quite certain of the connexion of the Anglii of these laws with the Angli of the migration, the case might be different.

The laws of the Anglii
and Werini.

not imply actual consanguinity. They were more probably the remains of a conquered Thuringian population. See Waitz, D. V. G. i. 178.

¹ Edited by Merkel in 1851; Canciani, vol. iii.: Lindenbrog, pp. 482-486; see also Thorpe's Lappenberg, i. 90, 91; Waitz, D. V. G. iii. 143; Richthofen, Zur Lex Saxonum, pp. 407-418. The theory that the laws belonged to two small communities, Englehem and Werinefeld, in Southern Thuringia (Richthofen, p. 411), is accepted by Brunner, Schwurgericht, p. 19. The laws belong to the age of Charles the Great.

² Tit. i. artt. 1, 2; tit. ii-iv; tit. vii. art. 6; and on the coincidences between the Anglian and Anglo-Saxon laws, see Thorpe's Lappenberg, i. 93, 94.

Caution in the use of analogies.

Still less is it necessary to appeal to the evidence of later Danish institutions for the illustration of the polity of the Jutes¹, or in proof of their connexion with the Frisians. It is true that the common law of a nation is even more certainly than its language a determining evidence of its extraction. But so great is the mass of material, and so much of it is common to this whole family of nations, that it is at once unnecessary to work it into detail, and unwise to dwell upon such detail as proof of more distinct closer affinities. The common law of the race is abundant and comparatively clear ; but minute inferences from minute coincidences are sometimes deceptive : it would be unsafe to infer from such resemblances anything more than original consanguinity².

Importance
of these early notices.

24. These scanty particulars have their value, first, as furnishing points and analogies illustrative of the tribal character of the Saxons and their neighbours, which throw light on some important features of their migration and early colonisation of Britain ; and in the second place, as marking the peculiarities of their institutions which caught the eye of the historian and legislator by their contrast with those of the other nations of Germany. Only those details are noticed which serve to divide them from the nations whose system has now a less pure and primitive character. Hence we are warranted in concluding that in other points their social and political condition was not far removed from that of their neighbours, and are prepared to look amongst the German tribes of the fifth and sixth centuries generally for traces which may illustrate the polity of the particular race.

Common
features of German life
in the fifth and sixth centuries.

Such traces will be found chiefly in the department of land tenure and local government, on the earlier phases of which much has been said already. The laborious investigations of recent scholars have successfully reconstituted the scheme of land tenure as it existed among the Germanic races, by careful generalisations from charters, records of usages and the analogies

¹ Lappenberg, i. 96, regards as possibly Jutish the Kentish division into lathes, and the custom of fixing the age of majority at fifteen.

² These remarks of course do not refer to the importance of Scandinavian analogies with Anglo-Saxon history, which is very great, but simply to the relics of Jute tradition as brought to prove special connexion.

of Scandinavian law and practice, which at a later date reproduces, with very little that is adventitious, the early conditions of self-organising society. This scheme has been already mentioned more than once under the name of the mark system¹. Its essential character depends on the tenure and cultivation of the land by the members of the community in partnership. The general name of the mark is given to the territory which is held by the community, the absolute ownership of which resides in the community itself, or in the tribe or nation of which the community forms a part. The mark has been formed by a primitive settlement of a family or kindred in one of the great plains or forests of the ancient world²; and it is accordingly like any other clearing surrounded by a thick border of wood or waste, which supplies the place or increases the strength of a more effective natural boundary. In the centre of the clearing the primitive village is placed: each of the mark-men has there his homestead, his house, courtyard, and farm-buildings³. This possession, the exponent as we may call it of his character as a fully qualified freeman, entitles him to a share in the land of the community⁴. He has a right to the enjoyment of the woods, the pastures, the meadow, and the arable land of the mark; but the right is of the nature of usufruct or possession only⁵, his only title to absolute ownership being merged in the general title of the tribe which he of course shares. The woods and pastures being undivided, each mark-man has the right of using them, and can turn into them a number of swine and cattle: under primitive conditions this share is one of absolute equality⁶; when that has ceased to be the rule, it is regulated by strict proportion. The use of the meadow-land is also defi-

The Mark System.

¹ The great authority on this is G. L. von Maurer, who has collected and arranged an enormous quantity of material on the subject in his Einleitung, and in his works on the Markenverfassung, Dorfverfassung, Hofverfassung, and Städteverfassung.

² The idea of a forest clearing is not necessary to the mark. K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 65-72.

³ G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. p. 21.

⁴ Dorfverfassg. i. 61-65; Markenverfassg. pp. 59-62.

⁵ Einleitg. pp. 6, 93, 97.

⁶ Markenverfassg. pp. 142 sq.

Apportionment of land under the Mark System.

nately apportioned. It lies open from hay harvest to the following spring, and during this time is treated as a portion of the common pasture, out of the area of which it is in fact annually selected. When the grass begins to grow the cattle are driven out, and the meadow is fenced round and divided into as many equal shares as there are mark-families in the village: each man has his own haytime and houses his own crop: that done, the fences are thrown down, and the meadow becomes again common pasture: another field in another part of the mark being chosen for the next year. For the arable land the same regulative measures are taken, although the task is somewhat more complex: for the supply of arable cannot be supposed to have been inexhaustible, nor would the mark-men be likely to spend their strength in bringing into tillage a larger area than they could permanently keep in cultivation. Hence the arable surface must be regarded as constant, subject to the alternation of crops. In the infancy of agriculture the alternation would be simply that of corn and fallow, and for this two divisions or common fields would suffice. But as tillage developed, as the land was fitter for winter or spring sowing, or as the use of other seed besides wheat was introduced, the community would have three, four, five, or even six such areas on which the proper rotation of crops and fallow might be observed¹. In each of these areas the mark-man had his equal or proportionate share; and this share of the arable completed his occupation or possession.

Personal constitution of the polity in which this system prevails.

This system of husbandry prevailed at different times over the whole of Germany, and is in complete harmony with the idea of a nationality constituted on a basis of personal rather than territorial relations. As the king is the king of the nation, not of the land, the land is rather the sign or voucher for the freedom of its possessor than the basis of his rights. He possesses his land as being a full-free member of the community; henceforth the possession of it is the attestation, type, and embodiment of his freedom and political rights.

¹ G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. pp. 73-75, 77 sq.

For every such mark becomes a political unit: every free mark-man has his place in the assembly of the mark, which regulates all the internal business of the partnership and of the relations that arise from it. The choice of the meadow, the rotation of the crops, the allotment of the shares from year to year, are determined in this council¹; and without its consent no man may settle in the territory², build himself a house, or purchase the share of another. It is unnecessary to suppose that there was a period when the village marks administered justice amongst themselves; for within historical times they appear only as members of larger communities: but even these communities may have been originally constituted on the same principle, and have possessed common woods and pasture grounds in which the village marks have their definite shares. But the initiatory stage of legal proceedings may well have been gone through, complaints heard and presentments drawn up, in the village council. On such a hypothesis also it may have elected its own annual president³, although again within historic times such magistrate seems to have been imposed by the king or governing council of the nation.

The political adjuncts of the Mark System.

The village court or mark-moot.

If a member of the mark, or a new settler with permission of the mark-men, chose to build his house apart from the village, in a remote portion of the common land or in a new clearing, he might do so; and in such case he would have a permanent allotment of arable and meadow lying close to his farm, and not subject to the annual reapportionment. His partnership in the use of the common land would thus be limited to the use of wood and pasture, in which his rights would be determined on the common principle of proportion, by which also the extent of the original area which he was allowed to appropriate was limited⁴.

Separate settlements, outside the villages.

As the population increased and agriculture itself improved, the mark system must have been superseded everywhere. The

¹ G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. pp. 144-150.

² Ibid. pp. 141 sq.; Lex Salica, tit. 47.

³ G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. p. 140.

⁴ Ibid. p. 9.

Changes in the Mark
system.

foundation of new villages on the common lands, standing in a filial relation to the original settlement, and looking to it as the source of their political rights, must have soon exhausted the available territory. The partnership in tenure of the arable would necessarily become obsolete when the love of agriculture and the practice of careful husbandry demanded for the cultivator a tenant-right in his allotment: it could continue only so long as all men farmed equally well: as soon as the husbandman succeeded in keeping his annual plot better than his neighbour, he might fairly insist that a longer possession was therefore due to him, and that he might commute the annual for a perpetual allotment. So the arable fell into the condition of separate ownership together with the homestead; the rights to wood and pasture remaining in common, though liable also, when the process of inclosure has begun, to similar appropriation. And the right of separate ownership being established, inequality of estate, which must have prevailed to some extent from the first, would become the rule instead of the exception. But whilst the political importance of the system would thus pass away, the plan of common husbandry and common rights of wood and pasture, the local gatherings of the freemen and their by-laws or internal regulations, would remain and become available for administrative purposes guided on other principles. The old feeling of freedom and of the inseparable connexion between land ownership and the possession of public rights would continue; possibly also the habit of looking up to the owners of the primitive homesteads as the natural leaders, the representatives of the half mythical forefathers of the village.

Inequality of estates of land.

Permanent results of the Mark usages.

The system, necessarily shortlived in its integrity, thus leaves deep and abiding impressions wherever it has once prevailed; and those, if we are to trust to the nomenclature which belongs to it, in regions of political life where we should hardly look for them. The homestead of the original settler, his house, farm-buildings and enclosure, 'the toft and croft,' with the share of arable and appurtenant common rights, bore among the northern nations the name of Odal, or Edhel; the primitive mother village was an Athelby or Athelham; the owner was an Athelbonde¹: the same word Adel or Athel, signified also nobility of descent, and an adaling was a nobleman. Primitive nobility and primitive landownership thus bore the same name². It may be questioned whether any etymological connexion exists between the words odal and alod, but their signification as applied to land is the same: the alod is the hereditary estate derived from primitive occupation; for which the owner owes no service except the personal obligation to appear in the host and in the council. The freeman who does not bear the name of adaling, is the descendant of the later settler who has been admitted to full rights in the community; or he may be descended from the original settlers but has not inherited the homestead. Beneath these comes the free class of labourers who cultivate the land which others own. The three classes are kept distinct by the difference of the wergild: the killing of the adaling is atoned for by a fine twice or three times as large as that which can be demanded for the freeman; and his oath in compurgation is of twice or thrice the weight. Sometimes this difference of valuation may be referred to the difference of the size of the estate which each holds; and the value of the oath bears an exact proportion to the acreage of the alod. But this rule belongs probably to later times. It is enough for the present to observe that the mark system preserves in itself the two radical principles of German antiquity, the kindred and the community of land; and their primitive appurtenances, the wergild and compurgation, in which the kindred share the rights and responsibilities of the individual freeman; the right and obligation are based on the tie of kindred, regulated by the land tenure, and subject to the general administration of the peace.

The Alod
and the Adaling.

The freeman.

The cultivator of other men's land.

The distinction of the wergild.

25. Ascending from the simplest form of local organisation to the juridical and political administration of the tribe, we have in the 'Pactus Legis Salicæ,' or summary of the customs of Frank law in the fifth century, a store of facts which may illustrate a general theory although they cannot form the basis

The higher organisation as exemplified in the Salian law.

¹ G. L. von Marer, Einleitg. pp. 14-17.

² See Grimm, R. A. p. 265; Waitz, D. V. G. i. 185-187; K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 97; Vigfússon, Icelandic Diet. s. v. Adal, Oðal.

The Salian law.

of one¹. In some points the Salian law is contrasted with the customs of the interior nations of Germany, the Saxons for instance : such are those especially that have reference to royalty, which was unknown to the one nation long after it had become a regular institution of the other : where therefore the authority of the king is mentioned in it, we must, in applying the analogy to the Saxons, substitute for it the rule of the elective princeps, or of the assembly, or the local community, as the case may require.

Traces of the Mark.

The mark system has left its traces in the Salian law. The system of common cultivation may have passed away, but no settler is allowed to take up his dwelling in the vill without the express permission of the community, or authority from the king in whom the central rights of the community are vested². The social organisation of the vill may be identical perhaps with that of the mark ; it is capable of holding assemblies, discussing grievances, and making by-laws, but it is not a court of justice ; its president is the officer who collects the royal dues, and is nominated by the king³.

The court of justice, the mallus, or hundred-court.

The ordinary court of justice is the mallus or court of the hundred, of which the centenarius or thunginus⁴ is the president, elected by the national council. With him sits the sacebaro, to represent and secure the king's rights⁵. The court consists of all the fully qualified landowners, who bear, in their name of rachimburgi, a title that shows their capacity for legal functions ; for they furnish the centenarius with a body of assessors, selected from time to time, and called, during their period of service, the sitting *rachimburgs*⁶, in opposition to the rest of their body, who are the standing members. From the decisions of the mallus there is no appeal, except to

¹ Lindenbrog, Leges Barbarorum, pp. 309 sq. ; Canciani, ii. 17 sq. ; Baluze, Capitularia Rlt. Fl. i. 201 sq. ; Waitz, Das Alte Recht, Kiel, 1846.

² Titt. xiv, xlv ; Waitz, Das Alte Recht, pp. 124, 210, 228, 253 ; G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. p. 141 sq. ³ Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 314, 353, 354.

⁴ Savigny, R. R. i. 273 ; Waitz, Das Alte Recht, p. 294 ; D. V. G. i. 248.

⁵ Sohm, Fr. R. G. V. i. 84-94.

⁶ Waitz, D. V. G. i. 334. The name belongs to all fully qualified freemen among the Franks, and answers to Arimannus among the Lombards ; Savigny, Röm. Recht im Mittelalter, i. 191, 214 sq. On the derivation of the word see Savigny, i. 222 (Rek = rich, great ; and burg = borh, surety) ; Grimm, R. A. pp. 293, 774 (ragin = consiliaria) ; Waitz, Das Alte Recht, p. 291 ; D. V. G. ii. 36.

the king himself; no court intervening between that of the hundred and the supreme council of the nation¹. The Graf, The Graf. or administrative ruler of the province which is composed of the aggregations of the hundreds, is a servant of the king, fiscal and judicial, and as such executes the sentences of the mallus, but has no special court of his own².

The Salian law recognises fully the importance of the kindred No tribunal of the kin. in relation to the descent of property, the werigild and com-purgation; but affords no trace of any political or juridical organisation founded upon it, and contains no reference to any primitive nobility³, the only differences in the werigild arising No blood nobility. from employment in the host or in the king's service⁴. The position of the letus is nearer to that of the slave here than in the Saxon institutions, which however are in close conformity with the Frank law in the prohibition of mixed marriages⁵. Separate Inequality of estates. ownership of land, in the greatest completeness and in the most unequal proportions, has become the rule⁶: the more ancient system is to be detected only by the vestiges of its nomenclature: the 'terra salica' answering to the Alod or *Adalsgut*⁷.

The king is the ruler of the nation; he appoints the grafs The King. and the magistrates of the vills; he has a comitatus of personal followers who supply the place of hereditary nobility and permanent guard. He is the guardian of the peace of the nation, and supreme judge of appeal. The supreme political council The national council. is the nation in arms: but of any central gathering of the people for justice there is no mention; we can only infer that, if there were any, it must have necessarily coincided with the assembly of the host. The succession to the royalty is hereditary in one family, but the person who succeeds is chosen by the nation⁸.

¹ Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 493-495.

² Nor even a share in the jurisdiction of the mallus; Savigny, R. R. i. 256, 265; Sohm, Fr. R. G. Verf. i. 83.

³ Cf. Savigny, R. R. i. 223; Waitz, Das Alte Recht, p. 103; D. V. G. ii. 289-291.

⁴ Waitz, Das Alte Recht, p. 104.

⁵ Ibid. p. 106.

⁶ Ibid. p. 117; D. V. G. ii. 217. This seems to be the consequence of the conquest of a Roman province.

⁷ Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 220: the land attached to the 'sala' or house. Cf. Grimm, R. A. p. 493.

⁸ Waitz, Das Alte Recht, pp. 203-214; D. V. G. ii. 148-164.

Difference of Salian and Saxon customs.

So simple was the governmental system of the Franks in the fifth century: that of the Saxons was simpler still, for they were without the complication of royalty. The name of the hundred, the institution round which the Frank system circles, and the origin of which has, as we shall see, its own complexities, does not occur amongst the continental Saxons¹: and although it does not follow that it was unknown to them, its non-appearance is a presumptive evidence of superior simplicity of organisation. We shall trace, as we proceed in the history of the English, vestiges of the systems, or of parts of the systems, thus briefly characterised: perhaps we have shown already by implication how very much any complete scheme or general picture must be based on inferences and analogies, such as by their very nature raise a suspicion of pretentious speculation and warrant us in contenting ourselves with a modest and tentative dogmatism.

Danger of forming too complete theories.

Analogies in Scandinavian history.

26. And this consideration restrains us from even attempting to apply to the Saxons the minute and regular machinery of local divisions and jurisdictions which we find in the Scandinavian laws, and of which the colonisation of Iceland is the best and the favourite specimen. The existence of numerical divisions of the utmost minuteness is not inconsistent with great antiquity; but it is a sign not so much of antiquity as of the absence of more natural determinants. The nomad race has scarcely any possible principle of arrangement other than number: it is indispensable also to the machinery of the host, and in consequence the occupation of a conquered country, or the colonisation of one newly discovered, is regulated in this way. The usage is then no sign of either age or race. Yet it is useful to observe the analogy, especially when, as in Iceland, a perfect instance can be adduced.

Constitution of Iceland.

Iceland is divided into four fiordlungs or quarters, as Yorkshire may have been divided by the Danes into three ridings. Each fiordlung was divided into three things, and each thing into three godords or lordships: the northernmost fiordung however contained four things, so that there were thirty-nine godords in all. The godord was originally a personal not a territorial division¹. In the court of the fiordung were thirty-six judges, twelve from each godord, named by the lord, who did not himself sit there. The general assembly of the island was called the Althing. The lögretta, the judicial and legislative committee of the althing, was composed of the thirty-nine gothar, or godordsmen proper, and nine supplementary ones chosen by those of the three southern fiordungs; each of the forty-eight had two nominated assessors, so that the whole number was 144; with these sat the bishop and the lawmen; forty-eight being a quorum². Here is a late but distinct product of the Germanic centralising system marked by singular regard to numerical symmetry.

¹ Waitz, D. V. G. i. 153. The traces of the system alleged by Waitz are questioned by Richthofen. K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 76. It is also unknown among the Frisians. Waitz mentions however a 'Camminge hunderi' in Westphalia.

The court of the fiordung.

The lögretta.

Another instance may be found, also at a late period, in the immediate neighbourhood of Saxony proper. The little territory of Dithmarschen was colonised by two kindreds from Friesland and two from Saxony: the Frisians formed two marks, the Norderstand and the Suderstand; the Saxons two others, Norderhamm and Suderhamm; and the four were in A. D. 804 made into a Gau, in which the archbishop of Bremen had the royal rights of Heerbann and Blutbann: a fifth mark or döfft was afterwards added. The rights of the archbishop being guarded by an advocatus or vogt, sometimes by one to each mark, the state was governed by its own landrath: each mark had twelve elected consules: the forty-eight constituted the landrath. When in the sixteenth century the vogts disappeared, the territory became, what it had been originally, a systematic organism for self-government³. This furnishes no bad commentary on the testimony of Huebald⁴.

Constitution of Dithmarschen.

¹ The godord (gothorth) was the lordship which looked to the Hof or temple as the centre of its religious and legal organisation under the Gothi or priest-lord.

² Gragas, i. pp. 1-4; Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 115; Bluntschli in Krit. Ueberschau, i. 120-127; Vigfússon, Icelandic Dictionary, s. v. Althing, Gothi, Lögretta. K. Maurer's Beiträge zur Rechtsgeschichte des Germanischen Nordens, p. 176, and his recently published 'Island' are the authorities on the subject.

³ G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. pp. 289-292.

⁴ Above, p. 43.

CHAPTER IV.

THE MIGRATION.

27. Conquest of Britain.—28. Condition of the Britons.—29. Theory of earlier German settlements.—30. Theory of connexion between Welsh and Anglo-Saxon laws.—31. Effect of the conquest on the conquerors.—32. Adoption of royalty.

Different
circumstances of Frank and Saxon conquest.

27. THE fifth century saw the foundation of the Frank dominion in Gaul, and the first establishment of the German races in Britain. The former was effected in a single long reign, by the energy of one great ruling tribe, which had already modified its traditional usages, and now, by the adoption of the language and religion of the conquered, prepared the way for a permanent amalgamation with them. In this process, whilst the dominant tribe was to impose a new mould upon the material which Roman dominion had reduced to a plastic mass, it was in its turn to take forms which but for the pertinacious idiosyncrasy of the Gallic genius, and the Roman training to which it had been subjected, it would never have taken. Frank feudalism would scarcely have grown up as it did but for the pre-existence of the type of Gallic society which Caesar had remarked, and the care taken by the Roman governors to adapt the Gallic character to their own ends. It was a rapid if not an easy process: the Salian Frank entered into the place of the Roman and the Goth; the Visigoth retired southwards; the Ripuarian, the Alemannian, and the Burgundian accepted either feudal dependence or political extinction.

It was very different with Britain. The Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, although speaking the same language, worshipping the same gods and using the same laws, had no political unity like the Franks of Clovis; they were not moved by one impulse or invited by one opportunity. The conquest of Britain was the result of a series of separate expeditions, long continued and perhaps, in point of time, continuous, but unconnected, and independent of one another. It was conducted by single chieftains, who had nothing whatever in common with the nation they attacked, and who were about neither to amalgamate with them nor to tolerate their continued existence. They were men, too, on whom the charm of the Roman name had no power, and whose institutions were, more than those of the rest of the barbarians, free from Roman influences; for three centuries after the conquest the Saxons in Germany were still a pure nationality, unconquered by the Franks, untainted by Roman manners, and still heathen.

Conquest of Britain.

These separate expeditions had doubtless changed their character in course of time. Beginning as mere piratical visitations of the coast—such as were those of the Danes and Norsemen at a later period—they had before the end of the third century called forth the defensive powers of Rome, and tasked the energies of the count of the Saxon shore¹. It is not until the middle of the fifth century that they assume the dimensions of conquest, colonisation, migration; and when they have attained that character, the progress and success of the several attempts are not uniform; each little state reaches greatness by its own route, and the history of its growth makes a mark upon its constitution.

Diverse character of the expeditions.

28. If the Saxons and Angles are contrasted with the Franks still more are the Britons with the Gauls. Rome had laid a very strong hand on Gaul, and Gaul had repaid in a remarkable degree the cultivation of her masters. At the time of the downfall of the empire Gaul was far more Roman than Italy itself; she possessed more flourishing cities, a more active and enlightened church, and a language and literature com-

Difference between Gaul and Britain.

¹ The shore infested by the Saxon pirates, not the shore colonised by Saxons, as sometimes understood. See Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 11, and the references given there; cf. Selden, Mare Clausum, lib. ii. c. 7. The other view was held by Lappenberg (ed. Thorpe), i. 46, 47. Kemble seems also to favour it, Saxons, i. 10, 11; Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 384.

Roman civilisation in Britain.

pletely Latin, although of course far beneath the standard of the classical ages. Britain had been occupied by the Romans, but had not become Roman; their formative and cultivating power had affected the land rather than the owners of it. Here, too, had been splendid cities, Christian churches, noble public works and private mansions; but whatever amount of real union may have existed between the two populations ended when the legions were withdrawn. The Britons forgot the Latin tongue; their clergy lost all sympathy with the growth of religious thought: the arts of war had been disused, and the arts of peace never thoroughly learned. The old tribal divisions, which had never been really extinguished by Roman rule, rose from their hiding-places; and Britain was as fertile in tyrants after the Roman conquest as it was before it. But Roman rule had disarmed and enervated the people: constant foreign invasion found them constantly unprepared, and without hope or energy for resistance. They could not utilise the public works or defend the cities of their masters. So Britain was easy to be conquered in proportion as it was Romanised. A succession of calamities had diminished the population, already greatly reduced by the withdrawal of the dependents of the Romans into Gaul; and when once the invitation or the concessions of the British chiefs had given the invaders a standing-ground in the island, the occupation of the eastern half at least was accomplished in a short time¹. The middle of the fifth century is the approved date for this settlement. Kent seems to have been won by a single victory: the kingdom of Sussex was the result of the capture of Anderida; the history of Wessex is the long story of encroachments on the native people, who retired very gradually, but became stronger in resistance as they approached the mountains and the western sea, until a balance of forces compelled an armed peace². Mercia, the country of the Southern and Middle Angles, was an aggregation of many smaller settlements, each apparently the result of detached Anglian expeditions.

Its extinction.

Weakness of the Britons.

Date of the conquest.

Diversity of growth of the kingdoms.

¹ Bede, H. E. i. 13-15; Gildas, xiv, xxii; Hallam, Middle Ages, chap. viii. note iv. Kemble, Saxons, ii. 287 sq.

² See on the growth of Wessex, Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 24, 25.

Of the formation of the Northumbrian and East Anglian kingdoms we have scarcely any of those traditional data, which, whether historical or not, serve to give an individuality to the others¹. The dislocated state of Britain seems, next to its desertion by the Romans, to have made way for the conquerors. The same weak obstinacy which had failed to combine against invasion, refused to accept the new deminion; and the Saxons, merciless by habit, were provoked by the sullen and treacherous attitude of their victims. The Britons fled from their homes: whom the sword spared famine and pestilence devoured: the few that remained either refused or failed altogether to civilise the conquerors². For a century and a half after their arrival the Saxons remained heathen; for a century after their conversion they were repelled from communion with the Celts: the Britons retarded rather than promoted the religious change which the Spaniards forced on their Arian conquerors, and which Clovis voluntarily adopted to unite him with his Gallic subjects. This period, instead of being one of amalgamation was one of divarication. There was room enough for both Britons and Saxons: the Roman cities might have been homes for the one, and the woods and broad pastures have furnished the others with their favourite prospects. But the cities went to ruin; Christianity became extinct, and all culture with it. There were still Roman roads leading to the walls and towers of empty cities: the Roman divisions of the land were conspicuous: the intrenched and fortified camps, the great villas of the princely families, churches and burial places; but they were become before the days of Bede mere haunted ruins, something like the mysterious fabrics which in Central America tell of the rule of a mighty race whose name is forgotten³.

Want of union among the Britons.

Their refusal to combine with the conquerors.

General
desolation.

It is not to be supposed that this desolation was uniform: in some of the cities there were probably elements of continuous life: London, the mart of the merchants, York, the capital of the North, and some others, have a continuous political existence,

Local elements of life.

¹ Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 25, 26.

² Bede, H. E. i. 13-15; Gildas, xiv, xxii.

³ Kemble, Saxons, ii. 297.

Remains of the Britons.

although they wisely do not venture, like some of the towns of Southern France, to claim an unbroken succession from the Roman municipality. The new race found the convenience of ready-built houses and accumulated stores of material; and wherever the cities were spared, a portion at least of the city population must have continued also. In the country, too, especially towards the West and the debateable border, great numbers of Britons may have survived in servile or half-servile condition: some few of the greater men may have made, and probably did make, terms for themselves, especially in the districts appropriated by the smaller detachments of adventurers; and the public lands of the new kingdoms must have required native cultivators. But all these probabilities only bring out more strongly the improbability of any general commixture or amalgamation of the races. Centuries after the conquest the Briton by extraction was distinguished by his wergild from the man of the ruling race. It is impossible that such a commixture could have taken place without leaving its traces on the language or the religion. The English of Alfred's time is, except where the common terms of ecclesiastical language come in, purely Germanic: British Christianity stood out against Saxon for a century after the death of Augustine; and the vestiges of Romano-British law which have filtered through local custom into the common law of England, as distinct from those which were imported in the middle ages through the scientific study of law or the insensible infection of cosmopolitan civilisation, are infinitesimal.

No general mixture of races.

or of institutions:

Earlier Germanic settlements.

29. The theory that some appreciable proportion of the population of Roman Britain was already Germanic; that the Belgae¹ or Coritani or Catieuchlani² of the island might have welcomed the Saxons and Angles as distant consins, has had learned supporters, but has no basis either in fact or in probability. The Belgae of Caesar's days were Gauls, and their British kinsmen could scarcely have retained, five centuries later, any recollection of a language which their fathers, if they had ever known it, had so long forgotten. It is neither impossible nor improbable that on the northern and eastern coasts shipwrecks and piratic expeditions may have founded colonies of Germans much earlier than the beginning of history. But to base any historical theory on such contingencies is about as wise as to accept the notion that the German Saxons were a colony from English Britain¹, or that the conquerors of Britain did not come from Germany, but were a hypothetical colony from a hypothetical settlement on the Littus Saxonicum of Gaul².

¹ Palgrave, Commonwealth, pp. 26 sq.

² Kemble, Saxons, i. 9.

Not important to history.

30. Nor again can any weight be attached to the results of the careful investigation of able scholars into Welsh social antiquities, as affecting the present question³. If the agreement between the local machinery of the Welsh laws and the Anglo-Saxon usages were much closer than it has ever been shown to be; if the most ancient remains of Welsh law could be shown not to be much younger in date than the best established customs of Angle and Saxon jurisprudence; the fact would still remain that the historical civilisation is English and not Celtic. The cantred of Howel dha may answer to the hundred of Edgar, but the hundred of Edgar is distinctly the hundred of the Franks, the Alemanni and the Bavarians. If the price of life and the value of the compurgatory oath among the Welsh were exactly what they were among the Saxons, it would not be one degree less certain than it is that the wergild of the Saxons is the wergild of the Goth, the Frank, and the Lombard. The Welsh may in late times have adopted the institution from the English, or in all the nations the common features may be the signs of a common stage of civilisation; but the kinship is between the English and the German forms. The Welsh laws may be adduced for illustration and analogy, but not for historical

The parallels of Welsh and English laws not to be relied on.

¹ The old and curious inversion of the true story which appears in Rudolf, Transl. S. Alexandri, Pertz, ii. 674.

² The view propounded by Dr. A. F. H. Schaumann, Göttingen, 1845; see K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 51. The theory of Roman military colonies of German race settled in Britain at a much earlier period is not improbable, but rests on very scanty evidence: for Saxon settlements of the kind there can be of course no evidence. But the root of the false hypothesis lies in each case in the misunderstanding of the name Littus Saxonicum. See above, p. 59.

³ Much useless labour is spent by Sir F. Palgrave on this subject in the 'Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth,' to a certain extent impairing the value of that great work.

argument. However, we have no remains of such laws that are not much later than the days of Alfred.

Effect of the conquest on the new-comers.

31. If it were possible to form a clear idea of the amount of civilisation which the invaders already possessed, or of the organisation which they were to substitute for that which thus vanished before them, we should be better able to determine the effect which was produced on them by the process of conquest. But as it is, only two great generalisations seem to be possible. First, conquest under the circumstances compelled colonisation and migration. The wives and families were necessary to the comfort and continued existence of the settlements. It was not only that the attitude of the Britons forbade intermarriages; the Saxons, as all testimony has shown, declined the connubium of foreign races¹: they could not give to the strange woman the sacred prerogative of the German woman, let her cast their lots or rear their children. The tie of the cognatio and the gens was as strong as it had been of old: the new settlements were called by Gentile names, and these names involved the retention of the rights and duties of the mægth. The invaders came in families, and kindreds, and in the full organisation of their tribes: the three ranks of men, the noble, the freeman and the læt²; even the slaves were not left behind. The cattle of their native land were, it would appear, imported too: the store they set by their peculiar breeds is proved by the researches into the grave-places of the nations.

Necessity of migration.

It could scarcely be otherwise, unless we are to suppose an

¹ See above, p. 43.

² There seems to be no reason for questioning that the eorl, eorl, and læt of the earliest English laws, those of Ethelbert, answer exactly to the edhiling, the friling, and the lazzus of the old Saxons. Whether the Kentish læts were of German origin has been questioned. Lappenberg (ed. Thorpe), ii. 324, thinks that they were 'unfree of kindred race.' K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 421, thinks them a relic of ancient British population who come between the free wealth and the slave. Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, ii. 233, regards the læt of Kent as answering to the wealh of Wessex, and therefore British. The name (lazzus=slow or lazy, Grimm, R. A. pp. 305-309) signifies condition, not nationality. On the general condition of the class, see G. L. von Maurer, Hofverfg. i. 12-18, Grimm, R. A. pp. 305-309; and on their position as a part of the Saxon nationality, on which their importance as illustrating the migration depends, see above, pp. 45-47. The wer-gild of the Kentish læt was 40, 60, or 80 shillings according to rank, that of the eorl being 200.

innate propension in the adventurers for reproducing one and the same system without historical connexion under the most different circumstances. The mere settlement of predatory bands without their homes and families must have resulted in their adoption of the institutions of the natives, those natives being their superiors in civilisation: they could not have reproduced pure German life and language from mixed materials; or retained their tribal organisation so long and closely as they did, if it had been shattered at starting. It was far otherwise: the tribal identity was a reality bound down to no territorial area. The ownership of land was the outward expression rather than the basis of political freedom; and even that ownership was, under the primitive system, variable in its subject-matter, and in itself a usufruct rather than a possession. The tribe was as complete when it had removed to Kent as when it stayed in Jutland: the magistrate was the ruler of the tribe not of the soil: the divisions were those of the folk and the host, not of the land; the laws were the usages of the nation, not of the territory: and when they had found their new homes, the Angles at least left a desert behind them; for in the days of Bede the Angulus, the land between the continental Saxons and Jutes, whence the Angles came, still lay without inhabitant¹, testifying to the truth of the tradition that they had gone forth old and young, noble, gentle and simple, free and slave, their flocks and herds with them. We may fairly argue that the amount of social and political organisation which the Saxons brought with them to Britain was not less than the sum of common civilisation possessed by them and their German kinsfolk in the eighth century, and that whatever differences existed in the eighth century were due to causes which had worked in one or both of the nations since the fifth. On their arrival in Britain, then, the Saxons had their threefold division of ranks: they had the association of the township, and that of the pagus, whether or no it bore the name of hundred; some remains of the mark system of land ownership and cultivation; the principle of

The colonisation was the work of a regularly constituted body, or nation.

Amount of civilisation brought by the colonists.

¹ Bede, H. E. i. 15: 'De illa patria quae Angulus dicitur et ab eo tempore usque hodie manere desertus inter provincias Jutarum et Saxonum perhibetur.'

Expansion of older institutions.

election to public functions ; and the tie of the kindred still preserving its legal rights and duties. It is unnecessary to suppose that a migrating family exactly reproduced its old condition : it is more probable that it would seek larger scope for extension and more abundant areas of cultivation : the adventurer of the conquest might seek to found a new family of nobles : every element of society would expect advancement and expansion. But all allowance being made for this, the framework of the older custom must have been the framework of the new. No creative genius can be expected among the rude leaders of the tribes of North Germany. The new life started at the point at which the old had been broken off. Hence we can scarcely suppose that the mark system was developed, lived its life, and faded away on English soil¹; or that it is necessary to begin the story of English civilisation by comparing the state of Britain in the fifth century with that of Germany in the first. Even if old ties were, more than we need suppose likely, broken in the process of migration, the names, functions, and rights of the magistrates, the principles of customary law and local organisation, survived and took new root and grew.

Royalty one of the results of the migration.

32. But in the second place, the process of migration and conquest must have produced such changes as are traceable at the beginning of our national history. It must have produced royalty, and the important political appurtenances of royalty². The Saxons had no kings at home, but they create kingdoms in Britain. The testimony of tradition helps to confirm what is a sufficiently safe inference. According to the Chronicle the Brito-Welsh in A.D. 443 invited to Britain the Ethelings of the Angles : in A.D. 449, under two heretogas, Hengist and Horsa, the strangers came : in A.D. 455 Hengist and Aese his son came to the kingdom. In A.D. 495 'came two caldormen to Britain,

¹ The importance of this seems to have been overlooked by Kemble in his invaluable work on the Saxons in England.

² See Allen, Inquiry into the Rise and Growth of the Royal Prerogative (Lond. 1849), pp. 164, 165. Bethmann-Hollweg, Civilprocess, iv. 97, gives several instances in which the separation of a tribe, by migration, from the nation to which it belongs, is followed by the institution of royalty. See also Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 74, 75.

Cerdic and Cynric ;' in A.D. 519 they became kings of the West Saxons. In each case the erection of the throne was probably the result of some great victory, or of the permanent securing of a definite territory ; but the institution was not a transference of British royalty : the new kings are kings of the nations which they had led to conquest, not of those they had conquered¹. In each case the son is named with his father as sharing in the first assumption of the title, a recognition of the hereditary character² which is almost the only mark distinguishing the

Institution of royalty :

its hereditary character.

German kingship from the elective chieftainship. The royal houses thus founded assume a divine pedigree ; all trace their origin to Woden ; and when they become extinct the independence of their nation comes to an end. It would seem that the change of government followed almost necessarily on the creation of the new nationality ; and the example of Frank conquest may have led the Saxons to adopt the monarchic form. The nation is no longer one of a cluster of kindred nations ; it has to assert an identity that requires a distinct representation, a unity of which it has become more conscious than it was before. It can no longer safely endure divided command, it must have a king who can deal with kings. Unquestionably individual prowess and ambition determined the change, but these deeper causes must have led the people to acquiesce in it.

Its character as representing national unity.

For a hereditary king, however limited his authority may be by constitutional usage, is a stronger power than an elective magistrate : his personal interests are the interests of his people, which is in a certain sense his family : he toils for his children, but in toiling for them he works also for the people whom they will have to govern ; he has no temptation to make for himself

Advantages of hereditary royalty.

¹ The origin of royalty is regarded by Kemble as 'rooted in the German mind and institutions,' Saxons, i. 137 ; so also Bethmann-Hollweg, Civil-process, iv. 84. Allen regards it as repugnant to the genius of the Germans and as a phantom borrowed from imperial Rome (Hist. Prerog. p. 14). The common theory that it was the work of the comitatus of a successful adventurer seems to rest on a misapprehension of the nature of the comitatus.

² Bethmann-Hollweg, Civil-process, iv. 94, 96, holding that nobility gave a title to the office of princeps, questions whether the hereditary succession was peculiar to royalty, and finds the differentia of monarchy in the headship of the collective people, as above.

Superiority of the king to the ancient princeps, a reason for adopting royalty.

or them a standing-ground apart from his people. He is trusted also with greater power : he becomes the regular leader of the host, or if disabled by age, its guide and counsellor : he undertakes the maintenance of the national peace, and executes justice on the breakers of it ; his power is co-ordinate with that of the national council, not subordinate to it, or a mere part of it. Altogether his position is stronger and more dignified than that of the princeps. He enters at the same time into a share of the common stock of the historic dignities of kings. More can scarcely be affirmed until we come to ages in which we have clearer data.

CHAPTER V.

THE ANGLO-SAXON SYSTEM.

33. Anglo-Saxon system.—34. Continuity of terminology.—35. Allotment and division of land.—36. Primitive tenure.—37. Ranks and classes of men.—38. The family.—39. The township.—40. The parish.—41. Tithing and frankpledge.—42. The dependent township.—43. Court of the township.—44. The burh.—45. The hundred or wapentake.—46. The hundred court.—47. The Liberty or soken.—48. The shire.—49. The ealdorman and sheriff.—50. The shiremoot.

33. WE are scarcely justified in applying the name of system to any theoretical arrangement, by which the several notices of constitutional matters, scattered through the Anglo-Saxon histories, laws, and charters during a period of six centuries, can be harmonised. To do so would be to disregard both the development which certainly took place in the national character and organisation, and the several disturbing causes which gave to that development some part at least of its character. On the other hand, as we have scarcely any materials for determining the steps of such advance, and as at the close of the period we find only such organic differences between the common polity of the earliest and that of the latest ages as can easily be accounted for, we are at once compelled to fall back upon such a general theory, and are to a certain extent justified in the speculation. The disturbing causes, though startling, are not permanently potent; and they proceed from agencies closely analogous to those already at work in the normal action of society; the Danish conquest, and even the Norman, hastens and precipitates events that are already working to completion. But the developments themselves are not very striking¹; they are the greatest in the upper ranges of the fabric and leave the lower, in which we trace the greatest tenacity of primitive institutions, and on which the permanent continuity of the modern with the ancient English life depends for evidence, comparatively untouched. It is possible then to gather into two or three general groupings most of these features and their known developments.

The Anglo-Saxon system.

¹ See further on, Chapter VII.

Correspondence of the Latin and English terminology.

34. In attempting to draw such a sketch of the system and to trace its connexion with that of the Germania, we have the great advantage of being able to use a distinct and intelligible terminology. Hitherto we have been indebted for all our information to Latin authors whose nomenclature could not be safely regarded as more than analogous to that of the ancient Germans, and we consequently run a certain risk in arguing from their expressions as if they had an ascertained and invariable definite force. It would be at first sight somewhat rash to argue from the use of such words as princeps, dux, pagus, vicus, concilium, civitas, nobilis, and servus, either that they always involve the same idea, or that that use is altogether unaffected by their common application to Roman ideas. Is the word princeps a definite translation of some German word? is it a mere general expression, like our 'prince' or 'chieftain,' that may cover a number of merely analogous relations, or has it an implicit relation to some Roman function, having been applied to the German in consequence of some fancied resemblance? It is most fortunate for us, as we have to rely on Caesar and Tacitus, that the former was obliged by circumstances to form a clear notion of the differences of the barbarian systems with which he was brought in contact; whilst Tacitus wrote from singularly good information, and is unrivalled as a writer for clearness of perception and distinctness of expression. The confidence which we derive from their consistent and precise use of words is borne out fully when we come to the investigation of later authorities. In the Ecclesiastical History of Bede we find the very same words used and in the same senses. Bede, writing in a foreign language, would be even more likely than Caesar and Tacitus to use the same words to express the same things; and, having a great acquaintance with classical Latin, would probably use also the most approved words. The princeps, dux, nobilis, vicus of Bede are the princeps, dux, nobilis, vicus of Tacitus. A hundred and fifty years after the death of Bede his History was translated into English, most probably under the eye of Alfred; and in this translation again the same English words are used regularly and almost uniformly as giving the sense of the same Latin. As the functions of the offices thus denoted are the same in the History of Bede and in the laws of Alfred, we have a link between the primitive and the medieval systems which no criticism is strong enough or sharp enough to sever.

Link between Tacitus and Alfred.

35. The exact process by which the transference of the German institutions to Britain was effected is not recorded: nor is it necessary to suppose that it was uniform in the several states and settlements. In some cases it may have been accomplished by unconnected bands of squatters, who took possession of an uninhabited tract, and, reproducing there the local system of their native land, continued practically independent until the whole surrounding districts were organised by a central state-power. In other cases, the successful leader of a large colony or a victorious host, having conquered and exterminated the natives, must have proceeded to divide their land according to a fixed scheme. The principle of this allotment he would find in the organisation of his host. That host was the people in arms, divided into hundreds of warriors, sustained and united by the principle of kindred. When the war was over the host became again the people: the hundreds of warriors¹ would require a territory in the new land to compensate them for what they had left in the old, and this when allotted to them they would subdivide according to the divisions of the kindreds: and in such case the Anglo-Saxon village might reproduce the name, the local arrangements, the very personal relations of the German home. The isolated settlements would be then incorporated and receive a share of political rights and duties. A regular and authoritative division would prevent tribal quarrels

Uncertainty
of the exact process of colonisation.

The regular arrangements result from completed conquest.

¹ The non-existence of the territorial hundred among the continental Saxons, even if proved, does not affect the organisation of the host in hundreds. See above, p. 56.

Convenience
of a general allotment.

for the possession of the best districts, and would maintain the national strength, the military organisation which, on the hypothesis of a haphazard and independent appropriation, must have broken up and perished long before the necessity of defence was past. This principle of allotment would do no violence to the pride or ambition of a German host¹; in the time of Caesar, it was thus that the chieftains of the tribes provided for the annual resettlements of the pagi; and long after the Saxon migration, it was the rule with the Norsemen². As the Vandals in the fifth century divided pro-consular Africa³, as the Norwegians in the tenth divided Iceland⁴, as Halfdane in the ninth divided Northumbria, so in the fifth and sixth centuries the kingdoms of Wessex and Kent must have been portioned out⁵. It does not follow that the division was in exact proportion and symmetry; that every kindred contained the same number of households, or that every pagus or 'hundred' contained the same number of townships: or that the early independent settlements were reduced to an equality of area with the newer and more regularly constituted ones. The number of acres assigned to each family may well have been determined by exact rules, but the district assigned to the township as a whole may have been marked out by natural boundaries. The centenae or hundreds of the host, which in Tacitus's time had become an indefinite number, may have been still compelled to maintain a corporate completeness, and yet have occupied in peace areas of very different character and dimensions. A perfect and

Allotment
not necessarily uniform.

¹ It is unnecessary to refer to the system of tripartite division adopted by the Burgundians and other conquerors of the Roman empire on the continent, for there are no traces of such a plan in England. See on them Savigny, Röm. Recht im Mittelalter, i. 296, 300, 310, 331; Hallam, Middle Ages, i. 146; Allen, Prerogative, pp. 193-195.

² Godred divided the Isle of Man by lot; Kemble, Saxons, i. 90.

³ Gibbon, viii. 227, 228; G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. p. 72. 'Exercitui Zeugitanam vel proconsularem funiculo hereditatis divisit.' Victor Vitensis, Hist. pers. Vand. i. 4. So the tradition of Normandy, 'illam terram suis fidelibus funiculo divisit.' Dudo, p. 85; Thorpe's Lappenberz, iii. 18. The term funiculus hereditatis is borrowed from the Vulgate, Deut. xxx. 9; Ps. civ. 11.

⁴ Above, p. 56.

⁵ Mercia was partly divided the following year, Chr. Sax. A.D. 876, 877.

symmetrical division of the whole land would be possible only on the theory that the colonising people were numerous enough to occupy it. That they were not is proved by the existence of the public lands, which down to a late period form a conspicuous and peculiar feature of Anglo-Saxon polity. Ultimately no doubt a territorial arrangement of hundreds and townships did cover the land exhaustively; but that result was attained only when the personal basis of the hundred was entirely lost sight of, and the term had a geographical application only. Then the judicial organisation of one hundred extended to the borders of the next, the public lands were included within the same organisation, and the name of hundred ceased to have any numerical signification. So the inequality of the existing divisions may partly be accounted for¹.

Importance of the public lands in this point.

The existence of the classes of nobles, freemen, and læts, among the conquerors, would seem further to imply the existence of larger and smaller private estates². The extent of the land unappropriated to the simple freemen must have left it open for the new king to reward his chief followers with extensive grants, even if they did not from the first claim a larger share in the allotment. On these domains and on the public land, the læts would find their home and occupation: the remnants of the native race would find more lenient treatment than they could expect at the hands of the common freeman, and might return as cultivators to the land which had been their own. But although such estates are found existing as soon as documentary history begins, their origin cannot be safely referred to this cause only; for even if absolute equality were the rule in the original division, the extinction of families and the transfer of small estates might easily throw an accumulation of land into the hands of a single owner; and on the other hand the public land afforded a supply from which new properties might be carved continually, without any regard to size. In all respects except those resulting from ownership these estates might be, and seem to have been, regulated by the same machinery as the townships of simple freemen; but the relations

Existence of unequal estates.

The Celtic and native cultivators.

New estates cut out of the public land.

¹ See further, § 45, p. 96, below. ² Cf. Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 4.

of the cultivator of another man's land to his lord belong to another portion of our investigation.

General
theory of allotment.

The general conclusion at which we arrive is that there must have been, over a large portion of each colony, a regular allotment of land to the bodies of colonists united in their native land by the tie of blood or of neighbourhood, and for the moment represented by the divisions of the host¹; that these allotments varied according to the numbers of the kindred, the portion assigned to a single family or house being a hide of land²; that besides these the nobles or other great men received grants of estates, or perhaps attached themselves to the political centre on the condition of retaining estates which they had already appropriated; and that the surplus land remained the common property of the nation. This surplus land during a long period after the first invasion would go on increasing as the Britons were driven farther westward: after the conversion it furnished the stock from which the monasteries were endowed, and by grants to them and to individuals it was much diminished, until finally it became mere demesne of the king.

Question of primitive
tenure.

36. The question of the primary allotment leads directly to that of the primitive tenure. The possession of land was, even whilst the idea of nationality was mainly a personal one, the badge, if not the basis, of all political and constitutional right. On it depended, when the personal idea yielded to the territorial,

¹ Kemble, Saxons, i. 69-71, 125.

² On the vexed question of the extent of the hide it is not necessary here dilate; Kemble, Saxons, i. 88 sq., attempts to fix it at thirty-three acres or thereabouts, or 120 acres of a size one-fourth of the present acre. But although his argument obviates many difficulties, it opens the way for many more. The mansus, mansa, manens, castatum, terra aratri, of the charters are all interpreted to mean the same thing, although they may have had local differences. See Robertson, Historical Essays, pp. 88-102: G. L. von Maurer, Einleitg. p. 120. The later hide was no doubt 120 or 100 acres. Grimm, R. A. p. 535, gives several passages in which the German hoba is made to contain thirty or forty acres. It is possible that some of the greatest inconsistencies in the use of these words may arise from their being used to express the whole share of one man in all the fields of his village. A hide of thirty acres in a system of common cultivation would represent such an allotment in each of the cultivated areas, i.e. if there were four common fields, it would be 120 acres. But this will not explain all; and local and national peculiarities, as well as variations at different times, and differences in the quality of the land, must be taken for granted.

the rights and obligations, the rank, value and credibility of the member of the body politic; it became the basis as well as the tangible expression of his status. According to the tenure by which it was held very much of the internal and external history of the nation changes its aspect. It is wrong to suppose that an early stage of society is favourable to simplicity in determining the character of tenure and the relations dependent upon it. Simple as the origin of property may have been, we have no historical data concerning it, and when the subject does come within the ken of history, it is anything but simple and uniform. In the early Germanic system it is difficult, as we have seen, to prove the existence, except by way of inference, of any determinate property in severalty: the original gift comes from the community of which the receiver is a member, the gift is of itself mainly of the character of usufruct, the hold is ideal rather than actual; except in his own homestead the freeman can but set his foot on the soil and say, 'this is mine this year, next year it will be another's, and that which is another's now will be mine then.' It is only by way of inference that we discover that there must have been larger and smaller properties; the larger held by those who had to support a larger household, the magistrate with his comitatus, or the noble with his great train of kinsmen. Without conjecturing how the change took place, we may safely assume that, although traces still remain of common land tenure at the opening of Anglo-Saxon History, absolute ownership of land in severalty was established and becoming the rule. We may then regard the land as referable to two great divisions: that which was held by individuals in full ownership, and that of which the ownership was in the state; the intermediate case of lands held by local communities in common, and used in common by the owners of land as appurtenances to their several estate, may be for the moment put out of sight. The land held in full ownership might be either an 'ethel', an inherited or

Importance
of the character of tenure.

Absolute ownership the rule in Anglo-Saxon
times.

Private and public land.

¹ Ethel is used here on the authority of Kemble, Grimm, Maurer and other writers on land; but whenever the word occurs in history it is equivalent to 'patria,' and has no special reference to landed estate. See Bede, H. E. iii. 1, 8, 9, 28, &c. &c.; and the Anglo-Saxon Gospels.

The alod,
and book-
land.

otherwise acquired portion of original allotment; or an estate created by legal process out of the public land. Both these are included in the more common term 'alod'¹; but the former looks for its evidence in the pedigree of its owner or in the witness of the community, while the latter can produce the charter or book by which it is created, and is called 'bocland'². As the primitive allotments gradually lost their historical character, as the primitive modes of transfer became obsolete, and the use of written records took their place, the ethel is lost sight of in the bookland³. All the land that is not so accounted for is foleland, or public land; it comprised the whole area that was not at the original allotment assigned to individuals or communities, and that was not subsequently divided into estates of bookland. The folkland was the standing treasury of the country: no alienation of any part of it could be made without the consent of the national council; but it might be allowed to individuals to hold portions of it subject to rents and other services to the state, from which the owners of bookland were exempt, except in the three cases of the fyrð or military service, the repair of bridges, and the maintenance of fortifications⁴. These estates of folkland

Public or
folkland.

The 'trinoda necessitas.'

¹ The word alod does not occur in Anglo-Saxon documents before the eleventh century, when it appears in the Latin of Canute's laws in the Colbertine MS. as the equivalent of bôcland or hereditas. Schmid, Gesetze, &c. p. 261.

² The different explanations of folkland and bookland, given at different periods, are collected by Schmid, Gesetze, &c. p. 538. Spelman thought that bookland implied a written title, whilst folkland was based on the witness of the people. Verelius interpreted bookland as feudal; Phillips thought bookland feudal, and folkland alodial; and was followed by Grimm and Gaupp. Even Palgrave connected folkland with the odal, and bookland with lænland. On the other hand, Somner, Lambard, Lye, and other antiquaries, considered bookland to be freehold held under charter, folkland to be held at the will of the lord. The view now accepted was established by Allen, On the Prerogative, pp. 125-153; Kemble, Saxons, i. 289; K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 69, 107; Hallam, Middle Ages, ii. 406-410; Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 4.

³ Bôcland is the term used in Alfred's Bode as equivalent to possessio or possessiumcula. Bôclanda ahte is possessions praediorum. H. E. iii. 24. In the Latin of Alfred's laws (art. 41), it is terra hereditaria; in Athelstan, vi. 1, it is terra testamentalis; in Edgar, ii. 2, it is feudum; in Ethelred, I. i. 14, libera terra; in Canute, i. 11, hereditas or alodium, though the passage is a mere re-enactment of Edgar, ii. 2 (feudum); in Canute, ii. 77, terra hereditaria; in other places the vernacular is retained.

⁴ The trinoda necessitas first appears in genuine Anglo-Saxon charters about the beginning of the eighth century. It occurs however earlier in may have been for a life or lives, or subject to testamentary disposition, according to the terms of the grant; but the ownership continued to reside in the state, and the proceeds to furnish the revenue. The folkland was, although in strict analogy with the common lands of the township in the mark system, peculiar to England¹; in the other Germanic kingdoms there seems to have been no difference between the royal demesne and the other lands of the nation. Here the king himself could not appropriate a part of the folkland without the consent of the witenagemot.

Folkland, distinct from royal estate.

Either bookland or folkland could be leased out by its holders; and, under the name of *tenland*², held by free cultivators: the greater owners could so let their distant estates to hereditary dependents, such as laets and freedmen, whilst their home farm was cultivated by hired labourers or by slaves. The multiplicity of ranks in the cultivating classes, which was thus engendered, according to the legal status of the individual, his relation to the landlord, the extent or character of his holding, and the nature of his service, produced the somewhat bewildering nomenclature

Diversity of tenant-cultivators.

disputed ones, e.g. A.D. 616, Cod. Dipl. deccccxxxiii. It is mentioned in the act of the council of Clovesho of A.D. 742, Councils, &c. iii. 341; and in a charter of Ethelbald, issued at Godmundesleah in A.D. 749, ibid. p. 386. It occurs two or three times in charters of Offa, more frequently in those of Kenulf, and becomes very general after the time of Egbert. The corresponding obligations in the Frank empire are attendance on the host, repairing of roads, fortifications, and bridges, and watch. Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 30, 31. This is called by Charles the Bald 'antiquam et aliarum gentium consuetudinem;' and although first traceable on the continent in the reign of Charles the Great, is probably much older in custom; but the arguments which refer it to Roman origin want both congruity and continuity. The nearest approach to it is in a law of A.D. 423, in the code of Justinian, xi. 7. § 4: 'igitur ad instructiones reparationesque itinerum pontiumque nullum genus hominum nulliusque dignitatis ac venerationis meritis cessare oportet.' Mr. Coote, in his 'Neglected Fact,' has argued with great learning and ingenuity for the Roman origin: he refers further to Code viii. 12, §§ 7, 12, 18. Cf. Pearson, Middle Ages, i. 266; Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, ii. 337.

¹ The Lombards had public or state lands, the disposal of which was at the pleasure of the king. The Vandals gave their king a separate allotment of very great extent. Among the Franks and other conquering races all the land not in private hands was royal property. Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 239, 240; Sohn, Fr. R. G. V. i. 31-34.

² Kemble, Saxons, i. 310-326; K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 104-107. Probably folkland let out at rent was called gafol-land, but the term may have extended to all lands for which rent or taxation in lieu of service was taken. See Robertson, Historical Essays, pp. 102-112.

that meets us in Domesday-book ; and these have an importance of their own in social history.

Question of freedom.

37. There is no department of Anglo-Saxon law which presents greater difficulties, or has been more variously viewed, than that of status. In one aspect all men are free except the slave pure and simple who is his master's chattel. In another all are unfree except the fully qualified freeman, the owner of land for which he owes no dependence on another¹ ; all who stand in the relations of personal dependence, however entered and however terminable, are regarded as unfree. The former view appears the more simple and true.

Slavery a
primitive
institution.

It cannot be denied that slavery in the strictest sense was an early, if not a primitive, institution of the race. Tacitus knew that the slave had no remedy against the violence of his master ; even his life could be taken with impunity. And in the earliest English laws such slaves are found ; the *theow*² or slave simple, whether wealh—that is, of British extraction captured or purchased,—or of the common German stock descended from the slaves of the first colonists : the *esne*³ or slave who works for hire ; the *wite-theow*⁴ who is reduced to slavery because he cannot pay his debts ; the man who has sold himself or his children to avoid starvation⁵ ;

Classes of
slaves.

¹ Savigny, R. R. i. 235. This is Kemble's view (Saxons, i. 122 sq.), but seems to be exaggerated by him beyond reasonable dimensions. He treats the wife and son as unfree in relation to the father, as being in his mund. K. Maurer however lays it down as a principle that 'only the free can stand in mund: the unfree can stand only in possession' (gewere = seizin). Bethmann-Hollweg explains the mund as covering the relations of lord and unfree as well as husband and wife, father and child. Civil-process, iv. 11. Waitz thinks it best to describe the dependent class (Hörige, kets, &c.) as neither free nor unfree. D. V. G. i. 176. See K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 405 sq. ; Sohm, Fr. R. G. V. i. 359.

² Theow, from the same root as dienen, to serve ; Grimm, R. A. p. 303 ; Schmid, Gesetze, &c. p. 669.

³ Esne (Gothic asneis), an unfree hireling. Grimm, R. A. p. 304. Kemble, Saxons, i. 215, considers the esne as superior in position to the theow. See, however, Schmid, Gesetze, &c. p. 568, who regards vir, juvenis, as the original meaning.

⁴ Wite-theow, possibly the man who is reduced to slavery as not able to pay the fines by which the breach of the peace is redeemed ; so that he is in a state of penal servitude. See Schmid, Gesetze, &c. p. 679 ; K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 409.

⁵ There is in Kemble, C. D. decccxxv, a manumission of several men who had 'bowed their heads for meat in the evil days.' Theodore's Penitential (Councils, &c. iii. 202) allows this voluntary servitude.

the slave who works in his master's house and the slave who works on the farm : all are regarded as a part of the stock of their owner and are valued according to their importance to him : their offences against a third person he must answer for, as for the mischief done by his cattle : they have no wey-gild, no credibility, no legal rights ; wrongs done to them are regarded as done to their master. In some respects the practice of the law is better than the theory : the slave is entitled to his two loaves a day¹, and his holydays are secured to him² ; he can purchase his freedom with savings³ which in some unexplained way the law has allowed him to keep, and the spiritual law can enforce a penance on the master for illtreating him. But his status descends to his children ; all his posterity, unless the chain is broken by emancipation, are born slaves⁴.

The slave is his owner's chattel.

Slavery hereditary.

If the status of the free be held to include all who have legal rights, the class may be divided, first, into those who have land of their own, and those who have not. Of the former the law can take immediate cognisance, they have a tangible stake in the community through which the law can enforce its obligations. Of the latter it can take cognisance only mediately, through some person whom the law can touch, and they are therefore compelled to put themselves in dependence on some one with whom it can deal as answerable for their forthcoming. The relation of dependence on a lord may however be entered into by a free landowner for the sake of honour or protection⁵.

The fully free : landed or landless.

The landless man must have a lord.

¹ 'Seven hundred and twenty loaves, besides morning meals and noon meals.' Dialogue of Salomon and Saturn, ap. Kemble, Saxons, i. 38.

² By Ini's law a slave working on Sunday at his master's command became free (Ini, § 3). See also Canute, Sec. 45 ; Ethelred, vii. 2, § 2 ; Alfred, § 43 ; Theodore, Penit. ii. 13, § 3. 'Non licet homini a servo tollere pecuniam quam ipse labore suo adquisierit.' Councils, &c. iii. 202.

³ Kemble, C. D. mecceli : a slave buys his own liberty of the abbot of Bath ; others buy their own children. See also decccxxxiv, &c.

⁴ On Anglo-Saxon slavery see Kemble, Saxons, i. 185-225 ; Sharon Turner, Hist. Ang.-Sax. ii. 96-102.

⁵ This practice is traceable throughout Anglo-Saxon history from the hlafeta, the bread-eater of the hlaford or bread-giver (Ethelb. § 24), to the liber homo of Domesday, 'terram tenens et quo vellet abire valens,' who 'summisit se in manu Walterii pro defensione sua' ; i. 36. But the practice of commendation in England was generally the result of the police organisation, not of the land system. See Chapter VII below ; Gueist, Self-government, i. 42 ; Verwaltungsrecht, i. 11, 12.

Classes of dependent freemen.

The dependent class thus includes a great variety of relations; the comitatus or personal following of the king or ealdorman; all freemen hired as household servants or field labourers; the rent-paying tenants of other men's lands; and the hereditary dependents who have personal rights, the læts and the freedmen: the landless, the homeless, the kinless, must all seek a lord whose protection is to be secured by voluntary service, who is responsible for their appearance in the law courts, and who in some cases exercises an actual jurisdiction over them¹.

Classes of landed free-
men.

The fully qualified freeman who has an estate of land, may be of various degrees of wealth and dignity, from the ceorl with a single hide, to the thegn with five hides, a place in the king's hall, a bell-house and burh-geat seat; to the still more powerful man who has 'thriven to ceorl-right,' or who has his forty hides²; to the ealdorman and the etheling. He may be a simple husbandman or the lord of a soken and patron of hundreds of servants and followers. The cross division according to blood and werigild

¹ Konrad Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 415 sq. The law of Athelstan, ii. § 2, is as follows: 'Et diximus de illis, qui dominos non habent, de quibus rectum difficile conquiritur aut nullum; praeceptatur cognationi eorum ut eos ad rectum adducat et dominum eis inveniatur in conventu publico.' Maurer points to the Edictum Pistense of Charles the Bald as a parallel (A.D. 864), § 6: 'Quidam leves homines de istis comitatibus qui devastati sunt a Nortmannis, in quibus res et mancipia et domos habuerunt, quia nunc mancipia et domos non habent, quasi licenter malum faciunt; et quia non habent domos ad quas secundum legem maniri et banniri possint, dicunt quod de manitione vel bannitione legibus comprobari et legaliter judicari non possunt.' The count is therefore to send a missus into the district and 'si necesse fuerit ipse in forbannum mittatur qui ad justitiam reddendam venire noluerit.' Athelstan's law continues 'et si hoc efficere nolit vel non possit, ad terminum sit ille forbannitus deinceps.' the parallel seems more than accidental, although the remedial measures are different. In Iceland every one who is not himself settled as a peasant proprietor must choose himself a domicile (gríð.) Maurer, p. 427. The Capitulum of A.D. 847, 'Volumus etiam ut unusquisque liber homo in nostro regno seniores qualem voluerit in nobis et in nostris fidelibus accipiat,' merely gives the liberty of choosing a lord, does not enforce it as a duty. Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 234. The Capitula Lombardorum afford a better parallel: 'Et quia sunt nonnulli qui sine proprietatibus in regno nostro degentes iudicia comitum effugiunt, atque non habentes res aut substantiam quibus constringi possint, ideo circumquaque malitias exercere non cessant, de illis nobis placuit ut ipsi eum quibus videntur manere aut eos praesentent aut pro eorum malefactorum rationem reddant.' Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 363.

² Ranks; Schmid, Gesetz, &c. p. 389.

affects both classes of the free : the noble may be forced to have a lord, the ceorl having land may dispense with one. The eorlcundman is worth his high wergild even if he be landless : the ceorl may attain to thegn-right and yet his children to the third generation will not be gesithcund¹. But there is no impassable barrier between the classes : the ceorl may become thegn-worthy, and the thegn eorl-worthy². And there are gradations in every class ; four ranks of the eorlcund, and three of the læts ; three even of the household slaves³. The great distinction however is that of wealth, the landless ceorl is little better off than the slave, except that he may choose his own master.

Gradation of classes.

38. The primary element which the law regards is the land-owning freeman ; the first relation in which he stands is that of the family⁴. The political importance of the tie of kindred is prehistoric : the early Germans were associated in families for the service of the host and for the occupation and cultivation of land, but the family had no jurisdiction over its own members, nor any representation in the state. So also in England, it is probable that all the primitive villages in whose name the patronymic syllable ing occurs were originally colonised by communities united either really by blood or by the belief in a common descent⁵ : but the legal relations were for most purposes merged

Importance of the family relation in England as in Germany.

¹ Wer-gilds, Schmid, Gesetze, p. 399.

² Ibid. p. 389.

³ Laws of Ethelbert, § 75, mentions four classes of the eorlcund ; § 26, three classes of læts ; §§ 11 and 16, three classes of theows.

⁴ K. Maurer, Kritische Ueberschau, i. 52-62. The view of Kemble (Saxons, i. 234 sq.) seems to exaggerate the political importance of the magburh, at least if it refers to Anglo-Saxon institutions however early. See also Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, ii. 309-340 : where likewise far too much latitude of conjecture is taken. As for the importance of the principle in the development of the German state-system generally, the views of Sybel are combated by Waitz, Das Alte Recht, pp. 126, 127 ; Deutsche Verfassungs-Geschichte, i. 50-56 sq., and rejected by K. Maurer, Kritische Ueberschau, i. 61. It is true that in the nomad state the family bond is the only trustworthy one, but the Germans had passed that stage when they entered history. Still there are sufficient vestiges of the prior importance of the principle to make the inquiry valuable.

⁵ On this and on its connexion with the Mark system see Kemble, Saxons, i. 58 sq. and Appendix A.

already in those of the township or the mark, and the political weight of the kindred was accidental only. Yet significant traces of the old importance of the bond remain: as in the Germania the kindred have a share in the fines paid for the wrongs of their kinsman¹, so in England the mægth share in the wergild paid for their slain brother, and contribute to the payment for one whom their brother has slain²; they are the legal compurgators for one another³ in accusation or defence, they are bound to protect their kinsman in his minority⁴, to seek a lord and find a home for him if he is lordless or homeless⁵. All these however are legal rather than constitutional obligations.

Duties of the kin.

The township.

39. The unit of the constitutional machinery, the simplest form of social organisation, is the township, the villata or *vicus*⁶. It may represent the original allotment of the smallest subdivision of the free community, or the settlement of the kindred colonising on their own account, or the estate of the great proprietor who has a tribe of dependents. Its headman is the tun-gerefa, who in the dependent townships is of course nominated by the lord⁷,

¹ Tac. Germ. c. 21.

² For the share of the kindred in the receipt see Schmid, Gesetze, p. 394; for their share in the payment, Alfred, §§ 27, 28; Edmund, ii. 7, &c.

³ Laws of the Northumbrian Priests, § 51; Hen. I, 64, § 4.

⁴ Hlothere and Eadric, § 6.

⁵ Athelstan, ii. § § 2, 8.

⁶ Tūn, viculus, vicus, Bede, H. E. iii. 17; tūn-scipe, vicus, v. 10; tūn-gerefa, villicus, iv. 24, v. 10; tūn-scipe, Edgar, iv. 8; tūnes-man, ibid. iv. 8, 13. The tūn is originally the enclosure or hedge, whether of the single farm or of the enclosed village, as the burh is the fortified house of the powerful man. The corresponding word in Norse is garðr, our garth or yard. The equivalent German termination is haim, our ham; the Danish form is by (Norse bū=German bau). Some inferences might be drawn from these differences as to the contrasts of early colonisation. See Grimm, R. A. p. 534. The notion of the dorf or thorpe seems to stand a little further from the primitive settlement.

⁷ Athelstan, iii. § 7: 'Si tunc sit aliquis qui tot homines habeat, quod non sufficiat omnes custodire, praeponat sibi singulis villis praepositum unum, &c.' On the origin of the word gerefa, see Max Müller's Lectures on Language, ii. 281. It has been regarded generally as the same word with the German graf, and derived from grau, grey=senior, but many other explanations have found favour; Grimm connected it with vivo, tignum, tectum, and interpreted it as comes, socius, the inmate of the same house; Spelman connected it with rafan, to plunder, and thus accounted for the Latin word cractor used to translate it; Kemble with rófan or réfán, to call aloud, making it originally mean the bannitor or proclaimer of the court; Richthofen derives it from the Greek γράφω; and other

but in the independent ones may have been originally a chosen officer, although when the central power has become stronger he may be, as in the Frank villa, the nominee of the king, or his officer. The internal organisation in both cases seems to have been much the same, for the dependent communities had probably in most instances been originally free, and reduced to dependence by a powerful neighbour; or were composed of his tenants who entered into the rights and duties of men whose estates their lord had purchased or accumulated by inheritance.

Free and dependent townships.

This corporate unity is subjected to changes both by way of development and under legislative action. In its earlier stage it may have been the community of free and kindred cultivators, or what is called the *mark*¹. It cannot be safely affirmed that the German settlers in Britain brought with them the entire system of the mark organisation, or that that system was ever in Anglo-Saxon times the basis of local administration. The comparative rarity of the word, whether in laws and charters or in local names, forbids the idea of such completeness, universality, or fundamental constitutional significance². But of such an

Relation of the mark to the township.

derivations are also imagined. Max Müller would not 'be at all surprised if the Anglo-Saxon gerefa turned out to be etymologically unconnected with the German graf' (Lectures, ii. 284), and this is so far probable, that whereas the fundamental, universal and permanent idea of the gerefa is stewardship, the graf is not, so far as appears, a steward at all, but primarily and universally a magistrate. If then they are the same word, the English application seems to be most primitive, and there is at least one link missing between it and the graf.

¹ Kemble has the credit of being the first to recognise the applicability to English history of the results of German investigations into the mark system: but with his usual tendency to exaggeration. Since he wrote, the whole subject has been worked out by Dr. G. L. von Maurer in several works: the most important results of which for the history of early society agree with the view of Dr. Waitz in the Deutsche Verfassungs-Geschichte. Sir Henry Maine, on Village Communities, and Dr. Nasse, on The Land-Community of the Middle Ages, have some important remarks on the English side of the subject: which is also illustrated in a curious Essay by William Maurer, published at Manchester in 1855. Dr. Gneist, Self-government, i. 2, goes too far in regarding the expenditure of learned investigation on this part of the subject as unfruitful, but he is undoubtedly right in refusing to recognise the Mark as the basis of our polity. See too Schmid, Gesetze, p. 630; Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 61.

² Kemble ascribes the rarity of the term to the fact that 'the system founded upon what it represents yielded in England earlier than in Germany to extraneous influences.' Saxons, i. 36. The word occurs in charters—e.g. Cod. Dipl. dcxxxiii—in the full signification; but more

Traces of
the mark,

institution there are distinct traces. We nowhere see the qualification of the freeman for political right depending on a partnership in tenure and cultivation of common land. It may have been the case very early, but it is more probable that the settlers had passed beyond this stage before they migrated. Yet in the nomenclature of the villages the same significant syllable that points to the idea of cognatio points equally to the mark: and what is indisputable, the existence of the common system of cultivation, and of common lands belonging in usufruct to the members of the township, prove the abiding influence of the mark principle¹. Community of land and joint action in cultivation might exist without forming the basis of the political unity of the community: it cannot be shown to have precluded the possession of private estate among the sharers of it, and in its later forms it appears merely as an appendage to such private possession. Common lands of manors and townships exist at the present day, and, within a century, common cultivation also existed in many parts of England. It is to this system that the origin of some part of the machinery of local courts of the manor and township which still exist may be traced². The right of the markmen to determine whether a new settler should be admitted to the township exists in the form of admitting a tenant at the court baron and customary court of every manor³; the right of the markmen to determine the by-laws⁴, the local arrangement for the common husbandry, or the fencing of the

in the commons,

and in the court baron
of the manor.

generally as a simple boundary. The 'mercemot,' mentioned in Cod. Dipl. dlxviii, is referred by Kemble to the place where the markmoot was held, Saxons, i. 55. Schmid, Gesetze, p. 631, gives some other passages where the word mark occurs, but it is not found in the full sense in the laws.

¹ Ini, § 42: 'If ceorls have a common meadow, or other partible land to fence, and some have fenced their part, some have not, and [strange catle come in and] eat up the common corn or grass, let those go who own the gap and compensate to the others.' The common wood, 'commune silva quam nos Saxonice in gemennisse dicimus,' is mentioned in a charter of Ethelwulf, Cod. Dipl. ii. 1; the common land, 'gemanan lande,' ib. iv. 326.

² Kemble, Saxons, i. 54; Maine, Village Communities, pp. 138-140; and W. Maurer's Essay.

³ See Kemble, Saxons, i. 54. That the markmoot was a court of justice, as Kemble conjectures, seems altogether improbable.

⁴ Nelson, Lex Maneriorum, pp. 54-58.

hay-fields¹, or the proportion of cattle² to be turned into the common pasture, exists still in the manorial courts and in the meetings of the townships: the very customs of relief and surrender which are often regarded as distinctly feudal, are remnants of the polity of the time when every transfer of property required the witness of the community, to whose membership the new tenant was thereby admitted. Still between all this and the enjoyment of political rights there is no immediate connexion. It is as an owner of land, not as a member of the mark-community, that the freeman has rights and duties, and there is no evidence that in England the only way of owning land was the membership of the mark.

The historical township has outgrown the mark.

The historical township is the body of alodial owners who have advanced beyond the stage of land-community, retaining many vestiges of that organisation; or the body of tenants of a lord who regulates them or allows them to regulate themselves on principles derived from the same.

40. In a further stage the township appears in its ecclesiastical form as the parish³ or portion of a parish, the district assigned to a church or priest; to whom its ecclesiastical dues and generally also its tithes are paid. The boundaries of the parish and the township or townships with which it coincides, are generally the same: in small parishes the idea and even name of township is frequently, at the present day, sunk in that of the parish; and all the business that is not manorial is dispatched in vestry meetings, which are however primarily meetings of the township for church purposes.

The township as a district of a priest; the parish.

41. The name of tithing, which in some parts of England still replaces that of township as the unit of local administration, and which occurs as early as the time of Edgar⁴, must be

The Tithing.

¹ Nasse, Land Community, ed. Ouvry, pp. 17, 18 sq.; G. L. von Maurer, Dorfverfassg. i. 358.

² Nelson, Lex Maneriorum, pp. 59, 67.

³ Pearson, Early and Middle Ages, i. 251; Toulmin Smith, The Parish. On the formation of parishes see below, Chapter VIII. The 'Church of a town' is mentioned by Bede, H. E. v. 12.

⁴ In the Judicia civitatis Lundoniae, Ath. vi. 2, 8, § 1, it is not a local but a personal association of ten. See Chapter XI below. Edgar, i. 2, 4, mentions the tithingman as taking part in the action of the hundred in matter of theft. It is curious that teothung should be ordinarily used for an

Origin of the term
Tithing.

understood to represent a subdivision of the hundred. Naturally the word would mean the tenth part of the larger division, and if an instance were forthcoming of the historical introduction of the hundred, or the colonisation of a border territory, it would probably be found that the hundred and tithing were measured in proper proportion. But as this cannot be done, it is safer to allow to the tithing the same laxity of interpretation that Tacitus allowed to the hundred. It is however quite possible that the term was a relic of the same system that the hundred itself represents¹, and that it was revived for police and fiscal purposes, as a personal as well as a territorial division, ultimately sinking its functions, and, except in some of the western counties, the name also, in those of the township². It would thus mark a stage in the process by which the personal organisation of the free people passed into the territorial system. But the name of tithing has been very commonly applied both by association of ten, as the only whole of which the tithing is ten must be the hundred; and if, as generally believed, the Anglo-Saxon hundred was the long one of six score, the tithing ought to have contained twelve; and Fleta speaks of the frankpledges as dozeins. The only other place where the tithing occurs is in the Secular law of Canute, § 20. Palgrave, Commonwealth, pp. cxxi-cxxvi.

¹ The decanus and decania, or decuria, occur in the organisation of the host, in the laws of the Visigoths and Bavarians; and in connexion with the police system in the Lombard laws also. The decanus in Frank law is the lowest officer in the host, or in police administration; but nowhere is there any trace of a division of land connected with the number. The Frank host recognised the contubernium of ten men, but there is no certainty that this was connected with the decanus. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 458-473. Cf. Gneist, Self-government, i. 9; Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 199.

² Tithings at present exist in Somersetshire and Wiltshire; and according to Pearson (Maps, 52) in Gloucestershire and Worcestershire, and in all counties south of the Thames (except Kent and Cornwall), where they answer to the townships of other counties. Pearson, Middle Ages, i. 250, says, 'Ten families constituted a tithing, the self-governing unit of the state which is now represented among us by the parish, and ten tithings were a hundred.' Robertson, Hist. Essays, p. lxx, also uses the word as generally equivalent to township. It is however very rash to adopt any such generalisation. Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 51, 59, alleges that the word is not found in Domesday, and rejects the territorial application of it. Palgrave (p. cxxi.) gives instances of both personal frankpledges and local tithings in the reign of Henry III: the former from Kent and Warwickshire, the latter from Devon. He also suggests that the local tithings in the West may have been remains of the British divisions of Cantreds and Trefs. Mr. Pearson says that the hundreds of Devon generally contain about ten parishes, and infers thence the original identity of the parish with the tithing.

historical writers and in legal custom to denote a different idea, the association of ten men in common responsibility legally embodied in the frithborh or frankpledge.

This institution¹, of which there is no definite trace before the Norman Conquest, is based on a principle akin to that of the law which directs every landless man to have a lord who shall answer for his appearance in the courts of law. That measure, which was enacted by Athelstan², was enlarged by a law of Edgar³, who required that every man should have a surety who should be bound to produce him in case of litigation, and answer for him if he were not forthcoming. A law of Canute⁴ re-enacts this direction, in close juxtaposition with another police order; namely, that every man shall be in a hundred and in a tithing: where the reference is probably to the obligation of the hundred and the tithing to pursue and do justice on the thief. The laws of Edward the Confessor, a compilation of supposed Anglo-Saxon customs issued in the twelfth century, contain a clause on which the later practice of frankpledge is founded, but which seems to originate in the confusion of the two clauses of the law of Canute. By this article, which describes itself as a comparatively recent enactment⁵, all men are bound to combine themselves in associations of ten, to which the name of frith-borh is given in the South, and that of tenmannetale in the North of England. Each association has a headman, a 'capital pledge,' borhs-ealdor or frith-borge-head, to manage the business of the ten. Thus constituted, they are standing sureties for one another: if one break the law, the

The frith-borh or frankpledge.

Principle of pledges.

The accepted law of the frankpledge.

¹ On this subject a great literature exists, which may be seen summed up in Waitz, D. V. G. i. 424-473; Schmid, Gesetze, pp. 646-648; K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 87-96; Gneist, Verwaltgsr. i. 166; Self-government, i. 26 sq. Palgrave (Commonwealth, p. 196 sq. and notes), who anticipates most of the later arguments, refers the institution to Canute. See Hallam, M.A. ii. 289.

² Athelstan, ii. 2. If a reeve dare not warrant any of his lord's men, the suspected man must find twelve pledges among his kindred, who shall stand in security for him, ibid. iii. 7, § 2. This looks like a frankpledge, but probably is a variety of the purgatory obligation of the kin.

³ Edgar, iii. 6; iv. 3.

⁴ Canute, ii. 20; Gneist, Self-government, i. 26.

⁵ Edw. Conf. § 19; Select Charters, p. 74.

Law of frankpledge.

Possibly of the date of the Conquest.

Continued existence in court leet.

other nine shall hold him to right; if they cannot produce him, the capital pledge with two of his fellows, and the head men and two others out of each of the three nearest frith-borhs, are to purge their association of complicity in the flight of the criminal, or to make good the mischief he has done. The association of the ten is called also the tithing¹, and the 'capital pledge' the tithing-man. Whether before the Conquest this union or confusion to the two distinct ideas had taken the form of a law, there is nothing to show: and the word frankpledge is used in the so-called laws of the Conqueror simply for the surety²; but it is probable from the view of his legislation in the case of murder, by which the responsibility of producing the criminal was laid on the hundred³, that a kindred measure of universal application may have then been introduced, and that thus the mutual responsibility of the frankpledge was imported into the English law. The 'view of frankpledge,' the business of seeing that these associations were kept in perfect order and number and of enforcing the same by fine, was one of the agenda of the local courts, and became ultimately, with the other remunerative parts of petty criminal jurisdiction, a manorial right exercised in the courts leet, where it still exists⁴. It was made one way of maintaining the practice of local representation: the capital pledge and a portion of his tithing taking the duty of appearing for their township or berewic in the popular courts⁵; and thus again the ideas of the township and the tithing come

¹ Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 392; Palgrave, Commonwealth, pp. 196 sq.

² William, i. 25, 52.

³ Ibid. iii. 3

⁴ Palgrave (Commonwealth, pp. 202, exxiii) asserts that the view of frankpledge did not exist in the 'shires which constituted the ancient kingdom of Northumbria,' and gives reference to records to prove that it was not general in Mercia in the reign of Henry III. However this may have been, it is certainly found in Yorkshire at the present day. The exceptions may be perhaps accounted for on the ground of the inhabitants of exempt districts being under the pledge of the lord of the soil at the time of the institution. But the question is obscure. Cf. Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 178. But tenmentale in Richmondshire, which in Henry II's reign was an extent of 14 carucates, paid 4s. 7d. as an annual tax. Gale, Reg. Hon. de Richmond, p. 22.

⁵ Customs of Kent, Statutes of the Realm, i. 223. The borghesaldor and four men appeared for each township in the court of the justices in Eyre; each borough however was represented by twelve men.

into connexion. It is in this point that the frankpledge has its chief historical importance. It has been very much exaggerated; some writers having even gone so far as to make it a common institution of the whole German race, and possibly the basis of political combination: by others again, it has been regarded as a form of guild¹; and as a substitute for, or development of, the principle of the accountability of the kindred for *wergild*². These views and others equally speculative, may be safely discarded: there is no trace of any similar institution on the Continent, or, even in England, earlier than the middle of the twelfth century, although, as has been said, the enactment of the law would be not strange to the legislation of the Conqueror.

Exaggeration of the importance of the frankpledge.

42. To return however to the township. Besides its character as representing the principle of the mark, and forming the basis of the parish, the township has a share in the creation of the later territorial jurisdiction of the manor: and those early townships which were founded on the land of a lord, are in many respects much the same as manors³. The lord exercised in both the functions depending on the free possession of the land

The township as the manor.

¹ The gegildan who are mentioned in the laws on which this theory is built, are the associates or companions of strangers; and furnish no evidence of any institution of the kind for collective responsibility. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 432-438. The guilds themselves had quite a different object. See the next note and Chapter XI below.

² The importance of the subject of frankpledge is much exaggerated owing to the extraordinary variety of views that have been entertained upon it. It is obvious that associations of ten men may be embodied (1) as in a guild for mutual help and obtaining of redress; (2) in police organisation, to join in the pursuit of a thief who has robbed and may be concealed within their neighbourhood: this is supposed to be the character of the decima or decenna when mentioned in connection with the hundred; (3) as a compulsory organisation of collective responsibility as in the frankpledge.

³ Ordericus Vitalis (lib. iv. c. 7) regarded the township and the manor as identical: 'villas quas a manendo manerios vulgo vocamus.' Palgrave seems to hold that nearly all townships in Anglo-Saxon times were under the rule of a lord, Commonwealth, p. 65: 'Every Anglo-Saxon township was subject in demesne to a superior, to the sovereign whether king or ealdorman, who succeeded to the very extensive possessions of the British princes; or to a lord,—hlaford, or landrica. In some few instances the township belonged to small corporations, if such a term may be used, whose members held the township as a joint property;' the reference in the last case being apparently to the alodiaries of Domesday.

Original and created jurisdiction of the manor.

which in the free community belonged to all the townsmen, and likewise a jurisdiction in civil and criminal suits, which, with all the profits,—for in early times the pecuniary interests of justice formed no small part of the advantages of judicial power,—was conferred on him by the original gift, and removed from the cognisance of the hundred. In consequence of this system, the exact development of which belongs to a later stage of our inquiry, some part of the business properly belonging to the township is dispatched in the manorial courts, varied of course by local custom and the terms of particular grants.

The assen-
sibly of the township.

43. In all these forms and relations the townsmen retain their right of meeting and exercising some sorts of jurisdiction, although, until the criminal jurisdiction in court leet comes to the lords of manors by special grant, their participation in such matters is of the character simply of police-agency. Their assemblies are rather gemots or meetings than proper courts¹; for any contentious proceedings amongst men so closely connected and so few in number must have been carried immediately to the hundred court. But they may be safely understood to have had the power of making their own by-laws: the word by-law itself is said to mean the laws enacted by the township, the 'by' of the Northern shires²: the gemot also elected its own officers, possibly the gerefa and the *byllef*³; it arranged the representation of its interests in the courts of the hundred and the shire, where the gerefa and four best men appeared for the township; it carried out the requisitions of the higher courts in the way of taxes and other exactions, the pursuit of criminals and the search for stolen goods⁴; on the institution of the frankpledge it prepared the tithing lists for the view of the officers.

The by-laws.

Election of

¹ The tunscipemot occurs in a charter of Richard I; Eyton, Shropshire, iii. 237.

² Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 80: he quotes Jornandes for the use of the word 'bellagines' in the same sense; de Rebus Geticis, c. 2.

³ The usual custom after the Conquest and still. Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 82. The tithingman is of course an elective officer. The idea that he was a sort of village magistrate is without basis; although in a simple community of peasants the office of a constable, for such seems to have been the position of the tithingman, was held in more honour than it is now. See Hallam, M. A. ii. 282.

⁴ Hlothere and Eadric, § 5; Edgar, iv. §§ 8, 13; Ethelred, iii. § 15.

sheriff. In the dependent townships some of these functions devolved on the lord's steward, or nominated gerefa, as the delegate of the master on whom the original gift had conferred the power of enforcing these sections of jurisdiction: but the actual process must have been much the same as in the freer communities, if we may judge by the common law of the later manors where the suitors are judges in court baron still¹.

Similar process in dependent townships.

As the national customs which belong to the lowest range of machinery are subject to the fewest organic changes, these courts have continued to exist until the present day. In the vestry-meeting the freemen of the township, the ratepayers, still assemble for purposes of local interest, not involved in the manorial jurisdiction; elect the parish officers, properly the township officers,—for there is no primary connexion between the maintenance of roads and collection of taxes and the parish as an ecclesiastical unity,—the churchwardens, the waywardens, the assessors, and the overseers of the poor. In the courts of the manor are transacted the other remaining portions of the old township jurisdiction; the enforcing of pains and penalties on the breakers of by-laws; the election of the capital-pledges of frankpledges, of *plebiscitarii*² or by-law men, aletasters, constables, and other officers of a character of which nine-tenths of Englishmen know nothing. The court-baron and customary court continues, in its admission of tenants and witnessing of surrenders, the ancient business of the markmoot; the court leet exercises the remaining share of the higher jurisdiction involved in the grant or exemption of the original gift. The vestry is the representative of the gemot with which it was once identical; but as the jurisdiction of the courts of the manor was defined

Township organisation at the present day

¹ As in Domesday, i. 193, 'Hanc terram tenuerunt vi. sochemanni et dare et vendere terram suam potuerunt. Unus eorum homo regis Edwardi fuit et inwardum invenit vicecomiti. Tres istorum sochemannorum accommodavit Picotus Rogerio comiti, propter placita sua tenenda, sed postea occupaverunt eos homines comitis et retinuerunt cum terris suis sine liberatore, et rex inde servitium non habuit nec habet, sicut ipse vicecomes dicit.' An important passage, showing further how manors were enlarged by usurpation.

² Manorial Register of Aldborough, Yorkshire: the officers elected in the ninth of Charles I were four by-lawmen or plebiscitarii, two constables, two aletasters, and one 'communis impercator' or pinder.

Importance
of these vestiges of early
institutions.

by charter, or by the customary law existing at the moment of their creation, all matters arising outside that jurisdiction come under the management of the vestry. Nor can the importance of this point be exaggerated, when we look further on and see in these local gatherings the chief element in the origination of the borough system of later date. The comparatively restricted character of the powers of the local courts was probably the cause why liberty of election was suffered to exist in them during ages in which in the higher ranges of the polity it was entirely lost. A curious instance of the early confusion of the ideas of the township and the parish may be found in the defensive war of A.D. 1138¹, when the parish priests with their parishioners assembled and joined the army of the barons. In the hundred-courts the parson still joined in the representation of the township². The host was the nation in arms; here it is the church in arms also.

The burh.

44. The 'burh' of the Anglo-Saxon period was simply a more strictly organised form of the township. It was probably in a more defensible position; had a ditch and mound instead of the quickset hedge or 'tun' from which the township took its name; and as the 'tun' originally was the fenced homestead of the cultivator, the 'burh' was the fortified house and court-yard of the mighty man—the king, the magistrate, or the noble. Although there is no evidence which connects the burhs of the Anglo-Saxons with the remains of Roman civilisation³, and although like the rest of the Germans they abhorred walled towns as the defences of slavery and the graves of freedom⁴, they must necessarily have used, during the process of conquest, fortified camps which, after peace was obtained, served as civil centres for the districts in which they were placed. Other towns grew up round the country houses of the kings and ealdormen, round the burhs.

Growth of

¹ R. Hexham, ed. Twysden, c. 321.

² Hen. I, vii, §§ 7, 8.

³ Pearson, Early and Middle Ages, i. 264, follows Mr. T. Wright (Archæologia, xxxii) in an ingenious argument for the continuity of Roman municipal institutions in Anglo-Saxon Britain: illustrating the subject by reference to the trinoda necessitas, extra-mural burial, and some other particulars; all, however, capable of other and far more probable explanation.

Tacitus, Hist. iv. 64.

the great monasteries in which the bishops had their seats¹, and in such situations as were pointed out by nature as suited for trade and commerce. Where such communities were developed out of the village townships, or founded on the folkland, their institutions and organisation would continue free until the time at which the king began to be regarded as the owner of the folkland, and the lord of every man who had no other lord. In these the idea of the free township was retained: municipal authority depended on no different organisation; the presiding magistrate was the gerefa; in mercantile places such as London or Bath, the port-gerefa; in others the wic-gerefa or the tun-gerefa simply²: his assessors were the owners of the homesteads which had been allotted to the original settlers, or of the estates which had been formed by the union of such allotments. The common lands of the burh testified to its origin in a state of society in which the mark system was not yet forgotten³.

They retain the forms of the free township.

Very little indeed can be stated with certainty about the burh constitution of early times. We know from Bede that Lincoln had a *gerefa*⁴ in the seventh century, and from Domesday that in the eleventh it was governed by twelve lawmen, who inherited their jurisdiction, their sac and soc, with their tenements⁵; but Lincoln had gone through several centuries of

The jurisdiction of the burh.

¹ We have the cyninges burh, Edm. ii. 2, &c.; the cyninges tun, Alfred, i. 2; the corles tun, Ethelbert, § 13; cyninges ealdor bott (villa regalis), Bede, H. E. ii. 9; ceastre, (i.e. Carlisle), ibid. iv. 29; the mynster stowe and folc-stowe, urbana et rustica loca, ibid. iii. 5. The five Danish burhs, Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, Leicester, and Stamford, had not only special privileges of their own, but a common organisation apparently of the nature of confederation; but the history is very obscure. Cf. Laws of Ethelred, iii. 1; Chron. Sax. A.D. 1013, 1015; Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 49.

² London and Winchester had a wic-gerefa; London, Bath, Bodmin, and Canterbury had a port-gerefa; the burh-gerefa does not occur, Schmid, Gesetze, p. 598.

³ On the common lands of the Scottish burghs, see Maine, Village Communities, p. 95. Each of the four wards of York has its own common pasture, on which only freemen have rights; the same rule may be found in most ancient towns, Oxford, Colchester, &c.

⁴ Hist. Eccl. ii. 6.

⁵ 'In ipsa civitate erant xii lageman, id est habentes sacam et socam . . . Modo sunt ibi totidem habentes sacam et socam,' Lincoln, Dom. i. 336.

The government of the burh resembles that
of the hundred.

Danish rule in the meantime. The city of Chester on the other hand belonged, in the reign of Edward the Confessor, to the Earl of Mercia, subject to the rights of the king and bishop, and had a governing body of twelve judges, chosen from the tenants of the three¹. It would appear from the use in these instances of the number of twelve for the governing magistracy, that the constitution of the larger towns resembled that of the hundred rather than that of the township²; and, in fact, each such town generally contained several parish churches with a township organisation belonging to each. Hence, in the law of Edgar directing the election of witnesses in each community to legalise transfers of cattle and goods, the number fixed for the larger burhs is thirty-three, that for the hundreds and smaller burhs twelve only³. The burh-gemot is to be held three times a year, when that of the hundred is held monthly, and that of the shire half-yearly⁴. Probably the townships which made up the burh had their weekly courts also, and the weekly market day would serve as a general gathering for the whole. But it is far easier to trace in existing monuments vestiges of early differing systems than to construct out of them any consistent idea of a uniform constitution. All the definite knowledge that we have of the subject belongs to a later date. Of the influence of guilds, as a subsidiary part of town organisation, there are some traces which at a later period assume great historical importance; but there is nothing to justify the notion that they were the basis on which the corporate constitution of the burh was founded⁵.

Stamford also had twelve lagemanni with sac and soc in their own houses and over their men, ibid.; and there were lagemanni also in Cambridge. The burh-thegns in London may have been the same sort of dignitaries. Kemble, C. D. iv. 214, 221.

¹ 'Civitas de Cestre... Tunc erant xii judices civitatis; et hi erant de hominibus regis et episcopi et comitis. Horum si quis de hundret remanebat die quo sedebat sine excusatione manifesta x solidis emendabat inter regem et comitem.' Dom. i. 262.

² Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 102; Somner's Canterbury, p. 52. It is however necessary to remember that a hundred might take its name from a borough, and the hundred court be held in the borough, without extinguishing the proper township court, or borough-moot.

³ Edgar, iv. §§ 4, 5.

⁴ Ibid. iii. § 5.

⁵ See below in Chapter XI.

The city of London, when it springs into historical light, is a collection of communities based on the lordship, the township, the parish, and the guild; and there is no reason to doubt that similar coincident causes helped the growth of such towns as York¹ and Exeter. Their size and power, and perhaps also the extent of the suburban common lands, entitled many of them to the name as well as the constitution of the hundred; Canterbury, Feversham, Norwich, Thetford, Cambridge², and many others, appear in Domesday as hundreds. But the basis of the system was that of the township or cluster of townships which had coalesced or grown up into the city organisation. The duty of 'burh-bot,' which formed part of the trinoda necessitas, and was incumbent on every owner of land, threw the burden of repairing the fortifications on the land-owning townsmen of the particular burh; every burh was to be put in good repair within a fortnight of the Rogation days³; just as in Germany the duty of keeping the town hedge and ditch in order was a part of the general business of the village communities⁴.

With the exception of the burhs, the townships were generally very small communities, and the heads of families would not be so numerous as to require a select body of magistrates. The tun-gerefa, answering to the schulz or schultheiss of the German *dorf*⁵, and the tithingman, are the only officers of whom we read at all; the duties of the former were, like those of all the gerefan, fiscal as well as judicial; and in the dependent townships he was the officer responsible for the production, and even for the credibility of his lord's men⁶; he may also have commanded them in the fyrd. In the free townships, he and the four best men were the legal representatives of the community in the court of the hundred and the shire⁷. The great towns.

Examples of

The officers of the townships.

¹ 'In Eboraco civitate tempore regis Edwardi praeter scyram Archiepiscopi fuerunt sex scyrae. Una ex his vasta in castellis.' Dom. i. 298. The wards of Canterbury were called hundreds. Somner, p. 52.

² Cambridge 'defendit se pro uno hundred.' Dom. i. 190.

³ Athelstan, ii. § 15. See the customs of repairing the walls of Oxford in Domesday, i. 154; those of Chester, ibid. i. 262.

⁴ G. L. von Maurer, Dorfverfassg. i. 356-361.

⁵ Ibid. ii. 22-30; Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 350-353; Grimm, R. A. p. 755.

⁶ Athelstan, iii. § 7. ⁷ Hen. I, vii. § 8.

tithingman is only known as carrying out the police system of the hundred¹.

The hundred and wapentake.

Danish or Anglian origin.

The wapentake.

The Hundred.

45. The union of a number of townships for the purpose of judicial administration, peace, and defence, formed what is known as the hundred or wapentake; a district answering to the pagus of Tacitus, the hærred of Scandinavia, the huntari or *gau*² of Germany. The terms wapentake and hundred are both, in Anglo-Saxon records, of somewhat late occurrence. The wapentake is found only in the Anglian districts, Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Rutland, and Leicestershire. To the north the shires³ are divided into wards, and to the south into hundreds. Hence the wapentake may be a relic of Danish occupation. It finds a kindred form in the Norse vapnatak, which is however not applied to the district but to the form of ratifying the decisions of the local court, and hence to the decisions themselves⁴. The Norman lawyers explained the word in reference to the formal recognition of the local magistrate by touching his arms⁵; but this is very questionable, and the exact origin of the term cannot be ascertained, although it unquestionably has reference to the armed gathering of the freemen, and so to the assembly rather than to the district which it represents. The name of the hundred, which, like the wapentake, first appears in the laws of Edgar⁶, has its origin far back in the remotest antiquity, but the use of it as a geographical expression is discoverable only in

¹ I can find no authority whatever for regarding the tithingman as the head of the free township or tithing, and the tun-gerefa that of the dependent one. The apparent analogy of shireman, hundredman, and tithingman, with sheriff, hundred-reeve and town-reeve, is of course inviting, but there is nothing in the earlier or later functions of the tithingman that gives him the character of a magistrate. He is the mere servant or executor of the law.

² Grimm, R. A. p. 532; Kemble (Saxons, i. 72), uses the word 'gá' for the aggregation of 'marks,' but the word is found only in one document of very questionable value, cf. pp. 81, 82; Gale, Script. xv. 748. See Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 47, and below, p. 111.

³ The wapentake of Sadberge in Durham is one instance north of Tees. Script. Dunelm. App. xi.

⁴ Grimm, R. A. p. 770; Vigfússon, Icelandic Dictionary, p. 685.

⁵ Edw. Conf. § 30.

⁶ Edgar, i. Constitutio de hundredis. The wapentake is first mentioned in Edgar's Secular Law, § 6.

comparatively late evidences. The pagus of the Germania sent its hundred warriors to the host, and appeared by its hundred judges in the court of the princeps. The Lex Salica contains abundant evidence that in the fifth century the administration of the hundred was the chief, if not the only, machinery of the Frank judicial system¹; and the word in one form or other enters into the constitution of all the German nations. It may be regarded then as a certain vestige of primitive organisation. But the exact relation of the territorial hundred to the hundred of the Germania is a point which is capable of, and has received, much discussion. It has been regarded as denoting simply a division of a hundred hides of land; as the district which furnished a hundred warriors to the host; as representing the original settlement of the hundred warriors; or as composed of a hundred hides, each of which furnished a single warrior². The question is not peculiar to English history, and the same result may have followed from very different causes as probably as from the same causes, here and on the continent. It is very probable, as already stated, that the colonists of Britain arranged themselves in hundreds of warriors; it is not probable that the country was carved into equal districts³. The only conclusion that

The territorial hundred.

Its relation to the hundreds of the Germania.

English hundreds.

¹ Above, pp. 54, 55.

² The several views are enumerated by Konrad Maurer; Philipps, Turner, and Palgrave despair of any explanation; Lingard combats the ideas of earlier enquirers without suggesting one of his own; Spelman refers the hundred to the collective responsibility of an association like the frankpledge; Leo takes a similar view. Verelius regarded it as an aggregate of a hundred households; and Grimm (R. A. p. 533) accepts the same notion. Ihre, with some diffidence, suggests that the hundred was merely the district which furnished the hundred warriors; Schmid and Lappenberg accept this. Eichhorn maintained that the hundred was originally the personal union of the hundred warriors; and, on their settlement, was used to denote the territorial area which they occupied. Velschow and Waitz hold that a warrior was due from every hide of land, and accordingly the hundred was at once an area of a hundred hides, and a district responsible for a hundred warriors. Maurer himself follows the view of Eichhorn, which is also Kemble's. Krit. Ueberschau, i. 77, 78. See too Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 49, 50, 58, 59; Hallam, Mid. Ages, ii. 281.

³ Neither the hundreds in England nor the shires appear ever to have had common lands, like the härathis-almanningar and lunds-almanningar in Sweden, where the bys-almanningar answer to the common lands of the township, K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, i. 69. But too much stress must not be laid on this statement. The several townships in the forest of seems reasonable is that, under the name of geographical hundreds, we have the variously sized pagi or districts in which the hundred warriors settled; the boundaries of these being determined by other causes, as the courses of the rivers, the ranges of hills, the distribution of estates to the chieftains, and the remnants of British independence.

The hundred is the pagus.

Edgar's law of the hundred.

The fact that the hundred appears first in the laws of Edgar¹, and with an adaptation to a particular police institution, the pursuit and capture of thieves, might seem to mark the definite application of the name to the territorial area, which may have been called wapentake, ward, or even shire, at an earlier period. But the particular measure then adopted seems rather to imply the previous existence of the district name². In this case, we may refer to a parallel institution of the Frank kings, Childebert and Clothair, three centuries and a half before the days of Edgar; to which the introduction of the name as that of a local division in the Frank kingdom has been ascribed, although the hundred system is known from the Salian law to have been in full working a century earlier³.

The police hundred of the Franks.

Knarborough each had an allotment at the enclosure, and this seems a fair instance of common lands of a hundred, although the particular hundred is regarded as a manor. Kemble regards the public buildings of the county as representing the common land of the shire (i. 76). Whatever was the case with the hundreds, before the shire system had become general the idea of the common mark had given way to that of folkland. If Sussex had folkland when it became part of Wessex, that folkland became part of the folkland of Wessex, did not remain as common land of the shire to Sussex.

¹ Select Charters, pp. 67-70; Brompton (Twysden, pp. 847, 848) places it amongst Athelstan's laws, and so it was regarded by Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. cxxi; it is however certainly later than Edmund, and can scarcely be thrown later than Edgar. See Schmid, Gesetze, p. xlviij.

² Robertson, Scotland under the Early Kings, ii. 335, refers to this act as the introduction of the territorial hundred: and regards the law of Childebert and Clothair as instituting the same on the continent.

³ Baluze, Capit. i. 14; Select Charters, p. 69. The words of Clothair, A.D. 595, 'Decretum est ut qui ad vigiliis, hoc est ad wactas, constituti nocturnas diversos fures non caperent, eo quod per diversa intercedente concludio scelera sua praetermissa custodias exercerent, centenae fierent'—are scarcely strong enough to prove the usage an innovation; though it may well have been an application of old machinery to a new purpose. And Sohn, who has thoroughly examined the subject, decides that the centenae now instituted were merely a police force arranged numerically for the watching of the already existing territorial hundreds. Reichs- und Gerichtsverfassung, i. 182-190.

The tradition preserved by William of Malmesbury, that Alfred devised the arrangement into hundreds and tithings, although, as it stands, irreconcilable with facts, may embody a portion of a historical truth¹. Alfred may have adopted the hundred as a basis of rating, as Edgar did for police, or may have anticipated the measures of his descendant; and if in the several recoveries of territory from the Danes, or conquests on the British border, a re-division or re-measurement of lands was requisite, either to satisfy old claims or to provide for the security of the frontier, it is probable that the measure of a hundred hides of land would be adopted, as in the reign of Ethelred it was for the purpose of taxation². But the inequality of the hundreds, as we everywhere find it³, precludes any hypothesis of a primitive symmetrical division on any such principle; and we may rest satisfied on the whole with recognising in the name the vestige of the primitive settlement, and in the district itself, an earlier or a later subdivision of the kingdom to which it belonged; possibly a greater mark, possibly a smaller shire.

The tradition of Alfred.

Improbability of a symmetrical division.

The wapentake in all respects of administration answers directly to the hundred, and no attempt can be made to account for its origin on the principle of symmetrical division. Nor is it easy to determine the origin of the variety of systems into

The wapentake.

¹ Will. Malmesb. G. R. ii. § 122: 'Et quia occasione barbarorum etiam indigenae in rapinas anhelaverant, adeo ut nulli tutus commeatus esset sine armorum praesidio, centurias quas dicunt hundrez, et decimas quas thethingas vocant, instituit, ut omnis Anglus legaliter duntaxat vivens haberet et centuriam et decimam. Quod si quis alicujus delicti insinularetur, statim ex centuria et decima exhiberet qui eum vadarentur; qui vero hujusmodi vadem non reperiret severitatem legum horreret. Si quis autem reus vel ante vadationem vel post transfugeret, omnes ex centuria et decima regis mulctam incurrent.'

² Chron. Sax. A.D. 1008.

³ Pearson, Hist. Maps, p. 51, discusses the statement of the Leiger book of Peterborough, that the hundred contained a hundred hides: he shows that the Domesday hidage in each of the counties of Bedford, Huntingdon, Northampton and Wilts, taken in the aggregate, nearly contains as many hundred hides as they do territorial hundreds, but without any agreement between the single hundred and the hundred hides. The document given by Ellis, Intr. to Domesday, i. 184, as showing that the hundreds of Northampton each contained a hundred hides, seems to be a mere attempt of an early scribe to force them into symmetry. Eyton (Shropshire, xii. 184) thinks that 'districts which were originally half-hundreds or quarter-hundreds came to be called hundreds.'

Various arrangements of the hundreds.

which the hundred jurisdiction is worked. In Kent, for instance, the hundreds are arranged in Lathes or Lests; and in Sussex in Rapes. The Lathe and the Rape may represent the undershires of the Heptarchic kingdom; but the Lathe is the organised judicial division of which the hundreds are mere geographical subdivisions, while the Rape on the contrary is a mere geographical expression, the judicial organisation remaining in the hundred¹. In Cornwall, in the twelfth century, the subdivisions were not called hundreds but shires²; one of which, Triconscire, now the hundred of Trigg, is mentioned in Alfred's will³. Yorkshire and Lincolnshire were divided into Trithings or Ridings, subdivided generally into wapentakes; but in Domesday the East Riding is divided into hundreds only, and in Lincolnshire, Northamptonshire, and Rutland⁴, the wapentake and the hundred are arranged side by side. Of the Yorkshire subdivisions two, Borgheshire and Craveshire, the latter of which is never called a wapentake, retain the name of shire; and it is given in later documents to Richmondshire, Riponshire, Hallamshire, Islandshire, Northamptonshire, and probably other similar districts⁵. Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, and Leicestershire are, in Domesday, arranged in wapentakes, but in one place the term 'hundred' is used in reference to a division of the last-named county. It may seem not impossible that the original name of the subdivision immediately above the township was Ridings.

Small shires of Yorkshire.

¹ Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 101; Ellis, Intr. to Domesday, i. 178 sq.

² Simeon Dun. ed. Hinde, i. 221: 'In Cornewalas sunt sex parvae scirae.'

³ Cod. Dipl. ii. 114. Kemble explains Triconshire as Cornwall generally; it is the Trigerseire hundred of the Pipe Roll of A.D. 1130, p. 159.

⁴ In Rutland, the wapentake of Alfhodestou contains two hundreds; but half of it is in Turgastune wapentake, and half in Brochelestou, in Nottinghamshire. Martinsley wapentake contains one hundred. Dom. i. 293 b.

⁵ Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, ii. 433, is inclined to trace the trithing in Kent and Sussex; Kent was divided into East and West, each arranged into three lathes, which in East Kent are double. Sussex was divided into East and West, each again divided into three rapes. In the trithing he sees the threefold division of the land allotted to the Norse odallers; thus Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, which were so divided, represented the lands measured out by Halfdane in A.D. 876: the other portions of the Danish conquests being left to their Saxon proprietors, under the special rule of the king: the trithings were thus held as odal-land, and the other parts as gafol-land or tributary. The view is very interesting, but very conjectural.

scir or shire, a term of various application. The city of York Small shires. was divided into seven shires¹, and the use of the word in northern Northumbria, the present Lowlands of Scotland, a territory which was peopled by Saxons and little disturbed by Danish aggression, points to the same conclusion². It would be rash however even to attempt a generalisation on these obscure differences, much more so to attempt to force them into conformity with the local arrangements existing under the later Scandinavian institutions whose symmetry testifies to an artificial origin³.

The presiding officer of the hundred or wapentake bears various names: nor is it quite certain that we are right in ascribing Chief officer of the hundred. the functions so denoted to a single magistrate. The centenarius or thunginus of the Frank law was the elected head of his hundred, and exercised his jurisdiction in company with the king's sacbaro, and in later times under the graf, the royal representative in the larger province of which the hundred was a subdivision⁴. The officer answering to the centenarius in England, may be the hundreds-caldor⁵, to whom the laws of Edgar direct the townsmen to refer in questions of witness, or the hundred-man who with his tithingmen goes forth to execute justice on the thief⁶. The headman of the wapentake is called in the laws of

¹ Above, p. 95, note 1.

² See, for example, the Records of the Priory of May, Cartae, p. 3: 'Sira de Chellin,' 'Sira de Cherel,' p. 5, 'Sire de Erdros.' The diocese of St. Aldhelm is called Selwoodshire by Ethelwerd, M. H. B. p. 507.

³ The idea of Sachse (Grundlagen des Deutschen Staats- und Rechtslebens, §§ 11, 12) is that each kingdom was divided into four provinces, each province into three shires; each shire into three trithings, each trithing into four hundreds; each hundred into twelve tithings and each tithing into twelve free households. Gneist, Verwaltgsr. i. 55. Mr. Robertson's theory, which however is put forth only as a theory, makes a square league equal to a turbe or tithing; four tithings a small shire or barony; three such shires one hundred; three hundreds one quarter; two quarters one larger shire or fylki; and two such shires one province or thiufada. Essays, p. 131. Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 97, arranges East Anglia in hundreds, each divided into four head leets or tribes, and each tribe into three subordinate leets.

⁴ Above, p. 55.

⁵ Edgar, iv. §§ 8, 10.

⁶ Ibid. i. §§ 2, 4, 5. The gerefa, mentioned in Edward, ii. 8, must also have been the reeve of the hundred or wapentake. See Schmid, Gesetze, p. 589. Cf. Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 99. The mot-gerefa of Edward double so, verment of the hundred.

Possible,

Ethelred the gerefa¹. It is possible to trace here the existence of two officers, the representative of the king's interest in the gerefa, who becomes after the Conquest the bailiff of the hundred; and the representative of the freemen in the hundredes-ealdor, who also survives the Conquest and is found in the thirteenth century, as the elected ealdorman of the hundred, representing his hundred in the shire-moot². There is not sufficient evidence to allow us to claim for the hundred-man the presidency of the hundred court: and later usage would incline us to regard him as the convener rather than the chairman. But at the time at which the name first occurs, the management and profits of the local courts had already passed into the hands of the great men to whom the name of land-rica is given, and who appear later as lords having sac and soc in whole hundreds and wapentakes. This change must have tended to depress the status of all elected officers, although it might not much affect the judicial process: the old names continue, but the reeve or grave of the hundred-court is the servant rather than the president. On analogy, however, we may fairly maintain that the original hundred-man or hundredes-ealdor was an elected officer, and the convener and constituting functionary of the court which he held.

Hundred-
moot.

46. This court, the hundred-gemot or wapentake court, was held every month; it was called six days before the day of meeting, and could not be held on Sunday³. It was attended by the lords of lands within the hundred, or their stewards the Confessor's charter to Abingdon, Kemble, C. D. iv. 200, is doubtless the same. In Domesday he is the praefectus, or praepositus hundredi. Ellis, Introd. i. 188.

¹ Ethelred, iii. § 3.

² Hen. I, viii. § 1. See Palgrave, Commonwealth, pp. 635, cceli: 'Et hundreda baroniae (de Aquila) dant ad auxilium Vicecomitis £9 17s. 6d. per quod barones et milites totius baroniae quieti sunt de secta ad comitatum, salvis Aldermannis Hundredorum qui faciunt sectam ad comitatum pro hundredo.' Rot. Hund. ii. 204, 205. 'Bedellus qui vocatur Aldreman, qui dat pro balliva sua per annum quatuor marcas, et nihil habet de certo de quo possit dictam firmam levare, nisi quod poterit extorquere de populo sibi subdito, et injuste. Et aliquo tempore solebant hujusmodi bedelli eligi per sectatores hundredi, et tunc parum vel nihil dederunt pro balliva sua.' Ibid. ii. 214.

³ Edw. ii. § 8; Edgar, i. § 1; iii. § 5.

representing them, and by the parish priest, the reeve, and four best men of each township¹. The judges of the court were the whole body of suitors, the freeholders answering to the 'rachimburgii' of the Franks; but as various inconveniences might arise from the uncertainty of the number, qualifications, or attendance of the whole, a representative body of twelve seems to have been instituted as a judicial committee of the court. These twelve may have been in some cases like the scabini or schöffen², a fixed body holding their appointment for life; or like the lawmen of Lincoln, the hereditary owners of sac and soc in the territory; or chosen merely for the occasion. They may be discovered in the twelve thegus of the wapentake, who by the law of Ethelred declared the report of the district in the gemot³; or in the twelve chosen witnesses of Edgar's law, before whom all bargains and sales are to be transacted⁴; in the thirty-six 'barons' or twenty-four 'judices' chosen in the East Anglian county courts to determine the suits of Ramsey and Ely⁵; and in the twelve legal men of the hundred, who are directed in the Assize of Clarendon⁶ to act as part of the Grand Jury before the judges in Eyre, and who play so important a part in the legal reforms of Henry II and his ministers.

Judges of the hundred
moot.

Whether the ealdorman of the shire, the sheriff or the bishop, sat regularly in the hundred court at any period may be

¹ Hen. I, vii. §§ 4, 7; li. § 2.

² Compare Savigny, i. 239, who argues that the official scabini were instituted by Charles the Great. Seven scabini were requisite for a full mallus. Ibid. i. 248. No other freemen but the scabini and the vassi comitum were compelled to attend after the capitulary of A.D. 809; ibid. 250.

³ 'Let pleas be held in each wapentake, and let the twelve senior thegns go out and the reeve with them and swear on the halidome which shall be put in their hands that they will accuse no innocent man and conceal no guilty one.' Ethelred, iii. § 3. 'Et judicium stet ubi tayni consenserint; si dissideant, stet quod ipsi viii dicent.' Ibid. § 13. K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, v. 389, refers this to the Danelaw only; and its whole purport is contested by Brunner, Schwurgericht, pp. 402, 403. See below, p. 611.

⁴ Edgar, iv. §§ 4, 5.

⁵ Hist. Ramsey, Gale, p. 415: 'xxxvi barones de amicis utriusque partis pari numero electos, ipsi judices constituerunt.' Hist. Ely, Gale, p. 471: 'coram xxiv judicibus.' 'Tandem veniens Aegelwinus Alderman ad Grauteburge habuit ibi grande placitum civium et hundretanorum coram xxiv judicibus.' Ibid. p. 478.

⁶ Select Charters, p. 137. See also Hallam, M. A. ii. 386 sq.

The ealdorman in the hundred-moot.

doubted¹: the number of hundreds in each shire must have prevented a monthly attendance at each, and it is more likely that the one or two occasions on which the ealdorman is mentioned as present were cases of exceptional importance. The sheriff may not improbably have been represented by a deputy, 'gingra'² or junior; who would look after the king's rights.

Jurisdiction of the hundred.

The hundred court was entitled to declare folk right in every suit³; its jurisdiction was criminal as well as civil, and voluntary as well as contentious. It tried criminals, settled disputes, and witnessed transfers of land. The testimony of the country and the record of the law were supplemented by the compurgatory oath and ordeal. It had also a common chest which divided the profits of jurisdiction with the king and the lord or land-rica⁴; and no suit might be carried to a higher court unless it had been first heard in the hundred⁵. The suitors were under special protection of the law on their way to and from it; and those who neglected the summons to it were fined⁶.

The hundred court as sheriff's tourn.

As was the case with the township, the organisation of the hundred lent itself readily to the judicial, ecclesiastical and fiscal developments of later times. The criminal jurisdiction of the hundred is perpetuated in the manorial court leet. On the institution of the frankpledge, a hundred court was held twice a year to ascertain the observance of the law⁷. This became the business of the sheriff's tourn of later times, held twice a year, in the octave of Easter and Michaelmas, in different parts of the county. It was the great court leet, as the old hundred court was the court baron of the hundred, and the county court that of the shire⁸: the distinction of origin being maintained in the principle that in the courts baron, whether in the manor, the hundred or the shire, the suitors

¹ Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 78; Palgrave, Commonwealth, pp. 98, 99.

² Alfred, 38, § 2, speaks of the king's ealdorman's gingra or junior as holding pleas. They are mentioned also in three charters of Berhtwulf king of Mercia, Kemble, C. D. ii. pp. 14, 25, 34.

³ Edgar, i. § 7.

⁴ Ibid., § 3.

⁵ Athelstan, iii. § 3; Edgar, iii. 2; Canute, ii. 17, 19.

⁶ For illustrations see below, p. 114, note 6.

⁷ Hen. I, viii. § 1.

⁸ Blackstone, Comm. iii. 33, 34; iv. 273.

were the judges, whilst it was otherwise in the courts leet¹, and in the sheriff's tourn among them, the steward being judge in the leet, the sheriff judge in the tourn². The criminal jurisdiction of the hundred was early cut up by grants of sac and soc, and later on was lost or merged in the general jurisdiction of the crown exercised by the judges in assize, in which it appears only as helping to constitute the juries.

There can be no doubt that the organisation of the hundred had a fiscal importance, not merely as furnishing the profits of fines and the produce of demesne or folkland, but as forming a rateable division of the county. The fiscal system of the Anglo-Saxons is very obscure; and it may be questioned whether any money taxation properly so called ever existed before the imposition of Danegeld by Ethelred the Unready. The tribute from the remaining folkland, and the rent of the royal demesne, which was scarcely a tax, sufficed for most of the expenses of the king's household. The obligations of the trinoda necessitas were discharged by personal service. The profits however of each hundred were no doubt accounted for by the sheriffs, and when general taxation became necessary it would be collected by the same machinery. When King Edgar confirmed the bishop of Worcester in the possession of his estates, he made up the amount of land by new grants to the extent of three hundreds, which he directed to furnish one scyphyll or 'navipletio'³ to the national fleet. In the year 1008 Ethelred ordered that a ship should be furnished by every three hundred hides⁴ and we learn from Domesday that the hundred of Oswald's law, comprising the three hundreds of Edgar's charter, contained three

The hundred as an area for rating.

¹ Viner's Abridgment, vii. 8. Although the suitors are judges in the court baron, the steward is judge in the court customary of the copyholders, a result of the early depression of the free into dependent townships, as well as of the later organisation of manors.

² Ibid. vi. 586; vii. 3.

³ Dugdale, Mon. Angl. i. 617, 618, 'scilicet ut ipse episcopus cum monachis suis de istis tribus centuriatibus . . . constituent unam navipletionem quod Anglice dicitur scyphyll, oththe Seyborne.' Kemble, C. D. vi. 240, for the last word reads 'scyphoene.' The town of Bedford paid towards ships as much as a third of a hundred. Domesd. i. 209. Warwick furnished four batsweins. Ibid. i. 238.

⁴ Chron. Sax. A. D. 1008.

hundred hides¹. It may be inferred then that every three hundreds were liable to be called on to furnish one ship, whilst every ten hides were accountable for a boat, and every eight hides for a helm and breastplate².

Franchises
or liberties.

47. In Anglo-Saxon as in later times, there existed side by side with the hundreds and wapentakes large franchises or liberties in which the jurisdiction was vested in private hands. To these exempt districts the name of sithesocn has been given, on somewhat scanty authority³, indicating their origin in a grant by the king to one of his gesiths or companions, of an estate upon which he may enjoy all the rights and profits that had belonged to the king, nominating the officers and exercising the jurisdiction. The particular rights thus conveyed were termed sac and soc, to which others, toll and team and the like, were frequently added⁴. In some cases exemption from the hundred is specially mentioned⁵, in which case the grantee would hold the courts on his own estate. In other cases the jurisdiction of the hundred is itself granted, even when the ownership of the soil was not affected by the grant. In the latter case the status of the free tenant within the hundred would not be at first changed by the gift. Far the largest proportion of these jurisdictions belonged to the churches and coincided with the ownership of the soil, which the clergy leased out to their sokemen on fairly

¹ Domesd. i. 172. 'Ecclesia S. Mariae . . . habet unum hundret quod vocatur Oswaldeslaw, in quo jacent ecc hidae.'

² Chron. Sax. A. D. 1008, with Earle's note, pp. 336, 337.

³ The word 'sithesocn' does not occur in any ancient document, unless in the form of 'sipessocna,' which Dugdale and other scholars following him regarded as a misreading of 'sipesocna.' It is found in the laws of Henry I, vi. § 1, and two or three times in the Pipe Rolls. Archdeacon Hale argued from the use of the word 'scypsocne' in Edgar's charter, quoted above, p. 105, that it referred to the association of three hundreds to provide a ship's crew; Hale, Register of Worcester, p. xxxiii. But if this be thought improbable, it is scarcely wise to regard it as an authentic term for the jurisdiction of a franchise. See Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, ii. 336, 457; Essays, p. lxxvi; Dugdale's Warwickshire, p. 4; Thorpe, Anglo-Saxon Laws, i. 512; Lappenberg, ii. 331.

⁴ See for examples, Kemble, C. D. iv. 138, 187, 233, 247.

⁵ Edward the Confessor frees certain lands of Westminster from the shire and the hundred; Kemble, C. D. iv. 191, 213. There were seven hundreds in Worcestershire, 'ita quieti, sicut scira dicit, quod vicecomes nichil habet in eis.' Domesd. i. 172.

liberal terms. Edward the Confessor gave the hundred of Hornermere to Abingdon¹, and that of Goddelie to Chertsey². The extent to which these exemptions must have weakened the hundred organisation may be inferred from the statement that the thegn holding five hides often if not always had a right of magistracy, a burh-geat-setl³. But although separated from the body of the hundred in this way, the liberties were not exempt from the jurisdiction or organisation of the shire, and may be regarded as private hundreds standing to the others in a relation analogous to that which existed between the free township and the manor of the lord: and they are often regarded simply as larger manors. In all these the machinery of the hundred or wapentake was strictly preserved, and the law was administered on the same principle. The sokemen elected their officers and made report, the steward of the lord acting as president in their courts and leading them in a separate body to the host. This is especially provided by Edgar in the charter already referred to: the tenants of the see of Worcester are to fulfil their military duties not with the king's servants or the exactors of the hundred, but under the bishop as their archiductor⁴.

The hundred court in private hands.

The courts of the great franchises, where they still exist, will be found to furnish the best instances of the ancient constitution of the hundred court: for they were less touched than the hundred courts themselves by general legislation, and have preserved their constitution in greater integrity. In the courts of the Forest of Knaresborough each of the townships or berewics which form the manor of the forest is represented by the constable and four men⁵; from these the jurors of the leet are chosen; and by them the praepositus or grave, and the Modern illustrations.

¹ Kemble, C. D. iv. 200. In Domesday, i. 280, the Countess Godeva is said to have had sac and soc in the whole wapentake of Newark.

² Kemble, C. D. iv. 206, 207. The jurisdiction of eight hundreds and a half was granted by the same king to S. Edmund's. Ibid. iv. 243, 253; vi. 203. The gifts of hundreds to Ely and Peterborough by Edgar, ibid. iii. 61, 93, are of questionable authenticity.

³ Ranks, § 2.

⁴ Mon. Angl. i. 617. So in Domesday, i. 87, the men of Taunton attend the courts of the bishop of Winchester, 'protectio in exercitum cum hominibus episcopi.'

⁵ Hargrove, Hist. of Knaresborough (ed. 1798), pp. 44, 45.

bedell. In the manor of Wakefield the representation is by the constable and two men, just as in 1181 in the half hundred of Chingford in Essex the tenants of St. Paul's were represented by the reeve and two men¹. There is no ground for connecting the hundred with the tithing of frankpledge, other than the right of the former to view the frankpledges in a half-yearly court. In the ecclesiastical system the hundred bore the same relation to the deanery rural as the township bore to the parish: but the deaneries do not always coincide geographically with the hundreds.

Intermediate divisions: combinations of hundreds.

48. Between the hundred, or wapentake, and what is now the shire, it is possible that other intermediate divisions may at an early period have come in; answering to the ridings of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, the rapes of Sussex and the lathes of Kent. If this were the case they may have had courts of their own as is the case with the lathe, and officers of their own such as the tithing-reeve and the leide-reeve who occur in two manuscripts of the so-called laws of Henry I². But the evidence of such arrangement is altogether wanting. The association of two, three or more hundreds is occasionally mentioned as used for the purpose of witness³, a custom which may be interpreted as the relic of some more symmetrical arrangement, but is more probably a mere expedient for extending the application of the compurgatory system. All the intermediate districts which bear the name of shire and have been already referred to, are of too late formation to illustrate this supposition. The lathe system in Kent answers closely to that of the hundred elsewhere, and all the existing machinery of the ridings, save the name and boundaries, is comparatively modern⁴.

¹ Hale, Domesday of St. Paul's, p. 144.

² Schmid, Gesetze, p. 663.

³ Ethelred, i. 1, § 3; Canute ii. 30, § 3. Hist. Ely, pp. 473, 475, 479.

⁴ The territorial arrangements of the Domesday hundreds are now so much changed that it is dangerous to generalise from them, but some instances may be given. Buckinghamshire in Domesday contained eighteen hundreds; these are now combined into five hundreds of three each, and three old hundreds which also have a collective name, the Chiltern Hundreds. The arrangement in threes may be as old as the naviplotio referred to above (p. 105). Lancashire and Leicestershire, which Mr. Robertson (Essays, p. 120) refers to as retaining the ancient division into

The name scir or shire, which marks the division immediately superior to the hundred, merely means a subdivision or share of a larger whole, and was early used in connexion with an official name to designate the territorial sphere appointed to the particular magistracy denoted by that name. So the diocese was the bishop's scire¹, and the stewardship of the unjust steward is called in the Anglo-Saxon translation of the Gospel his groef-scire²: and we have seen that the original territorial hundreds may have been smaller shires³. The historical shires or counties owe their origin to different causes⁴. Kent and Sussex are two of the Heptarelic kingdoms, of which their lathes and rapes are perhaps the original shires. Kent however appears as 'Cantescyre' as early as the reign of Athelstan⁵. Essex, Middlesex and Surrey are also ancient kingdoms. Norfolk and Suffolk are the two divisions of East Anglia, representing possibly the two 'fylkis' or folks into which the Norsemen divided their province⁶, or possibly the two dioceses assigned to Elmham and Dunwich before the invasions of the Danes. Of the Northumbrian kingdom, Yorkshire is the only one of the existing subdivisions which dates as a shire before the Conquest. Mercia, during its existence as a kingdom, was arranged into five regions none of which bore the name of shires: Lindsey, the district of the Lindisfari and diocese of Sidnacester; Hwiccia the diocese of Worcester and its appendant Magastetania; Mercia proper with its bishop at Lichfield and its royal city at Tamworth; Middle Anglia and South Anglia, dependent ecclesiastically on Leicester and later on Dorchester. These represent the early settlements out of which the Mercian kingdom was created by Penda and his immediate predecessors, and which

Creation of modern shires.

six hundreds (above, p. 101 note 3), have been somewhat rearranged since the Domesday Survey, but the fact may go in support of the same theory.

¹ Bede, H. E. iii. 7. &c. &c. (Alfred).

² Lindisfarne Gospels, iii. 130; S. Luke xvi. 2.

³ Above, pp. 98, 101.

⁴ On this see Palgrave, Commonwealth, pp. 116, 117; Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 56, 57.

⁵ Athelstan, iii: 'omnes Cantescyrae thaini'; possibly only a late translation of an Anglo-Saxon document.

⁶ Robertson, Hist. Essays, p. 120.

Shires of Mercia;

of Wessex;

of Northumbria.

were arranged as dioceses by Theodore before their several nationality had been forgotten; nor were they rearranged as shires and named after their chief towns before the reconquest of Mercia from the Danes under Edward the Elder. In Wessex however the division is more ancient; Ini speaks of the Scirman; the names Hamptonscire, Defnascire, and Bearroescire¹ appear in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle as early as the reign of Ethelwulf, side by side with the Dorsætas, the Wilsætas, and the Sumersætas. As the earliest possible date of the chronicle is the age of Alfred, it is not impossible that the arrangement may be due to that king²: but it is probably much earlier, and determined by the divisions of the early settlements of the West Saxons, or their successive conquests. The terminology was not however general in the time of Bede, who knew only the larger provinces of Mercia as regiones, mægths or settlements of kindred tribes, and those of Wessex as dioceses. The arrangement of the whole kingdom in shires is of course a work which could not be completed until it was permanently united under Edgar; and the existing subdivisions of Southern England are all traceable back to his day at the latest. The Northern counties have undergone some changes since the Conquest, although the new lines have been drawn on older landmarks: Durham is the county palatine of the Conqueror's minister, formed out of the patrimony of St. Cuthbert; Lancashire was formed in the twelfth century by joining the Mercian lands between Ribble and Mersey with the northern hundreds, which in Domesday were reckoned to the West Riding of Yorkshire; Cumberland is the English share of the old Cumbrian or Strathelyde kingdom; Northumberland and Westmoreland are the remnants of Northumbria and the Cumbrian frontier, appropriated ecclesiastically to Durham or York, and temporally to Appleby and Newcastle.

The constitutional machinery of the shire thus represents either the national organisation of the several divisions created by West Saxon conquest; or that of the early settlements which

¹ Chron. Sax. A.D. 851, 860.

² Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 56, considers A.D. 880 as the most probable date, and inclines to connect the division with the treaty arrangements of Alfred and Guthrum.

united in the Mercian kingdom, as it advanced westwards; or the rearrangement by the West Saxon dynasty of the whole of England on the principles already at work in its own shires. A shire system had been at work in Wessex as early as the reign of Ini¹. Whether, before the name of shire was introduced into Mercia, the several mægths or regions bore any common designation, such as that of gau, must remain in entire obscurity. There is extant a list of thirty-four divisions of England, gathered out of Bede and perhaps other sources now lost, and recording the number of hides contained in each; the termination 'ga' which is found here, in some cases, may be the German 'gau'; but the age and value of the document are very uncertain, and the divisions as a rule do not correspond with the historical shires².

Question as to an earlier name for the shire.

Each shire contained a number of hundreds, so various however that it seems almost impossible to suppose that in any case it was arranged on a numerical principle; although, as each three hundreds had to supply a ship, the number of hundreds in each of the later constituted shires might be expected to be a multiple of three. The organisation of the shire was of much the same character as that of the hundred, but it was ruled by an ealdorman as well as by a gerefa, and in some other respects bore evidence of its previous existence as an independent unity. Its gemot was not only the scir-gemot but the folc-gemot³ also, the assembly of the people; its ealdorman commanded not merely the military force of the hundreds, but the lords of the franchises and the church vassals with their men. Its gerefa or sheriff collected the fiscal as well as the local imposts. Its ealdorman was one of the king's witan.

Number of hundreds in the shire.

Officers and courts of the shire.

49. The ealdorman, the princeps of Tacitus, and princeps⁴, or

¹ The scir-man is spoken of as the president of a court, Ini, § 8; the ealdorman may forfeit his scir, ibid. § 39; and the dependent is forbidden to withdraw from his lord into another scir, ibid. § 36.

² Gale, Rer. Angl. Scriptores, xv. 748; Kemble, Saxons, i. 81, 82; two of the ga's are Noxga-ga and Ohtga-ga.

³ Alfred, 38, § 1; Athelstan, ii. § 12; v. 1, § 1; Ethelred, v. § 13; vi. § 22.

⁴ Ealdorman stands for princeps, Bede, H. E. iii. 15; and, generally, for optimas, iii. 30; for subregulus, iv. 12; for satrapa, v. 10; for dux, iv. 13, 15.

The ealdor-
man.

Nominated by the king and witan.

Hereditary succession.

The ealdor-
man administered several shires.

satrapa, or subregulus of Bede, the dux of the Latin chroniclers and the comes of the Normans, was originally elected in the general assembly of the nation, and down to the Norman Conquest, even when hereditary succession had become almost the rule, his nomination required the consent of the king and the witenagemot. There is no reason to suppose that he was ever elected by the body over which he was to rule¹, although some form of acceptance by the shire may not improbably have been gone through. The hereditary principle appears however in the early days of the kingdom as well as in those of Edward the Confessor; in the case of an under-kingdom being annexed to a greater, the old royal dynasty seems to have continued to hand down its delegated authority from father to son. The under-kings of Hwiccia thus continued to act as ealdormen under Mercia for a century; and the ealdormanship of the Gyrwas² or fen-countrymen seems likewise to have been hereditary. The title of ealdorman is thus much older than the existing division of shires, nor was it ever the rule for every shire to have an ealdorman to itself as it had its sheriff. The ealdormanship of Mercia comprised a very large portion of the Mercian kingdom; Wessex in the reign of Ethelred was arranged under two ealdormen³. But each shire was under an

The first writer who uses 'comes' as equivalent to ealdorman is Asser, and the fact has been used as an argument against the genuineness of his book. It occurs however in some of the questionable charters of Ethelwulf apparently in the same sense. Kemble, C. D. ii. 50; v. 97.

¹ Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 76.

² Bede, H. E. iii. 20, iv. 19; Hugo Candidus (Sparke, p. 2); Felix, Vita S. Guthlac; Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum, iii. 260.

³ On this point Mr. Robertson's essay on the 'King's kin' (Essays, pp. 177-189) is highly instructive and suggestive. He argues that the great ealdorom of Mercia subsisted until the banishment of Elfric the child in 985, and that of East Anglia until the death of Ethelwin in 992, after which they were administered by high-reeves under the king until Canute reconstituted them. Wessex he regards as divided into two great ealdoroms, that of the western and that of the central provinces; which, with Kent under archbishop Sigeric, made a threefold division of the south of England. These, with Essex and Northumbria, would make up seven great territorial magistracies. But Sussex had an ealdorman as late as 982, and the arrangements are so short-lived that it is impossible to regard them as parts of a permanent methodical system. And the same may be said even of Canute's fourfold division.

caldorman, who sat with the sheriff and bishop in the folkmoot, received a third part of the profits of the jurisdiction¹, and commanded the military force of the whole division. From the latter character he derived the name of heretoga², leader of the host (here), or dux, which is occasionally given him in charters.

The sheriff or scir-gerefa, the scir-man of the laws of Ini³, The sheriff. was the king's steward and judicial president of the shire, the administrator of the royal demesne and executor of the law. His sphere of jurisdiction was distinctly a single shire, although after the Conquest for a long period the shires were administered in pairs. It is probable on early analogy that the gerefa was chosen in the folkmoot; but there is no proof that within historical times this was the case⁴, although the constitutionalists of the thirteenth century attempted to assert it as a right, and it was for a few years conceded by the crown. As a rule he was, as a royal officer, nominated by the king; the ealdorman, as a national one, by the king and witan. The sheriff as well as the ealdorman, was entitled to a share of the profits of administration, and possibly had in some cases an endowment in land⁵.

¹ The third penny of the county appears from Domesday (i. 1, 26, 203, 246, 252, 280, 298, 336) to have been paid to the earl in the time of Edward the Confessor; Ellis, Introd. to Domesday, i. 167, 168. Compare the share of the count in the Capitulary of A.D. 783; one third to the count, two thirds to the palace, Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 628; iv. 145.

² Elfhere, ealdorman of Mercia under Edgar, is called heretoga, Cod. Dipl. ii. 383; iii. 5, 49, 159, 259 sq. His son Elfric is called ealdorman. See Kemble, Saxons, ii. 126; Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 581.

³ Scirman, Ini, § 8; Ethelwin is scirman in Kent under Canute, Kemble, C. D. iv. 9. See also iv. 304; Leofric, scires-man, iv. 267; and Wulfsi priest, the shire-man, vi. 127. Pontius Pilate is scirman of Judaea, St. Luke iii. 1. The word used in the laws is generally gerefa simply; scir-gerefa however is found in charters, Kemble, C. D. iv. 10, where Ethelwin, the scirman in Kent, is called scir-gerefa; also iv. 54, 201, &c. &c. The Latin word is generally praepositus or praefectus. Ethelwerd (M. H. B. p. 509) calls the sheriff of Dorset exactor in A.D. 787. See above, p. 82.

⁴ The statement of the chapter 'de heretochiis' in the so-called laws of Edward the Confessor, is a fabrication of the thirteenth century at the earliest, Schmid, Gesetze, p. 510. See Gneist, Verwaltungsr. i. 78.

⁵ Such was the wardpenny paid in Cambridgeshire, Domesd. i. 190; the allowances made to the sheriff of Wilts, in kind, are enumerated in vol. i. 69; and he also had rights in reveland, which possibly were attached to his office. Reveland is mentioned also in Herefordshire, Domesd. i. 179, 181; Ellis, Introd. to Domesd. i. 168, 231; Allen, Prerog. p. 214. The sheriff of Shropshire had the third penny of the town of Shrewsbury, ibid. i.

Double government by ealdorman and sheriff.

The system of double administration by a national leader and a royal steward, although common to the early Germanic constitutions, the Frank, the Gothic and the Lombard, is in its later form almost peculiar to England. In the later Frank kingdom the graf, who now stood in the place of the national as well as the royal officers of early days, exercised the functions of both in immediate dependence on the king¹; and in medieval Germany, where the title of duke or herzog presents some analogy with that of the ealdorman, he is rather a national prince than an imperial officer: every attempt made by the central authority to assert its power through counts or counts-palatine, ending in the foundation of new hereditary principalities, either coordinate with or subordinate to the dukes, but in both cases equally neglectful of any duties to the emperor. In England, on the contrary, the sheriffdom as a rule never became hereditary, and after the Norman Conquest, under the changed title or translation of vice-comes², it was used by the kings as a means of ousting or preventing the creation of any feudal rule such as that of the counts and dukes of the continent. The history of the sheriffdom is thus one of the most important departments of Constitutional History.

The shire-moot.

50. The sheriff held the shire-moot, according to Edgar's law, twice in the year³. Although the ealdorman and bishop sat in it to declare the law secular and spiritual, the sheriff was the constituting officer⁴. The suitors were the same as those of the hundred court: all lords of lands⁵, all public officers, and from every township the reeve and four men⁶. The latter point,

252. In Surrey were three manors from which the sheriff had £7, 'de eo quod inpendit eis adjutorium cum opus habent,' Domesd. i. 30. See above, p. 102, note 2.

¹ Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 363. Sohm, Fr. R. G. V. i. 156-181, 463-472.

² Vicecomes occurs as the Latin word for sheriff in Canute's letter to the bishops, given by Florence of Worcester: but this is clearly a translation of Norman date. ³ Edgar, iii. § 3; Select Charters, p. 70.

⁴ Hallam, M. A. ii. 283; Kemble, Saxons, ii. 158, 159.

⁵ Called in this aspect scir-thegns, Kemble, C. D. vi. 198; iv. 170; Saxons, ii. 234, 235. Kemble contends, and with good reason, that these scir-thegns are not necessarily king's thegns. It may be added that there is no reason to regard them as all possessed of five hides of land, very many of the thegns of Domesday having far less. See too Gneist, Verwaltgsr. i. 37.

⁶ Compare the following passages from Domesday: in Archenefeld, i. 179, 'Si vicecomes evocat eos ad siremot, meliores ex eis, vi aut vii, vadunt left questionable in the laws, is proved by the later practice. In the county courts of the reign of Henry III, the reeve and four men took part in matters of election, of arming and of assessment; and in the reign of Edward I the Kentish borhs-aldor and his four fellows represented each township in the court of the itinerant justices, itself a form of the county court. Every one on his way to and from the gemot was under the special protection of the law.

Attendance of the reeve and four men.

Here again the suitors were the judges; but the twelve senior thegns appear in the county court as well as in the hundred¹, and, on the institution of the grand-jury, present the report of the hundred². Thus limited, the authority of the sheriff was rather that of a chairman or moderator than that of a judge. The duty of seeing the law executed devolved upon him, and in fiscal as well as judicial matters he exercised a good deal of somewhat irresponsible power.

The twelve thegns.

Besides the judicial power of the shiremoot, which, like the hundred, was competent to declare folkright in every suit³, some shadow of legislative authority seems to have remained to it in the time of Athelstan, when the bishops of Kent and all the thegns, *eorl and ceorl*⁴, of Cantescyre, declared to him in their gemot at Faversham, their acceptance of the measures taken for the maintenance of the peace in the recent witena-

Vestiges of legislative action in the shiremoot.

cum eo. Qui vocatus non vadit dat ii solidos aut unum bovem regi, et qui de hundret remanet, tantundem persolvit. In the city of Hereford, 'qui equum habebat ter in anno pergebat cum vicecomite ad placita et ad hundret.' Ibid. In Derby hundred (inter Ribble et Merse), 'Si de hundredo remanebat aut non ibat ad placitum ubi praepositus jubebat, per v solidos emendabat.' Ibid. i. 269. The participation of ceorls in the shiremoot is mentioned in a charter of Canute, Cod. Dipl. iv. 11, and illustrated by the direction of writs to all thegns of the shire twelf-hynd or twy-hynd.

¹ Compare the direction of Lewis the Pious in A.D. 819, that every graf should attend the general placita with twelve scabini, or, if there were not so many, the number should be made up from the best men of the county. See Savigny, i. 248; Waitz, D. V. G. iv. sq. The appearance of the senior thegns in the shiremoot is mentioned in Cod. Dipl. iv. 137.

² Select Charters, pp. 137, 251.

³ But with a restriction of appeal until the lower court had failed to do justice. In the same way the shiremoot intercepted all appeals to the king, Hallam, M. A. ii. 285. Wills are frequently attested by it, e.g. Kemble, C. D. vi. 198. Other acts done before the shire will be found in Cod. Dipl. iv. 117, 137, 138, 234; iii. 292.

⁴ Comites et villani, Athelstau, iii. 148; Kemble, Saxons, ii. 233, 234; Hallam, M. A. ii. 376; Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 637.

gemot of Greatley. In this we may trace a recognition of the importance of the popular reception of a law¹, which induced Charles the Great to ask the consent of the mallus to the capitularies which he had drawn up², and which appears in England in the measures taken for the publication and preservation of Magna Carta.

Evidence of the ancient nationality of the shire.

The institution of the shiremoot in England is not paralleled by any similar arrangement in the primitive Frank kingdom, in which the hundred court or mallus admits of no appeal, except to the judgment of the king³. This point further illustrates the theory that in the shiremoot, as a folk moot, we have a monument of the original independence of the population which it represents. If the shire be the ancient under-kingdom, or the district whose administrative system is created in imitation of that of the under-kingdom, the shiremoot is the folk moot in a double sense, not merely the popular court of the district, but the chief council of the ancient nation who possessed that district in independence, the witenagemot of the pre-heptarchic kingdom. Such a theory would imply the much greater preponderance of popular liberties in the earlier system, for the shiremoot is a representative assembly, which the historical witenagemot is not; and this is indeed natural, for the smaller the size of the districts and the more nearly equal the condition of the landowners or sharers in the common land, the more easy it would be to assemble the nation, and so much the less danger of the supreme authority falling into the hands of the king and the magistrates without reference to the national voice. But this can only be matter of conjecture.

Rating of the shire.

Under the late shire-system, before as after the Conquest, the shire was a unit for purposes of rating. Each shire was bound to furnish ships in proportion to its number of hundreds⁴, and from the produce of what had been the folkland

¹ Kemble, Saxons, ii. 238.

² Waitz, D. V. G. iii. 506-510.

³ See Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 494. It was however usual among the Bavarians and, at a later period, general.

⁴ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1008; with Earle's note, pp. 336, 337; see above, p. 105. Hence Archbishop Elfric leaves a ship to the people of Kent and another to Wiltshire, Kemble, C. D. iii. 352.

contained in it, to pay a composition for the feorm-fultum, or sustentation, of the king¹. The military contingents of the shire were also made a matter of composition, the number of fighting men furnished for the fyrð being often much smaller than the number of hides which furnished them². Whether these compositions were, as in the case of the churches, a matter of privilege, can scarcely be determined in the almost entire deficiency of secular charters before the Norman Conquest. It is however probable from Domesday that long before that event the shires had been allowed to acquit themselves of several of these duties by paying fixed sums or furnishing fixed contingents, answering in some measure to the firms, ferms or farms for which the sheriffs were liable.

Composition
for military service.

In ecclesiastical matters the shire had the same indefinite status which belonged to the hundred: the archdeaconries, as geographical divisions, do not occur earlier than the twelfth century. At that time the archdeacons, who had been ministers of the bishop in all parts of the diocese alike, received each his own district, which in most cases coincided with the county.

The shire ecclesiasti-
cally.

The system adopted by Edgar and Ethelred of combining the government of a whole cluster of shires in the hands of a single ealdorman, is so nearly contemporary with the general institution of a shire-system for all England, that it can scarcely be determined whether it is an exceptional departure from, or a stage in, the development of the new rule. Until the shire-system was made uniform, it is quite possible that the witena-gemots of the heptarchic kingdoms may have continued to exist³. But after that organisation was completed, though one

Combination of several shires under an ealdor-
man.

¹ The county of Oxford paid firm of three nights, or 15*l.* That of Warwick paid 65*l.* and 36 sextaries of honey, Domesday, i. 154, 238. Northamptonshire paid firm of three nights, ibid. i. 219. Many other instances are adduced by Ellis, Introd. to Domesd. i. 261, 262.

² In Berkshire one man went for each five hides, each hide paying four shillings for his maintenance. The whole city of Exeter furnished only the service of five hides. Oxford sent twenty burgesses to represent all the rest; Leicester sent twelve, and, if the king was going to sea, furnished four horses to convey arms to the fleet. Domesday, i. 56, 100, 154, 230. Warwick sent ten, Ibid. i. 238; Wilton one man for five hides, Ibid. i. 64.

³ The charters of Ethelred, ealdorman of Mercia under Alfred, are generally attested by Mercian bishops only, and therefore very probably issued

The great earldoms do not involve a new organization of the shire-moot.

ealdorman might govern and lead to battle the forces of several shires, he had no general court or gemot of his jurisdiction: the ealdorman of the Western provinces would take his seat in the folkmoot of Devonshire and Cornwall, but would not have a united council for the two. Nor is there any reason to suppose that after Canute had divided the whole realm into four earldoms, any such provincial witenagemots followed the institution. The royal writs are directed to the bishop and earl and sheriff of each shire, although both bishop and earl presided over many such shires. Whether any subordinate officer took in the shire the place of these powerful earls and ealdormen, or whether, if it were so, he also bore the title of ealdorman, can scarcely be determined from our existing materials. On the one hand there is no distinct mention of such official: on the other hand the use of the word ealdorman was becoming very different from what it had been; it was superseded in the higher ranks of organisation by the title of earl, and in the lower was acquiring, or returning to, the primary and loose meaning of a head-man, in which it could be applied to almost any local officer. But however this may have been, there was no intermediate organisation between the shire with its folkmoot and the central one of the kingdom with its witenagemot.

in Mercian witenagemots. Cod. Dipl. ii. 107, 112; v. 126, 134, 140. In the last case Ethelred states that he has summoned to Gloucester 'ælle Mercna weotan . . . bisceopas and aldermen and alle his duguthe,' and that with King Alfred's witness and leave. See also Cod. Dipl. v. 143, 154. There are also charters of Edgar drawn up whilst he was king of the Mercians only, and attested by the Mercian witan; Cod. Dipl. ii. 348, 358. The charters of the kings of the West Saxon dynasty are of course often attested by the West Saxon witan only. See Gneist, Verwaltgsr. i. 48. An East Anglian witenagemot of A.D. 1004 is spoken of in the Chronicle, which may or may not have been a folkmoot; for East Anglia, like Kent, was only one administrative division. See Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 102.

CHAPTER VI.

THE WITENAGEMOT AND THE KING.

51. The witenagemot.—52. Its composition.—53. Its powers in legislation.—54. In grants of land.—55. In judicature.—56. In taxing and general politics.—57. In election of magistrates.—58. In election and deposition of kings.—59. The king.—60. Coronation and unction.—61. His promises to his people.—62. The oath of the people.—63. The comitatus.—64. Nobility by birth.—65. Nobility by service.—66. The ealdormanship.—67. Use of the wergild.—68. The Bretwalda.

51. THE civitas or populus of Tacitus, the union of several pagi, is in Anglo-Saxon history the rice, or kingdom; and its council, the concilium principum, is the witenagemot or assembly of the wise. This is the supreme council of the nation, whether the nation be Kent or Mercia as in the earlier, or the whole gens Anglorum et Saxonum, as in the later history. The character of the national council testifies to its history as a later development than the lower courts, and as a consequence of the institution of royalty. The folkmoot, or popular assembly of the shire, is a representative body to a certain extent: it is attended by the representatives of the hundreds and townships, and has a representative body of witnesses to give validity to the acts that are executed in it. If each shire represented a complete kingdom, the shiremoot would give a complete representative system existing in each kingdom. But as the small kingdoms coalesced or were united by conquest, it does not seem to have been thought necessary to extend the system; the council of the aggregated state is not a folkmoot but a witenagemot. In those early kingdoms again, which were identical with the later shires, Kent for instance, it might be expected that we should find two central councils, the folkmoot or council of the people of Kent, and the witenagemot or council of the chiefs, answering to the greater and narrower assemblies of the plebs and of the principes in the Germania. It is by no means improbable that such was the case; but as our knowledge on the subject is derived from the charters attested by these assemblies, or issued with their consent, and as the consent of the witan only was necessary for the transfers of land, we have not the documentary evidence that would suffice for proof. We have many charters issued in witenagemots under the kings of Kent; but the only document issued by a folkmoot of Kent belongs to a date when it had long been without a king¹. The customs, however, of the folkmoot are so common and so ancient, that they afford a strong presumption of their universality; so that Kent and Sussex, and perhaps Essex and East Anglia, may be fairly supposed to have had the two regular assemblies in primitive simplicity as long as they continued independent². With regard to Wessex and Mercia, which were aggregations of smaller states, no such hypothesis will hold good. There is no probability that a Mercian king would introduce a new constitution into the organisation of his kingdom. It was enough that the Hwiccians, or Hecanians, or Magasætanians had their folkmoot, without the Mercians having one too; and it was enough for the king, as ruler of Mercia, to have his witenagemot without continuing to hold similar gatherings as overlord of Hwiccia and the associated districts. The folkmoot was left to the shire, the witenagemot was gathered round the king.

The supreme assembly of the kingdom.

The witenagemot not a folkmoot.

Question as to the co-existence of the folk-moot and witenagemot.

Question as to the gathering of the folk-moots in arms.

Yet even in the seven kingdoms, even in the united kingdom, when there was a general summons to the host, some concentration of the armed folk-moots must have taken place. For the promulgation of the laws also, at least in the period before Alfred, the national assembly must have comprised a much wider class

¹ Athelstan, iii: 'Karissime, Episcopi tui de Kancia et omnes Cantescyrcæ thaini, comites et villani.' See Kemble's comment, Saxons, ii. 234, 235; Hallam, M. A. ii. 377.

² See Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 43, who seems to take a contrary view, and regards the witenagemot and folkmoot of the small kingdoms as identical. Both views are of course conjectural.

than the witan¹. On great occasions too, coronations and the like, during the history of the later West Saxon dynasty², or on the sudden emergency of a Danish invasion, or for the reception of Canute's promulgation of Edgar's laws³, we must understand the witenagemot to have been attended by a concourse of people whose voices could be raised in applause or in resistance to the proposals of the chiefs⁴. But that such gatherings shared in any way the constitutional powers of the witan, that they were organised in any way corresponding to the machinery of the folkmoot, that they had any representative character in the modern sense, as having full powers to act on behalf of constituents, that they shared the judicial work, or except by applause and hooting influenced in any way the decision of the chiefs, there is no evidence whatever. They might, by an easy and welcome fiction, be considered as representing the nation, although they were really the mere retainers of the nobles or the inhabitants of the neighbouring villages.

General gatherings of the nation at the witenagemot,

not organised or representative.

So long as the heptarchic kingdoms lasted, each having its own witenagemot, there was no attempt at general organisation even for cases of the greatest emergency, except the ecclesiastical. The provincial or family tie was as strong as ever,

The ecclesiastical the only unity.

¹ See the prologues to the Laws of Wihtræd and Ini.

² For example, in A.D. 1051, when Godwin was exiled: 'Rex in suo concilio et omnis exercitus unanimi consensu . . . decreverunt.' Flor. Wig. A.D. 1051.

³ Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 103, and Appendix Q, thinks that 'every freeman retained in theory the right of appearing in the Assembly of the kingdom'; and adds, 'expressions are found which are quite enough to show that the mass of the people were theoretically looked on as present in the national Assembly, and as consenting to its decrees.' Most of the passages quoted in favour of this opinion refer to the occasions on which a king was elected, or laws promulgated. Kemble, Saxons, ii. 239, furnishes similar quotations from charters: Cod. Dipl. lxxiii, 'cum presentia populacionis'; cccxlv, 'tota populi generalitate'; mcliii, 'tota plebis generalitate.' He sums up thus, 'Whether expressions of this kind were intended to denote the actual presence of the people on the spot; or whether populus is used in a strict and technical sense, that sense which is confined to those who enjoy the full franchise, those who form part of the πολίτευμα, or finally, whether the assembly of the witan making laws is considered to represent in our modern form an assembly of the whole people, it is clear that the power of self-government is recognised in the latter.' Ibid. 240.

⁴ Such was the case in the shiremoot. Cod. Dipl. mxxix, where all the people who stood around cried out, 'Sy hit swa, Amen, Amen.' Kemble, Saxons, ii. 238.

and although the gens Anglorum had learned to recognise itself under one collective name as early as the time of Augustine, it was only on the ancient lines that any power of organisation was developed until the church was strong enough to form a national union. The kings met occasionally for alliance or for arbitration; for some great purpose, such as the choice of a primate¹; but the nation met only in the ecclesiastical councils, which were held with some frequency, from the days of Theodore to those of Athelstan, quite apart from and independently of the witenagemots of the several states. As occasionally the kings, and frequently the ealdormen, of different kingdoms attended these assemblies, and as they were, like other courts, useful for the witnessing of acts which required powerful attestation and general promulgation, the nation learned from them the benefit of common action. Another powerful help in the same direction must have been the ascendancy, during the whole of that period, of some one great prince, who by war or alliances exercised an overwhelming influence over the rest. Such a position was occupied after the middle of the seventh century by the kings of Northumbria, during the eighth by those of Mercia, and, after the rise of the West Saxon power, by Egbert and his successors. But the existence of this hegemony, whether or no its possessor bore the title of Bretwalda, was not accompanied by unity of organisation or even by any act of confederation.

In the Frank kingdom, if we may accept the testimony of Adalhard to the existence of the rule, some shadow of the double council of the Germania seems to have been preserved². Charles Occasional meetings of kings in the heptarchic period.

Ascendency of one great king or dynasty.

Frank assemblies.

¹ Bede, H. E. iii. 29: 'Reges Angliae nobilissimi, Oswiu provinciae Nordanhymbrorum et Egbert Cantuariorum, habito inter se consilio,' &c. Many instances of deliberation between the kings preparatory to the reception of Christianity may be found in Bede. A clear example of more general deliberation is furnished by Bishop Waldhere, in his letter to Brihtwald (Councils, &c. iii. 274): 'Ante paucos autem dies hoc placitum communi consensione condixerunt, ut in idus Kalendarum Octobrium, in loco qui dicitur Breguntford omnes advenissent reges ambarum partium, episcopi et abbates iudicesque reliquos, et inibi adunato consilio omnium dissimulatum causae determinarentur.'

² 'Consuetudo autem tunc temporis erat ut non saepius sed bis in anno placita duo tenerentur. Unum quando ordinabatur status totius regni ad

the Great held two great annual assemblies of his people, one in May at the Campus Madius, which Pippin had substituted for the Campus Martius of the Merovingians; and another in the autumn. The spring meeting was attended by the majores, optimates, and seniores, and held at the same time with the great military levy, the assembly of the people in arms. The autumnal one comprised the royal counsellors only, and answered nearly to the witenagemot¹. But although these assemblies afford a superficial parallel with the system sketched by Tacitus, the functions of the principes and the plebs were interchanged: in the first, the optimates were assembled 'propter consilium ordinandum'; the minores were allowed to be present 'ad consilium suscipiendum,' sometimes also 'pariter tractandum,' but not as of old to give authority to the determinations of the lords. It was in the autumn council, to which only the seniores and chief counsellors were admitted, that the policy of the ensuing year was settled.

The spring and autumn gathering.

Without denying that occasionally an Anglo-Saxon king might call together his witan, and hold his military review at the same time, it may be generally concluded that, if such had been the rule, some evidence would have been forthcoming. Of anything like the Campus Madius there is no trace: but very many of the dated charters of the period were issued in the anni vertentis spacium, quod ordinatum nullus eventus rerum, nisi summa necessitas quae similiter toto regno incumberebat, mutabatur. In quo placito generalitas universorum majorum tam clericorum quam laicorum conveniebat; seniores propter consilium ordinandum, minores propter idem consilium suscipiendum et interdum pariter tractandum, et non ex potestate, sed ex proprio mentis intellectu vel sententia, confirmandum. Caeterum autem propter dona generaliter danda aliud placitum cum senioribus tantum et praecipuis consiliariis habebatur; in quo jam futuri anni status tractari incipiebatur, si forte talia aliqua se praemonstrabant, pro quibus necesse erat praemeditando ordinare, si quid mox transacto anno priore incumberebat pro quo anticipando aliquid statuere aut providere necessitas esset.' Adalhard (ap. Hincmar), cc. 29, 30. On the interpretation, see Waitz, D. V. G. iii. 463 sq.; Kemble, Saxons, ii. 187-191. The Capitulary of Pippin (Baluze, i. 119), § 4, orders, 'ut bis in anno synodus fiat,' on March 1 and Oct. 1, in the king's presence: the ecclesiastical assembly was thus in strict analogy with the general one.

Question as to the similar practice in England.

¹ There are difficulties in harmonising Adalhard's account with historical data; but the principle enunciated in it is the only important question as illustrating early practice. See Waitz, D. V. G. iii. 465.

autumn¹; and it is by no means improbable that the reception of annual presents² after harvest, which was a regular part of the agenda of the Frank court, may have caused a similar meeting in the early kingdoms. As we approach the Conquest, it seems more probable that the great courts were held as they were by William the Conqueror, at Easter, Whitsuntide, and Christmas³; and that the deliberations of the witan took place in them. Such courts would account for large gatherings of the people who, although without organisation, might be regarded as representing the nation at large⁴.

Three great annual courts.

Members of the witan-gemot.

52. The members of the assembly were the wise men, the sapientes, witan; the king, sometimes accompanied by his wife and sons; the bishops of the kingdom, the ealdormen of the shires or provinces, and a number of the king's friends and dependents. These last generally describe themselves as ministri, king's thegus, and numbered amongst themselves no doubt the chief officers of the household, and the most eminent of the persons who, in the relation of gesith or comes to the king, held portions of folkland or of royal demesne, and were bound to him by the oath of fealty. These ministri answer roughly to the antrustions and vassi of the Frank court; but the term is a very general one, and perhaps embraced others than the sworn dependents of the king⁵. Occasionally a praefectus or gerefa

¹ See Cod. Dipl. lxxix, Nov. 24: xevii, Sept. 29: cxl, Sept. 22: cxc, Aug. 6: cxvii, Aug. 1: cci, Nov. 25: cexvi, Sept. 20: ccxviii, Sept. 30: cccxvii, Aug. 28:—the later charters are seldom dated, and the dating of such documents generally weakens rather than confirms their claims to genuineness. The ecclesiastical councils were mostly held in autumn; that of Hertford on Sept. 24, 673: in this an annual council on the 1st of August at Clovesho was ordered. The council of Hatfield was Sept. 17, 680: that of Berghamsted on the 6th of Rugern or August (Schmid, Gesetze, p. 15): that of Brentford, Oct. 16, 705: that of Clovesho, July, 716: another at Clovesho, Sept. 747: one at Pincahala, Sept. 2, 787: one at Alceh, Sept. 29, 788: the great council of Clovesho, Oct. 6-12, 803: and that of Chelsea, July 27, 816. (See Councils, &c. iii.)

² Annual presents were offered also at the spring gathering; but the autumn must have been the most natural time. Instances of both are given by Waitz, D. V. G. iii. 479.

³ Easter and Christmas were usual times for the meetings of the witan.' Kemble, Saxons, ii. 191. Documents are dated at Easter, Cod. Dipl. cxci, cclxx, cclxxi, &c.: at Christmas, cciii, cccxxii (Egbert), cclvii, cclviii, cclix: at Whitsuntide, ccxvii, &c. ⁴ Kemble, Saxons, ii. 237-240.

⁵ Kemble, Saxons, ii. 195-197, thinks that the ministri of the charters may many of them have been sheriffs, which is quite possible; but he goes appears in the early charters ; he is probably the heah-gerefa or high-steward of the household¹ ; the ealdormen appear under the variable title of princeps or dux, applied indiscriminately : now and then the names of the bishops are followed by that of an abbot, who may have been the king's chaplain or the predecessor of the later chancellor, as the heah-gerefa might be of the justiciar. Under the later kings, a considerable number of abbots attest the charters, a fact which may be ascribed either to the increased power of the monasteries, or to the advance in secular importance of the ecclesiastical body generally, after the reign of Athelstan.

Classes of members.

The number of the witan was thus never very large. The Mercian charters of the reign of Offa furnish us with an enumeration of all the members who could be ranged under the heads already mentioned, and may be taken as acts of the most completely organised assemblies, the Kentish and West Saxon charters being as a rule very scantily attested. These documents are witnessed by the five Mercian bishops, five, six, or seven ealdormen, principes or duces, and a number of ministri about equal to that of each of the other classes². The list of bishops is certainly exhaustive, for Mercia contained only five dioceses : the list of ealdormen is probably as complete, for the names recur in all the charters of Offa ; and the whole number of persons who bore the title during his reign is not much more than a dozen. The list of ministri is more variable, but they are still a very limited body, and, on the analogy of the bishops and ealdormen, must have been exhaustively enumerated ; nor is it to be supposed that the king would venture to outnumber by his own nominees the national officers, lay and clerical, who formed the older and more authoritative portion of the council.

Number of the witan in early times.

The witenagemots of Athelstan and Edgar are of course much more numerous, but only in proportion to the increased size of the realm. The whole tale of the bishops and ealdormen are easily identified, but the number of ministri is variable, and the Number under the later kings.

Number of the witan.

too far when he argues from Athelstan, vi. 10, that all the sheriffs were present even at a particular witenagemot.

¹ The Northumbrian highreeves probably answered to the sheriffs of the other kingdoms. Robertson, Essays, p. 177.

² See Cod. Dipl. cxxi, cxxii, cxxx, (five bishops, seven abbots and six ealdormen) ; cxxxvii, (five bishops, one abbot, seven principes and abbots form occasionally a formidable addition. In a witenagemot, held at Luton in November A.D. 931¹, were the two archbishops, two Welsh princes, seventeen bishops, fifteen ealdormen, five abbots, and fifty-nine ministri. In another, that of Winchester of A.D. 934², were present the two archbishops, four Welsh kings, seventeen bishops, four abbots, twelve ealdormen, and fifty-two ministri. These are perhaps the fullest extant lists. Of Edgar's witenagemots, the one of A.D. 966 contained the King's mother, two archbishops, seven bishops, five ealdormen, and fifteen ministri³; and this is a fair specimen of the usual proportion. It is clear that as the feudal principle grew stronger the number of king's thegns must have largely increased, and as their power became preponderant in the assembly, the royal authority became supreme in the country at large; the office of ealdorman also began at this period to be held chiefly by persons connected with the king's kin. A further inference may be drawn from the attestations of the charters. They are most of them those of the bishops and ealdormen, whose local duties would keep them generally distant from the court. The charters are therefore not the acts of a standing council of the king, or of casual gatherings of his nobles, but evidences of assemblies regularly constituted, and probably, for the paucity of exact dates prevents us from being certain, held at fixed times and places.

Increase in the number of ministri.

Proceedings of the witen-
agemot.

53. The part taken by the witan in the transaction of business was full and authoritative. Bede gives an account of the Northumbrian council which received Christianity, and represents the king as consulting his princes and counsellors one by one: each declares his mind; and the king decides accordingly⁴. Eddius describes the assemblies in which Wilfrid was banished and recalled; accusation, defence and sentence fall into their regular order; the bishops and ealdormen speak, and the king or ruling ealdorman pronounces the determination, 'hæc est voluntas regis et principum ejus⁵.' With these exceptions we two duces); cxxxviii, (four bishops and four ealdormen); cxl, clii, cliii, &c. &c.

¹ Cod. Dipl. cccliii.

² Ibid. ccccliv. See also mcvii. Kemble says that the largest number given is 106. Saxons, ii. 200; Gneist, Self-government, i. 49.

³ Cod. Dipl. dxviii.

⁴ Bede, H. E. ii. 13.

⁵ Eddius, c. lix. (ed. Gale, p. 86.)

have not at any period much material evidence to show the order of deliberation; most of the early councils in which speeches and votings are recorded being ecclesiastical. The clergy were no doubt very influential, and the great ealdormen, if we may judge by their action under Edred and Edwy, were not less independent. Under Edward the Confessor, Godwin and Leofric are able to sway the policy of the sovereign, or to neutralise each other's influence. It may be presumed that in the early stages and under the weaker sovereigns, the determination was elicited by bonâ fide voting. And, under the stronger and later kings, it was decided by the sovereign himself, as he chose to follow or to thwart the policy of his leading adviser. But we have little more than conjecture and analogy to guide us. It is rarely that even the Frank kings are described as acting under the constraint of their people¹: the days of Ethelred the Unready, and even of Edward the Confessor, can scarcely be appealed to as giving the normal condition of the relations of king and council; nor is it until the reign of Henry II that we find any historical data as to deliberations in which the king does not get his own way.

Independence of the clergy and ealdormen.

The formula however by which the co-operation of the witan-gemot was expressed is definite and distinct². The laws of Ini are enacted 'with the counsel and teaching of the bishops, with all the ealdormen and the most distinguished witan of the nation, and with a large gathering of God's servants³'; those of Wihtræd are decreed 'by the great men with the suffrages of all, as an addition to the lawful customs of the Kentish people⁴.' Alfred issues his code⁵ with the counsel and consent of his witan; Athelstan writes to the reeves with the counsel of the bishops⁶; at Exeter the witan decree with the counsel of the king, and the king with theirs⁷. Edmund before he legislates has deliberated⁸

Counsel and consent of the witan.

¹ As for example, when the host compelled King Clothair to go to war, pulling down his tent and loading him with abuse. Greg. Turon. iv. 14; Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 146.

² The legislative authority of the witan is the subject of Kemble's second canon, Saxons, ii. 205. 'The witan deliberated upon the making of new laws which were to be added to the existing folkright, and which were then promulgated by their own and the king's authority.'

³ Schmid, Gesetze, p. 21.

⁴ Ibid. p. 15.

⁵ Ibid. p. 69.

⁶ Ibid. pp. 126, 127. ⁷ Ibid. pp. 150, 153. ⁸ Ibid. pp. 172, 173, 177.

with the counsel of his witan, both ecclesiastical and secular. Edgar ordains with the counsel of his witan in praise of God, and in honour of himself and for the behoof of all the people¹. Ethelred and his witan issue ordinances at Woodstock²; Canute at Winchester with the counsel of his witan³.

Examples of this usage in the German
laws.

Such in fact was the traditional theory of all the German races. The Burgundian laws are stated to be issued by Gundebald 'ex tractatu nostro et communi omnium voluntate,' and are signed by thirty-two *comites*⁴. The Salian laws had been settled by the Franks and their proceres before they were repromulgated by Clovis and Charles⁵; those of the Lombards were issued by Rotharis, 'cum primatibus meis iudicibus⁶;' those of the Alemannians are reissued by King Clothair with his princes, thirty-three bishops, thirty-four dukes, and sixty-two comites, 'vel caetero populo⁷.' The Bavarian laws are re-enacted, reformed, and augmented, 'apud regem et principes suos et apud cunctum populum⁸.'

In the
Frank laws.

The Capitularies of the Merovingian kings of Neustria, who to a certain extent aped Roman forms and ruled mainly over a conquered population of Romanised Gauls, are more distinctly imperative; but Childebert of Austrasia declares, before he issues his 'decretio,' that he has treated of the matter with his *optimates*⁹. And when the Austrasian influence becomes supreme, the form reverts at once to the ancient type. Carloman ordains 'per consilium sacerdotum et optimatum¹⁰;' Pippin 'cum consensu episcoporum sive sacerdotum vel servorum Dei consilio; sive comitum et optimatum Francorum¹¹;' Charles the Great augments the Lombard laws as emperor, king of Italy, and conqueror¹², but his Capitularies are the result of synodical deliberation often expressed and generally implied. The suc-

¹ Schmid, Gesetze, pp. 184-187.

² Ibid. pp. 198, 199.

³ Ibid. pp. 250, 251.

⁴ Lindenbrog, p. 267; Canciani, iv. 13, 14.

⁵ Lindenbrog, pp. 313, 314; Canciani, ii. 10, 13, 15, 121.

⁶ Canciani, i. 63.

⁷ Lindenbrog, p. 363; Canciani, ii. 323.

⁸ Lindenbrog, p. 399; Canciani, ii. 296; Baluze, i. 18. In all these cases the Codes are republishations of national laws, for the attestation of which the witness of the wise would be absolutely necessary.

⁹ Baluze, i. 11 (A.D. 595).

¹⁰ Ibid. i. 103; Karloman, c. i. § 1.

¹¹ Baluze, i. 133.

¹² Ibid. i. 247.

ceeding Karolingians acknowledge almost always the counsel and consent of their optimates, in a way remarkably contrasted with the legislation of the third race, and with the principles of the imperial system which they imagined themselves to represent. Instead of 'quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem,' Charles the Bald, in the famous Edictum Pistense, enunciates the doctrine that 'lex consensu populi fit et constitutione regis¹,' the consent of the people being sought not merely in the assembly of the chiefs but, as we have seen, in the acceptance by the mallus.

Counsel and consent in legislation.

The laws in the enactment of which the witenagemot joins are not merely secular ones: the ecclesiastical legislation of Ini, Alfred, Ethelred and Canute is, equally with the temporal, transacted with the counsel of the witan. The great influence exercised by the bishops and other ecclesiastics in the assembly may account for the fact that no jealousy of this legislation appears during this long period. Even the more distinctly ecclesiastical assemblies which, like the councils of Clovesho² and the synod of London under King Edmund³, issued canons and spiritual dooms of their own, admitted the great counsellors of the kingdoms to their sittings, and allowed their acts to be confirmed by lay subscription. That in both cases the spiritual witan prepared the enactments, in the initial as well as in the final form, there can be no question; but it would be unsafe to argue with reference to the spiritual dooms of the general witenagemots, that this participation of the lay witan was admitted simply to give public or legal ratification to the resolutions of the clergy. It is more probable that in this, as in the action of the folkmoets, the distinction between spiritual and temporal authorisation, as also between moral or religious and legal obligation, was very lightly drawn. The Legatine Councils of A.D. 787⁴, which in their very nature were entirely ecclesiastical, were attended by kings and ealdormen as well as by bishops and abbots, and must therefore

Ecclesiastical laws of the witenagemots.

¹ Baluze, ii. 120. Edict. Pistense, § 6.

² Council of Clovesho, A.D. 747: 'Anno autem regni Aedilbaldi regis Merciorum, qui tunc aderat cum suis principibus ac ducibus, xxxii^o.' Councils, &c. iii. 362.

³ Schmid, Gesetze, pp. 172, 173. Edmund, i. I. preamble.

⁴ Councils, &c. iii. 447-461.

be numbered amongst true witenagemots. Amongst the ecclesiastical articles which come most naturally within the scope of secular confirmation, are the enforcement of Sunday and festival holydays, the payment of tithe, the establishment of the sanctity of oaths, of marriage and of holy orders, all of them frequent matters of early legislation¹.

Consent of the witan to royal grants
of land.

54. A second class of subjects submitted to these councils, of which we have abundant documentary evidence, concerns the transfer of lands², and especially the grants made by charters which turn folkland into bookland. It is not necessary to suppose that every transfer of land required the assent of a court of law, although it might be necessary that it should be conducted under a certain form and before witnesses; that form being symbolical, before as well as after the use of charters for the purpose. Still, in cases where a large grant of private estate was made by a powerful person, to the possible detriment of his heirs, the confirmation of the gift might be sought in the witness of the witenagemot and even by a ratification under their hand and that of the king. And this was no doubt the reason why so many monastic charters of confirmation passed under the eye of this assembly. But where folkland was turned into bookland, that is, where a grant was made by which the land given was released from the obligations of folkland and made alodial or heritable for ever, the consent of the nation, the owner of the folkland, was imperatively necessary. In such cases the king who makes the grant states that it is done with the advice and consent of the principes³. The subscribing witnesses are of course the

¹ Kemble's seventh canon, Saxons, ii. 222: 'The king and the witan had also power to regulate ecclesiastical matters, appoint fasts and festivals, and decide upon the levy and expenditure of ecclesiastical revenue.' Cf. Gneist, Self-government, i. 44.

² Kemble's tenth canon, Saxons, ii. 225: 'The witan possessed the power of recommending, assenting to, and guaranteeing grants of land, and of permitting the conversion of folkland into bookland, and vice versa.' See also i. 305.

³ This is the case in a very large proportion of charters; e.g. that of Ceolwulf of Mercia to Archbishop Wulfred in A.D. 823; 'Actum est . . . cum consensu et consultu episcoporum meorum ac principum quorum nomina adnotata tenentur &c.' Cod. Dipl. cexvii. Egbert's grant to Shaftesbury: 'Ego Egbertus gratia Dei Occidentalium Saxonum rex, cum consensu et

principes whose counsel and consent are rehearsed in the body of the grant, and who were the witenagemot in session. It is with such a form that Ethelwulf added twenty hides of land to his own inheritance in A.D. 847¹; and in the great majority of royal grants the circumstances were the same. Occasionally a king made a grant out of his private estate with like formality; the necessity for counsel and consent in such cases arising probably from the immunities which formed part of the grant². Where the witness of a select body of freemen was necessary even for the sale of cattle, it cannot be regarded as improbable that in the case of land also security would be sought by publicity quite as much as by careful performance of the legal routine. That the great majority of the charters are gifts to churches may show that, notwithstanding the pious liberality of the period, such endowments required special guarantees; in most other transfers where neither folkland nor any prominent public right was concerned, the transaction would be completed by a 'livery of seisin' in the presence of the neighbours. In the greater gifts the witenagemot occupies an analogous position to that held by the townsmen when they admit the new comer to his share in the common land. The gift of a king to one of his courtiers³ would require the same security and publicity as a grant to a church; both would be very liable to be resumed. That the participation of the witan in royal grants had any connexion with the supposed right of the comites to limit the liberality of their princeps is a theory that cannot bear investigation for a moment⁴. The members of the witenagemot whose consent is generally rehearsed, the ealdormen and bishops, did not, as ealdormen and bishops, stand in the relation of comites to the king; it is far more in concert with history to understand these acts as based on the

Examples.'

Publicity and security thus acquired.

communi consilio episcoporum et principum meorum ac totius plebis mee seniorum, hanc testimonii cartulam conscribere jussi.' Ibid. ccxxii.

¹ Kemble, C. D. cclx; a similar act of Offa is mentioned, ibid. mxix. Edgar also (ibid. mcclv) takes an estate of five hides and frees it, with the attestation but without the expressed counsel and consent of the witan.

² E. g. Ethelwulf in A.D. 841: 'dabo et concedo Beornmodo Hrobensis ecclesiae episcopo aliquam partem terrae juris mei . . . cum consilio et licentia episcoporum et principum meorum.'

³ E. g. Cod. Dipl. mcccxvi, ccliii.

⁴ Kemble, C. D. i. pref. pp. cii-civ sq.

ancient right of the community to regulate all changes of ownership which affected their own body. This principle of course applies primarily and necessarily to conversions of public land into private estate.

Judicial
power of the witenagemot.

55. The witenagemot was, further, a court of justice, although only in the last resort, or in cases in which the parties concerned were amenable to no other than the royal jurisdiction¹. They decided suits and tried criminals. Of the contentious jurisdiction there are sufficient proofs in the charters²; the chroniclers furnish less abundant, but not less satisfactory, proof of the exercise of a criminal judicature also. The witenagemot of Northumbria condemned Wilfrid to imprisonment and exile in the seventh century³: Elfric, Ethelweard, Swegen, and Alfgar were outlawed by like assemblies in the eleventh⁴: and even in Norman times the Anglo-Saxon chronicler does not find a better name for the court of the justiciar that hanged forty-four thieves at Hundehoge in A.D. 1124, than 'gewitenemot'⁵. The criminal jurisdiction was much the same under Edward the Confessor as it had been in the days of Tacitus. The king and witenagemot may be said to have possessed a supreme jurisdiction 'over all persons and over all causes,' although from the nature of the case it may not have been frequently exercised. The sentence of outlawry issued so often in the struggle between the houses of Leofric and Godwin may stand as the best illustration⁶.

¹ Kemble's twelfth canon, Saxons, ii. 229: 'The witan acted as a supreme court of justice both in civil and in criminal causes.' The eleventh (ibid. ii. 228), 'The witan possessed the power of adjudging the lands of offenders and intestates to be forfeit to the king.'

² Examples will be found in Cod. Dipl. ccxx, ccxlv, mcelviii; many of the earlier and more interesting suits were decided by arbitration in the ecclesiastical councils, which were to a certain extent international and cannot be regarded as simple witenagemots; e.g. Cod. Dipl. elxxxvi, cexix.

³ Eddius, V. Wilfr.

⁴ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1020, 1051, 1055. Cod. Dipl. mcccxi: 'synodale concilium ad Cyrneccastre universi optimates mei simul in unum conveniunt et eundem Elfricum majestatis reum de hac patria profugum expulerunt et universa ab illo possessa mihi jure possidenda omnes unanimo consensu decreverunt.' So Leofsin was condemned by the sapientes for the murder of Aefic the high reeve. Cod. Dipl. dccxix; Chr. Sax. A.D. 1002.

⁵ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1124.

⁶ The cases of grant of forfeited land quoted by Kemble, Saxons, ii. 53, 228, are Cod. Dipl. mexii, mcccxv, ccelxxiv, mcccxi. The king receives in the same way the lands of a person dying intestate, ibid. mxxxv.

56. The imposition of extraordinary taxation was directed by the king with the counsel of the witan¹; this is more especially conspicuous in the case of the taxes levied for war against the Danes, or to buy off their hostility. In A.D. 991 tribute was given to the Danes by decree of the witan, amongst whom the Archbishop Sigeric and the ealdormen Ethelweard and Elfric are specially mentioned²; three years later the unhappy king 'procerum suorum consilio,' levied sixteen thousand pounds for the same purpose; the measure was repeated under the same advice in A.D. 1002, 1007, and 1011³. These are indeed the only cases of extraordinary imposts of which there is any record: the maintenance of the royal state being fully provided for by the proceeds of the royal farms and public lands, and all local requirements being met by the alodial obligations discharged by personal service.

Taxation by king and witan.

The participation of the witan in the determination of war and peace⁴, in the direction of the fleet and army⁵, as well as in the furnishing of funds, is abundantly proved by the chronicles of the same reign. The highest subject on which their general powers of deliberation could be exercised is exemplified in the acceptance of Christianity by the Northumbrian witan, as related by Bede⁶. It may be safely affirmed that no business of any importance could be transacted by the king in which they had not, in theory at least, a consultative voice⁷.

General
political deliberation.

57. As one of the chief powers of the councils of the Germania was the election of the principes, and as the consent of

¹ Kemble's eighth canon, Saxons, ii. 223: 'The king and the witan had power to levy taxes for the public service.'

² Chron. Sax. A.D. 991.

³ Chron. Sax.; Flor. Wig.

⁴ Kemble's third canon, Saxons, ii. 213: 'The witan had the power of making alliances and treaties of peace, and of settling their terms.' See the peace of Alfred and Guthrum; and the terms made by Ethelred with Olaf, Chron. Sax. A.D. 994.

⁵ Kemble's ninth canon, Saxons, ii. 224: 'The king and his witan had power to raise land and sea forces, when occasion demanded.' Chron. Sax. A.D. 999, 1047, 1048. They also arranged for the command of the fleet. Ibid. A.D. 1052.

⁶ Hist. Eccl. ii. 13.

⁷ This is Kemble's first canon, and it is large enough to cover all the rest. Saxons, ii. 204: 'First, and in general, they possessed a consultative voice and a right to consider every public act which could be authorised by the king.'

Election of
ealdormen.

the witenagemot to the deposition of the ealdormen was apparently requisite¹, it is probable that in theory the election of those officers belonged to the king and witan conjointly². But the constant tendency, in all the important offices, to the principle of hereditary succession, must have been a limit to the exercise of the right; and it would not be safe to regard the expressed consent of the witan as an absolute condition of appointment. In the election of bishops the same uncertainty of both theory and practice exists. In the earliest days the kings of Northumbria and Kent deliberated on the election to Canterbury, as a matter of international interest³: and in A.D. 1051 Edward the Confessor summarily set aside the choice of the monks⁴. Dunstan was appointed 'ex respectu Divino et sapientum consilio'⁵. Edward the Confessor appointed Archbishop Robert in a witenagemot at London, and nominated Spearhafoc to London at the same time⁶. Yet nothing can be more certain than that in many cases the clergy and even the people of the dioceses were consulted. Alcuin writes to the priests of York, urging them to make a right election⁷: the chapter of St. Paul's could exhibit a bull of Pope Agatho conferring on them the exclusive right⁸. A bishop of Lichfield in the ninth century declares himself elected by the whole church of the province⁹; and Helmstan, of Winchester, in A.D. 839,

Of bishops.

¹ See the Chronicle, A.D. 1055; Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 126.

² Kemble's sixth canon, Saxons, ii. 221: 'The king and the witan had power to appoint prelates to vacant sees.' The same right with respect to the ealdormen is discussed, ibid. ii. 148, 149.

³ Bede, H. E. iii. 29: 'Cum electione et consensu sanctae ecclesiae gentis Anglorum.'

⁴ V. Edw. Conf. (ed. Luard) p. 400: 'Rodbertus vero . . . regis munere archiepiscopus, totius ecclesiae filiis hanc injuriam pro nisu suo reclamantibus.' It was done in a gemot at London. Chron. Sax. A.D. 1050.

⁵ See the contemporary life of Dunstan, in Memorials of St. Dunstan, pp. 36, 38. Flor. Wigorn. A.D. 959. Oskytel was made archbishop in A.D. 971, by favour of the king and his witan: Chron. Sax. A.D. 971. Elfric was chosen by Ethelred and all his witan in 995. Ibid.

⁶ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1050.

⁷ Alcuin writes in A.D. 796 to a powerful man in Northumbria, urging him to defend the freedom of the election to York, and to the clergy of York praying them to avoid simony. Alc. Epp. 40, 48; Councils, &c. iii. 499, 500.

⁸ Councils, &c. iii. 161.

⁹ 'Quoniam me indignum fanulum tuum tota ecclesia provinciae nostrae sibi in episcopatus officium elegerunt.' Councils, &c. iii. 613.

mentions the pope, the king, the church of Winchester, and all the bishops, optimates, and nation of the West Saxons, as joining in his appointment¹. It is probable then that under the hept-archic kings the action of the churches was comparatively free in this respect, and that the restriction was a result of the growth of royal power: but that, like all other ecclesiastical business, the appointment of bishops was a matter of arrangement between the parties concerned: the election by the clergy was the rule in quiet times, and for the less important sees; the nomination by the king in the witenagemot was frequent in the case of the archiepiscopal and greater sees; the consent of the national assembly to the admission of a new member to their body being in all cases implied, on behalf of the most important element in it, by the act of consecration performed by the comprovincial bishops².

Election of bishops.

58. Of all elections, the most important was no doubt that of the kings; and this belonged both in form and substance to the witan³, although exercised by them in general assemblies of the whole nation. The king was in theory always elected, and the fact of election was stated in the coronation service throughout the middle ages, in accordance with most ancient precedent. It is not less true, that the succession was by constitutional practice restricted to one family, and that the rule of hereditary succession was never, except in great emergencies and in the most trying times, set aside. The principle may be generally stated thus,—the choice was limited to the best qualified person standing in close relationship to the last sovereign: for it is seldom, except in case of revolution or conspiracy, that any one but a son or brother is chosen; and in the case of a king dying in mature years, his eldest son would be, and was in practice held to be, in every respect

Election of kings.

¹ 'A sancta et apostolicæ sedis dignitate, et ab congregatione civitatis Wentanæ, necnon Æthel . . . regis et episcoporum optimatorumque ejus et totius genti Occidentalium Saxonum unanimiter ad episcopalis officii gradum electus.' Councils, &c. iii. 622.

² Gneist regards the bishops as royal nominees far too exclusively. Self-government, i. 44; Verwaltungsrecht, i. 73.

³ Kemble's fourth canon, Saxons, ii. 214: 'The witan had the power of electing the king.' Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 593-597.

Formal election of the king.

the safest successor¹. It may be sufficient however here to lay down the rule, that both the formal election preparatory to the act of coronation, and the actual selection when the necessity for a free choice occurred, belonged to the witan: they included among them both the principes or national magistrates, to whom, on the most ancient precedents of heathen times, the power appertained; the bishops, whose recognition by the act of anointing and coronation was religiously viewed as conveying the Divine sanction, and as requisite for the enforcement of the moral duty of the subject; and the ministri or personal retainers of the crown, whose adhesion, expressed in their particular oath of fealty, was in the highest degree necessary for the safety and peace of the new reign². The recognition by the assembled people was a complementary security, but implied no more real right of admission or rejection than belonged to the persons actually present: for the crowd that surrounded the coronation chair was no organised or authorised representation of the nation³.

The three-fold sanction.

Deposition of the king.

The right of deposing a worthless king seems to be a corollary from the right of election⁴; but it is not in reality so simple a matter either in history or in theory; for the right of an elected, accepted, crowned and anointed king, is fenced round with sanctions that cannot be broken by the mere resolution of his electors. The cases in which the power was exercised

Cases of deposition.

¹ Hallam, M. A. ii. 273. The instances in which express mention is made of the act of election, are collected by Kemble, Saxons, ii. 215-219, and Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 591. They are, Alfred (Asser, M. H. B. 477, Sim. Dun. A.D. 871); Edward the Elder (Ethelwerd, c. 4, M. H. B. 519); Athelstan (Chron. Sax. A.D. 924); Edred, 'electione optimatum subrogatus' (Cod. Dipl. cccxi); Edgar 'eligitur' (Flor. Wig. A.D. 957); Edward (Flor. Wig. A.D. 975); Ethelred (Chron. Sax. 979); Edmund (Chron. Sax. A.D. 1016); Canute (Chron. Sax. A.D. 1017); Harold I. (Flor. Wig. A.D. 1035; 'consentientibus quam plurimis majoribus natu,' A.D. 1037, 'rex eligitur'); Edward the Confessor (Chron. Sax. A.D. 1042); Harold (Flor. Wig. A.D. 1066).

² In the case of Alfred it is said, 'a ducibus et a praesulibus totius gentis eligitur et non solum ab ipsis verum etiam ab omni populo adoratur.' Sim. Dun. ad 871. Edred 'frater ejus (i. e. Edmundi) uterinus, electione optimatum subrogatus, pontificali auctoritate eodem anno catholice est rex et rector ad regna quadripartiti regiminis consecratus.' Cod. Dipl. cccxi.

³ Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 591.

⁴ Kemble's fifth canon, Saxons, ii. 219: 'The witan had the power to depose the king, if his government was not conducted for the benefit of his people.'

by the witenagemot must be dealt with singly. Most if not all of these belong to the heptarchic period. In the eighth century there were fifteen kings of Northumbria all duly elected, of whom at least thirteen ended their reigns by extraordinary means¹: of these, two, Ceolwulf and Eadbert, are recorded to have resigned quietly and entered the ranks of the clergy; one, Osric, is simply said to have been killed; three, Osred, Oswulf, and Elfwald, were slain by conspiracy of their own officers or retainers; two, Eadwulf and another Osred were expelled by similar bodies without being murdered; Os-

In North-
umbria.

¹ The order of their reigns is as follows:—

1. Aldfrith, died in A.D. 705. Bede, H. E. v. 18.
2. Eadwulf, 'de regno quod duos menses tenuit, conjuratione facta adversus eum expulsus est.' Edd. V. Wilfr. c. 57.
3. Osred, son of Aldfrith, 'cognatorum insidiis caesus,' W. Malmesb. G. R. § 53. 'Immatura et terribili morte praeventus.' Ep. Bonif. 59.
4. Coenred, 'infirmatus.' Henry of Huntingdon, } foedo exitu auras pol-
M. H. B. 734. } luere. W. Malmesb.
5. Osric, killed. Chron. Sax. A.D. 731. } G. R. § 53.
6. Ceolwulf, brother of Coenred, 'captus, attonsus et remissus est in regnum;' Cont. Bedae, A.D. 731: 'sua voluntate attonsus regnum Eadbercto reliquit;' Ibid. A.D. 737.
7. Eadbert, 'filius patruī Ceolwulfi'—'accepta Sancti Petri tonsura, filio suo Oswulfo regnum reliquit.' Ibid. A.D. 758.
8. Oswulf, 'a suis ministris facinorose occisus,' ibid. A.D. 759; 'occisus est nequiter a sua familia,' Sim. Dun. A.D. 758.
9. Ethelwald, 'a sua plebe electus;' Cont. Bed. 759: 'regnum amisit in Winchenheale;' Sim. Dun. A.D. 765.
10. Alcred, 'prosapia Idae regis exortus.' Ibid. 'Consilio et consensu suorum omnium, regiae familiae ac principum destitutus societate, exilio imperii mutavit majestatem.' Ibid. A.D. 774.
11. Ethelred, son of Ethelwald, 'tanto honore coronatus.' Ibid. 'Expulso de regali solio et in exilium fugato.' Ibid. A.D. 779.
12. Elfwald, son of Oswulf, 'conjuratione facta ab ejus patricio, Sicgan nomine, miserabili occisus est morte.' Ibid. 788.
13. Osred, son of Alcred: 'dolo suorum principum circumventus et captus ac regno privatus attonsus est—coactus exilium petit.' Ibid. 790. 'De exilio sacramentis et fide quorundam principum clam restit captus occisus.' Ibid. 792.
11. Ethelred venore; killed by his subjects in A.D. 796. Sim. Dun.:—Letter of Alcuin to Offa; Councils, iii. 499.
14. Osbad: 'patricius a quibusdam ipsius gentis principibus in regnum est constitutus et post xxvii dies omni regiae familiae ac principum est societate destitutus, fugatusque et de regno expulsus.' Sim. Dun. A.D. 796.
15. Eardulf: 'De exilio vocatus regni infulis est sublimatus.' Sim. Dun. 796. 'Regno et patria pulsus.' Einhard, A.D. 808. 'Per legatos Romani pontificis et domini Imperatoris in regnum suum reducitur.' Ibid.; Councils, iii. 561.

Deposition
of Northum-
brian kings.

bald was set up and set aside by a faction; of the end of Coenred we are told nothing, but that it was calamitous; Alcred was deprived of his kingdom by the counsel and consent of his own people, that is no doubt by regular act of the witenagemot; his predecessor, Ethelwald, lost his kingdom at Wincenheale, the meeting-place of the Northumbrian councils,—most probably therefore by a similar act; Ethelred was displaced in A.D. 779, and restored in A.D. 790, only to be murdered six years later by equally competent authority; Eardulf was expelled from his throne and country in A.D. 808, and sought restoration through the intercession of the pope and emperor. In Wessex the tale is somewhat different: during the same period Ini, following the example of his predecessor, Ceadwalla, resigned his crown and went to Rome; Ethelheard and Cuthred, who followed him, reigned as long as they lived; Sigebert, the next king, was¹, after a year's reign, deposed by Kynewulf and the West Saxon witan, one province being left him for his maintenance; Kynewulf was murdered, and Brihtric was poisoned by his wife. In such a record it is scarcely wise to look for constitutional precedents². The depositions, however, of Alcred and Sigebert, stand out as two regular and formal acts; the authority by which they were sanctioned being fully though briefly stated, the deposition not being followed by murder, and, in one case, provision being made for the support of the royal dignity. It is probable that these instances might be multiplied, if we had fuller details as to the conspiracies by which the Northumbrian kings were unseated. The depositions of Alcred and Sigebert may have been the result of a conspiracy, and those of the others may have been determined in a witenagemot, all under the inspiration of a competitor for the throne: but in these cases, on any theory, the deposition was

Example in Wessex.

¹ Chron. Sax. A.D. 755: 'This year Cynewulf and the West Saxon witan deprived Sigebert of his kingdom, except Hampshire, for his unjust doings.'

² The deposition of Beornred, king of Mercia, in A.D. 758, related in the Vitae duorum Offarum, by Matthew Paris (ed. Wats, pp. 10, 11), is scarcely historical, but may be quite true: 'Pro eo quod populum non aequis legibus sed per tyrannidem gubernaret, convenerunt in unum omnes tam nobiles quam ignobiles, et Olfa duce . . . ipsum a regno expulerunt.' M. Paris, ed. Luard, i. 342, 343.

decreed in the national council. Whether such depositions were completed by any act of degradation or renunciation of allegiance, we are not told: at a later period, when coronation and the national recognition by homage and fealty were regular parts of the inauguration of a king, something more than a mere sentence of the supreme court would have been necessary, if all such ceremonies had not been summarily dispensed with by murder. In the cases of Ceolwulf and Eadbert, the voluntary tonsure was regarded as a renunciation of the rights conferred by coronation. In the cases in which the expulsion or deposition is said to be the result of conspiracy or desertion of the 'familia' of the luckless prince, we have an indication of some process on the part of the comitatus, the ministri, or king's thegns, analogous to the renunciation of allegiance in feudal times. But our authorities are scanty and brief, and even if such conjectures are true, it would be unsafe to regard these cases as instances under a general rule. The time was one of unexampled civil anarchy, and there is no instance in which, without the pressure of a competitor, who had perhaps an equal title to the throne by hereditary or personal qualifications, a king was simply set aside for misgovernment. The immorality and other misdeeds of the Northumbrian kings would have been amply sufficient to justify more regular proceedings than a succession of conspiracies among their near kinsmen.

Complication of the question.

Scarcity of constitutional precedents.

Among the descendants of Egbert three cases occur; the West Saxons discard Ethelwulf after his return from Rome, in favour of Ethelbald: the Mercians reject Edwy and elect Edgar; and the whole kingdom renounces Ethelred the Unready. In the first two instances, however, it is a revolt or civil war rather than a legal deposition, and it results in a division of an ill consolidated kingdom between two competitors. Ethelred also is renounced in favour of his conqueror, rather than formally deposed, and the action of the witan is more clearly concerned with his restoration than with his expulsion¹.

Later cases exceptional.

In all these points, the actual exercise by the witenagemot of their allowed and recognised right, must have depended very much on the circumstances of the case, and on the character of Rights really exerted by the witan.

¹ V. S. Dunstani, p. 35; Asser, M. H. B. p. 471; Flor. Wig. A.D. 1014.

Real exercise of powers by the witan.

the sovereign with whom they had to deal. It is in legislation alone that we can affirm that their right to advise and consent was invariably recognised; their participation in grants of land is not much less frequently particularised, but is often mentioned in a way that shows it to have been formal and perfunctory, and after the end of the tenth century often ceases to be expressed at all. The election to the office of ealdorman was regulated more by the king's favour and by hereditary claims, than by a substantive selection, except in a few extraordinary cases; that to the episcopal sees was limited both by canonical custom and by the piety or determination of the king; in either case, the election might easily obtain constitutional confirmation, for both the friends of the monks and the retainers of the king were numerous in the gemot. Thus the English king, although fettered both in theory and in practice by important restrictions, was scarcely more like the king of German antiquity than like the king of feudal times. He was hedged in by constitutional forms, but they were very easy to break through, and were broken through with impunity wherever and whenever it was not found easier to manipulate them to the end in view. The reason why the West Saxon kings of united England had so few difficulties with either clergy or lay counsellors may have been that, their power of increasing the number of their dependents in the witenagemot by nomination being admitted, they could at any time command a majority in favour of their own policy. Under such circumstances, the witenagemot was verging towards a condition in which it would become simply the council of the king, instead of the council of the nation; the only limit on the power of nomination being on the one hand the importance of canonical sanction, and on the other the difficulty of setting aside hereditary claims among the ealdormen and the ministri. The feudal principle advances until it stands face to face with the determination of the tax-payer.

59. The king¹ then, who crowns the fabric of the state, is neither a mere ornamental appendage nor a ruler after the imperial model. He is not the supreme landowner, for he cannot without consent of the witan add a portion of the public land to his own demesne. He requires their consent for legislation or taxation, for the exercise of jurisdiction, for the determination of war and peace. He is elected by them, and liable to be deposed by them. He cannot settle the succession to the throne without their sanction. He is not the fountain of justice, which has always been administered in the local courts; he is the defender of the public peace, not the autocratic maintainer of the rights of subjects who derive all their rights from him. But, notwithstanding, he is the representative of the unity and dignity, and of the historical career of the race; the unquestioned leader of the host; the supreme judge of appeal. The national officers are his officers; the sheriffs are his stewards; the bishops, ealdormen, and witan are his bishops, ealdormen, and witan. The public peace is his peace; the sanction which makes him inviolable and secure, is not the simple toleration of his people, but the character impressed on him by unction and coronation, and acknowledged by himself in the promises he has made to govern well and maintain religion, peace, and justice.

¹ On the origin of the word king, see Max Müller's Lectures on the Science of Language, ii. 282, 284; Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 583, 584; Grimm, R. A. p. 230; Schmid, Gesetze, p. 551. Max Müller decides that 'the old Norse konr and konungr, the old high German chuninc, and the

The limited character of the kingship.

Royalty has besides many distinctive and most important privileges or prerogatives; rights which only in a very modified way exist among the subjects, and which are practically limited only in a slight degree by the action of the council. In the first place, it is hereditary; that is, the successor or competitor possible to the reigning sovereign, cannot be any merely ambitious ealdorman or factious neighbour; royalty, though elective, belongs to one house, one family, always kept within very narrow proportions by the hazardousness of their employments, by Privileges of royalty.

Anglo-Saxon cyning, were common Aryan words, not formed out of German materials, and therefore not to be explained as regular German derivatives. . . . It corresponds with the Sanskrit ganaka . . . It simply meant father of a family.' Therefore it is not cyn-ing, the child of the race. But the Anglo-Saxons probably connected the cyning with the cyn more closely than scientific etymology would permit; witness such words as cyne-hlaford, in which however we are told that cyne means nobilis, not genus. Schmid, Gesetze, p. 551. Sir F. Palgrave's idea of deriving the word from the Celtic cen, 'head,' and the notion connecting it with 'can' and 'cunning' are alike absurd.

private jealousy, and not unfrequently by stern cruelty¹. The king is safe from competition, except by his own immediate kinsmen, and if he live long enough to have a grown-up son, he may count surely on not being deposed. This mark seems to be universal: the Visigoths are the only tribe of Germanic connexion which we know to have maintained royalty unfettered by hereditary right, and that only in their decline, and after the extinction of the house of Alaric. In all other cases, save that of simple alodial inheritance, public offices were filled and political position bestowed by nomination or election for life only. As hereditary sovereign, the king had every inducement to labour for the consolidation of the state, the government of which he should leave to his son, and not for the mere accumulation of wealth or territory for heirs who would sink into a private station when he was gone.

The king had, in the next place, a large property in land and revenue. His property in land may fall under three heads: first, his private estate, which he could dispose of by his will, and which might be either bookland², or folkland of which he had taken

¹ The example of Northumbria (above, p. 137) may suffice for heptarchic times. In the West Saxon family, after the reign of Egbert, the chief exceptions to hereditary succession are found in the fact that the four sons of Ethelwulf followed in order of birth, the brother being preferred to the son of the last king; Alfred at least certainly succeeded, although he had two nephews, sons of an elder brother. But in this case it may be observed, (i) that the kingdoms held by Ethelwulf were not yet consolidated; Ethelstan had reigned as king of Kent with Ethelwulf until A.D. 850, Ethelbald had been king of Wessex from A.D. 856; Ethelbert had been king of Kent as early as A.D. 853 (Cod. Dipl. cclxix); and during the reign of Ethelred, Alfred had been secundarius, that is, had probably an inchoate royalty of a stronger character than that of heir presumptive; so that the family arrangement which provided for the descent of the inherited estate (see Alfred's Will) may have been followed in the succession to the kingdom also: (ii) the sons of the elder brother must have been minors at the time of Alfred's succession. That Edward the Elder should succeed his father to the exclusion of his cousins, was quite natural. The sons of Edward the Elder succeed one another in the same way; Athelstan however seems to have had no children: and as Edmund was only eighteen when he began to reign in 940, his children must have been infants when he died in 946. It is not necessary here to examine into the nature of Alfred's anointing at Rome, which Asser describes as royal unction, but which has been explained of confirmation. See Pauli, Life of Alfred (ed. Thorpe), pp. 54, 84; Kemble, C. D. cccxiv; Liber de Hyda, p. 327.

² Such as are disposed of in the wills of Alfred and Edred. Liber de Hyda, pp. 62, 153.

Election of kings, fettered by hereditary right.

The royal estates.

leases of lives ; secondly, the proper demesne of the crown comprising palaces and their appendant farms, the cyninges botl and the cyninges tun, and even cities and burghs founded upon old royal estates : these belonged to the king as king, and could not be alienated or burdened without the consent of the witenagemot¹. And he had, thirdly, rights over the folkland of the kingdom, rather of the nature of claim than of possession ; the right of feorm-fultum for himself, and that of making provision for his followers with the consent of the witan. After the reign of Ethelred, this third class of property seems to have been merged in the crown demesne.

Various titles to royal estate of land.

Under the head of revenue may be placed the fines and other proceeds of the courts of law which the king shared as guardian of the peace² ; the right of maintenance or procurations for himself and his retinue in public progresses³ ; the produce of wreck and treasure trove⁴, mines and saltworks⁵ ; the tolls and other dues of markets, ports and transport generally⁶ ; and the heriots and other semifeudal payments resulting from the relation between the sovereign and his special dependents⁷. The existence of many of these sources of income is known only from grants of land in which they are retained or remitted. It is probable that the character of many of them varied much from time to time ; but there is no subject on which we have less information than the administration of public revenue in the Anglo-Saxon times : a curious point of contrast with the age that follows, that of Domesday and the Pipe Rolls. With these sources of profit may be noted such minor rights as the protection of strangers, and the power of erecting bridges and castles⁸. The higher price set on the king's life⁹, the wergild payable to his kin on his violent death, testifies to the importance attached Revenue of the crown.

The king's wergild.

¹ See a grant of Ethelred II to Abingdon (Cod. Dipl. mcccxii), in which he carefully distinguishes between his propria hereditus, which he could alienate, and the terrae regales et ad regios filios pertinentes, the alienation of which the witan had refused to sanction. Kemble, Saxons, ii. 30.

² Kemble, Saxons, i. 157 ; ii. 54, 55.

³ Ibid. i. 152 ; ii. 58-61.

⁴ Ibid. ii. 55, 64.

⁵ Ibid. ii. 69.

⁶ Ibid. ii. 75.

⁷ Ibid. ii. 98 sq.

⁸ Ibid. ii. 88, 91.

⁹ Ibid. i. 153 ; ii. 32 ; Schmid, Gesetze, p. 552. Allen, Prerogative, pp. 36, 40 ; Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 21.

The king's wergild and cynebot.

to his person. By the Mercian law it was 7200 shillings, by that of the North people 15,000 thrymsas, or nearly half as much again. A fine of equal amount, the cynebot, was at the same time due to his people. The existence of these regulations may be interpreted as showing that the idea of treason against the king was as yet unknown, no other punishment being prescribed for the regicide, and the value of the king's life being made to differ in degree only from that of the subject¹. How far this is true in theory we may consider further on; as to the fact, it may be stated that in the earliest laws no wergild is assigned to the king, and hence it may be inferred that none would be accepted; in the cases in which it is assigned, the sum is so large that it would necessitate the enslaving of the murderer and his kin, if not such a failure of payment as death alone could expiate. The fines for transgressing the king's protection, breaking into his 'burh,' and injuring his dependents, were correspondingly high, but not so much so as to imply a difference in kind from like offences against private men.

Honorary
privileges.

The raised seat or throne, the crown or royal helmet, the sceptre, the standard, tufa or lance², all the ordinary insignia of historical royalty, seem to have been used by one or other of the Anglo-Saxon kings. The ceremony of anointing and coronation has however an especial interest in their case.

Consecration, including crowning and unction.

60. The royal consecration in its most perfect form included both coronation and unction. The wearing of a crown was a most ancient sign of royalty, into the origin of which it is useless now to inquire; but the solemn rite of crowning was borrowed from the Old Testament by the Byzantine Cæsars; the second Theodosius was the first emperor crowned with religious ceremonies in Christian times³. The introduction of the rite of anointing is less certainly ascertained. It did not always accompany coronation, and, although usual with the later emperors, is not recorded in the case of the earlier ones, whilst in the middle ages the kings of England, France, Jerusalem and Sicily, were the only sovereigns below the imperial rank who were entitled to it. There is no evidence that Theodosius was anointed, but his successor Justin certainly was; and in general where unction is stated to have taken place, coronation may be understood to have accompanied it. It is not easy to determine, when crowned and anointed kings are spoken of rhetorically, whether anything more is meant than a figurative statement that their power is ordained of God: and consequently the fact that Gildas speaks thus of the British kings can scarcely be pleaded as actual evidence of the performance of the rite¹. S. Columba however ‘ordained,’ that is crowned and consecrated, King Aidan of Dalriada². The unction of Clovis by S. Remigius, so far as it is true at all, is better understood of his baptism than of his coronation³; and between Clovis and Pippin there is no authenticated case of any Frank king being anointed⁴, although it was customary among the Visigothic kings of Spain⁵. From the ancient Pontifical ascribed to Egbert archbishop of York, we learn that the English kings were both crowned with a helmet and anointed⁶. Whether the custom was borrowed

¹ Allen, Prerogative, p. 40: 'It appears . . . from these legal and historical details that in early times he had no other security for his life than what the law afforded to the meanest of his subjects.'

² Sceptra, Sim. Dun. ad. 755; tufa, Bede, H. E. ii. 16.

³ Maskell, Monumenta Rituaia, iii. p. iv; Robertson, Essays, pp. 203-215. The word 'consecration' would as a rule imply unction and, a fortiori, coronation. But the unction of Alfred at Rome was rather a prophetic and presumptive inauguration than a formal act, and can scarcely have included coronation. Alfred at any rate did not receive the title of king with it, and it is most reasonably referred to his confirmation.

Origin of
coronation
and unction.

¹ Gildas, Hist. cxix. (M. H. B. 12): ‘Ungebantur reges et non per Deum; sed qui caeteris crudeliores extarent; et paulo post ab unctoribus non pro veri examinatione trucidabantur, aliis electis trucidantibus.’

² ‘Sanctus verbo obsecutus Dōmini ad Iovam transnavigavit insulam ibidemque Aidanum iisdem adventantem diebus in regem, sicut erat jussus, ordinavit.’ Adaman, V. S. Columbae; ed. Reeves, p. 198. Councils, &c. ii. 108.

³ Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 130, 131; iii. 219. Maskell regards the whole as a fabrication, Mon. Rit. iii. p. vi. Waitz refers the unction to the baptism. Clovis wore a diadem, after receiving the consular insignia from Constantinople, D. V. G. ii. 133. Cf. Hallam, M. A. i. 107, 108.

⁴ Waitz, D. V. G. iii. 61.

⁵ Robertson, Essays, p. 204. Waitz, D. V. G. iii. 63.

⁶ Pont. Egb. (Surtees Soc.) pp. 100-105. See also Kemble, Saxons, i. 155. Bede does not, so far as I remember, mention any coronation or unction. The ancient Northumbrian annals, used by Simeon of Durham, say of Ethelred of Northumbria, A.D. 774, ‘tanto honore coronatus’; of Eadbert, A.D. 758, ‘regnum sibi a Deo collatum’; of Eardulf, A.D. 796, ‘regni infulus est sublimatus, et in Eboraea, in ecclesia Sancti Petri, ad altare beati apostoli Pauli, ubi illa gens primum perceperat gratiam baptismi, Import of the ceremony.

from the Britons or taken direct from the Old Testament may be made a matter of question. The ceremony was understood as bestowing the divine ratification on the election that had preceded it, and as typifying rather than conveying the spiritual gifts for which prayer was made¹. That it was regarded as conferring any spiritual character or any special ecclesiastical prerogative there is nothing to show: rather from the facility with which crowned kings could be set aside and new ones put in their place without any objection on the part of the bishops, the exact contrary may be inferred. That the powers that be are ordained of God, was a truth recognised as a motive to obedience, without any suspicion of the doctrine, so falsely imputed to churchmen of all ages, of the indefeasible sanctity of royalty². The same conclusion may be drawn from the compact made by the king with his people and the oaths taken by both. If coronation and unction had implied an indefeasible right to obedience, the oath of allegiance on the one side, and the promise of good government on the other, would have been superfluous. Yet both were given.

Royal oath of accession.

61. The undertaking of the king to govern righteously is not improbably a ceremony of much older date than either of the symbolical rites. But the earliest instance of an oath to that effect is that of Caribert king of Paris, father of the Kentish consecratus est.³ Of the other kingdoms we have no contemporary Chronicles; but the consecration of Egfrith the heir of Offa is mentioned in the Chronicle under the year 785, and there is a charter of Ceolwulf of Mercia in which he mentions his consecration as having been performed by Archbishop Wulfred on the 15 Kal. Oct. 822. (Cod. Dipl. cexvi.) The coronation of Edmund, king of the East Angles, does not rest on any good authority; but the practice had probably become general before the time of Alfred. Florence of Worcester mentions the consecration of Athelstan at Kingston, A.D. 924; that of Edred at the same place in A.D. 946; that of Edwy, also at Kingston, in A.D. 955; but none of these are specified in the Chronicle. The Chronicles (not contemporary) which give an account of Egbert's consecration at Winchester, are of no authority whatever. Ethelwerd states that Edward the Elder was crowned at Whitsuntide in the year after Alfred's death: he also mentions the coronation of Edgar.

¹ The term 'christus Domini,' the Lord's anointed, applied to kings in the canons of the legatine synod of A.D. 787, must be regarded as a presumptive evidence of the existence of the practice commonly at that date. Councils, &c. iii. 453.

² The statements of Allen, Prerogative, p. 22, on this point are very shallow and unfair. To attribute the ideas of the seventeenth century to the ages of S. Gregory, Anselm, and Becket seems an excess of absurdity.

Queen Bertha, who is recorded to have sworn that he would not inflict new laws and customs upon his people, but would thenceforward maintain them in the state in which they had lived under his father's rule, and that he would impose on them no new ordinance, to their damage; there is some doubt however to whom the promise was made¹. In the Pontifical of Egbert the declaration is made in the form of a decree²: 'It is the duty of a king newly ordained and enthroned to enjoin on the Christian people subject to him these three precepts; first, that the Church of God and all the Christian people preserve true peace at all times; secondly, that he forbid rapacity and all iniquities to all degrees; thirdly, that in all judgments he enjoin equity and mercy, that therefore the clement and merciful God may grant us His mercy.' In almost exactly the same form is the oath taken by Ethelred the Unready at the bidding of Dunstan³: 'In the name of the Holy Trinity, three things do I promise to this Christian people my subjects: first, that God's Church and all the

Oath at consecration.

¹ Greg. Turon. ix. 30: 'Post mortem vero Chlothacharii regis, Chariberto regi populus hic sacramentum dedit; similiter etiam et ille cum juramento promisit, ut leges consuetudinesque novas populo non infligeret, sed in illo quo quondam sub patris dominatione statu vixerant in ipso hic eos deinceps retineret, neque ullam novam ordinationem se inflicturn super eos quod pertineret ad spoliurn, spondidit.' See Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 158, 161.

² Pont. Egb. p. 105. Select Charters, pp. 61, 62. I quote the Pontifical of Egbert under that name as usually given to it; but it is by no means clearly ascertained whether the service it contains is to be regarded as an edition by Egbert of a service for an Anglo-Saxon coronation, or as a common form already in use. It certainly appears to contain the germ of the ceremony which was expanded in later times according to local circumstances; as in the service for the Emperor Henry, Canciani, i. 281. On the later question, as to whether the kings of France borrowed their service from England, see Selden, Titles of Honour, pp. 177, 189; and Maskell, Mon. Rit. iii. 14, 15. In the service of Charles V of France (MS. Cotton Tiberius B. 8) the archbishop prays for the king, 'ut regale solium videlicet Saxonum, Merciorum, Nordanchimbrorum scepra non deserat.' Maskell further quotes a service for the coronation of the king of the Franks in which the prayer runs 'et totius Albionis ecclesiam deinceps cum plebibus sibi anuexis ita enutriat, &c.;' and the form given by Canciani may be compared in both particulars. The conclusion seems pretty certain that English MSS. had been used for the original drawing up of the service in both instances. See also Freeman, Norm. Conq. iii. 622-625. The earliest coronation service that we have, to which a certain date can be given, is that of Ethelred II, printed in Taylor's 'Glory of Regality.'

³ Kemble, Saxons, ii. 36: from Reliquiæ Antiquæ, ii. 194. Maskell, Mon. Rit. iii. 5. Memorials of S. Dunstan, p. 355.

Royal oath. Christian people of my realm hold true peace ; secondly, that I forbid all rapine and injustice to men of all conditions ; thirdly, that I promise and enjoin justice and mercy in all judgments that the just and merciful God of his everlasting mercy may forgive us all.' The promise made by the same Ethelred on his restoration to the throne in A.D. 1014, is an illustrative commentary on this, for it shows the alteration in the relations of the king and his people which had taken place since the more ancient oath was drawn up ; 'he promised that he would be to them a mild and devoted lord, would consent in all things to their will : whatever had been said of reproach or shame, or done frowardly to him or his he would placably condone ; if all with one mind and without perfidy would receive him to the kingdom¹.' The promise to do the will of his people although they receive him as their lord is a step towards the form of the medieval coronation oath, 'to maintain just laws and protect and strengthen as far as lies in you, such laws as the people shall choose, according to your strength.'

Oath of the people to the king.

62. The duties and obligations of the people towards the king may very probably have taken the form of an oath of allegiance in primitive times, although no such form has been preserved. The Frank kings on their accession made a progress through their kingdoms, showed themselves to the nation and received an oath from all². The oath does not however appear in our own records until the ancient idea of kingship had been somewhat modified. It is first found in the laws of Edmund, and it there bears the same mark as the legislation of Alfred respecting treason³. 'All shall swear, in the name of the Lord, fealty to King Edmund as a man ought to be faithful to his lord, without any controversy or quarrel, in open and in secret, in loving what he shall love, and in not willing what he shall not will⁴.' This

¹ Flor. Wigorn. A.D. 1014.

² Greg. Turon. vii. 7 : 'Priores quoque de regno Chilperici . . . ad filium ejus . . . se collegerunt, quem Chlotharium vocitaverunt, exigentes sacramenta per civitates quae ad Chilpericum prius aspexerant, ut scilicet fideles esse debeant Gunthramno regi ac nepoti suo Chlothario.' Also ix. 30, quoted above ; other instances are given by Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 158.

³ See Chapter VII.

⁴ Edmund, iii. § 1. Select Charters, p. 66.

however is no unconditional promise; for the oath taken by the man to his lord, on which the above is framed, specially adds 'on condition that he keep me as I am willing to deserve, and fulfil all that was agreed on when I became his man and chose his will as mine¹.' But it is not the less clear that the obligation, though mutual and conditional still, is not the mere right and duty of both to maintain the peace of the people, but a stage in the development of those mutual relations by which the subject became personally dependent on the sovereign as lord rather than as king.

63. The greatest constitutional prerogative of the king, his right to nominate and maintain a *comitatus*² to which he could give territory and political power, is marked by similar developments. Like the Frank king, the Anglo-Saxon king seems to have entered on the full possession of what had been the right of the elective princes: but the very principle of the comitatus, when it reappears in our historians, had undergone a change from what it was in the time of Tacitus; and it seems to have had in England a peculiar development and a bearing of special importance on the constitution. In Tacitus the comites are the personal following of the princeps; they live in his house, are maintained by his gifts, fight for him in the field. If there is little difference between companions and servants, it is because civilisation has not yet introduced voluntary helplessness. The difference between the comites of the princeps and the household of the private man³ depends fundamentally only on the public and political position of the master. Now, the king, the perpetual princeps and representative of the race, conveys to his personal following public dignity and importance. His gesiths and thegns oath.

Conditional

The royal comitatus, gesiths or companions.

¹ Oaths; Schmid, Gesetze, p. 405: 'In illo Deo pro quo sanctum hoc sanctificatum est, volo esse domino meo N. fidelis et credibilis, et amare quae amet, et abscondere quae abscondet, per Dei rectum et seculi competentiam, et nunquam ex velle et posse, verbo vel opere, quicquam facere quod ei magis displiceat; ut me teneat sicut deservire volo, et totum mihi compleat quod in nostra praelectione fuit, quando suus deveni et ejus elegeri voluntatem.'

² See Kemble, Saxons, i. 162; K. Maurer, Wesen des ältesten Adels, &c. pp. 137 sq.; Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 388 sq.

³ Gneist, Self-government, i. 6. K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 396. G. L. von Maurer, Hofverfassg. i. 138-142. The equivalents of gesith (comes) are hlafeta, the loaf-eater, who eats the bread of the hlaford; fol-garius, the follower; geneat, the companion (genoss). See above. p. 24.

The royal
gesiths.

are among the great and wise men of the land. The right of having such dependents is not restricted to him, but the gesith of the ealdorman or bishop is simply a retainer¹, a pupil or a ward²: the free household servants of the ceorl are in a certain sense his gesiths also. But the gesiths of the king are his guard and private council; they may be endowed by him from the folkland and admitted by him to the witenagemot. They supply him with an armed force, not only one on which he can rely, but the only one directly amenable to his orders; for to summon the fyrd he must have the consent of the witan. The Danish huscarls of Canute are a late reproduction of what the familia of the Northumbrian kings must have been in the eighth century³. The gesiths are attached to the king by oath as well as by gratitude for substantial favours⁴; they have exempt jurisdictions from which the national officers are partially excluded, and dependents of their own whom they may make available for the king's service. The king is not therefore left alone in forlorn majesty like the later Merovingian monarchs; he is his own mayor of the palace, the leader of his own comitatus, and that comitatus supplies him with strength both in the council and in the field. But the chief importance of the gesiths lies in their relation to the territorial nobility, at its origin.

64. It has been sometimes held that the only nobility of blood⁵ recognised in England before the Norman Conquest was

¹ Others besides kings and ealdormen might have gesiths or gesithcundmen in dependence on them; see Ini, § 50. The under-kings of Hwicca retained the right of endowing their comites; see Cod. Dipl. xxxvi, cxvii, cxxv. So too Queen Ethelswitha of Mercia; ibid. cxcxviii, cxcix.

² The household of Wilfrid is described by Eddius, c. 21, 'principes quoque saeculares, viri nobiles, filios suos ad erudiendum sibi dederunt, ut aut Deo servirent si eligerent, aut adultos si maluissent regi armatos commendaret.' No wonder king Egfrith was jealous of his 'innumerus sodalium exercitum, regalibus vestibus et armis ornatum.' Ibid. c. 24.

³ K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 400. The huskarlar are of three classes (1) Servants; (2) Gestir, who do the king's business abroad and meet at his table only on holydays, guests; (3) Hiredmenn, the inmates of the court.

⁴ Cod. Dipl. clxxix. Cenulf grants land to Suithun 'eo videlicet jure si ipse nobis et optimatibus nostris fidelis manserit minister et inconvulsus amicus.' Ibid. ccccxxvii. Edwy describes Elfhre as 'cuidam comiti non solum mihi per omnia fidei subjectione obtemperanti, verum etiam in omnibus meum velle subjiçienti.' Ibid. ccccxlxi. 'vassallo.'

⁵ On the subject of nobility see K. Maurer, Ueber das Wesen des ältesten that of the king's kin¹. The statement may be regarded as deficient in authority, and as the result of a too hasty generalisation from the fact that only the sons and brothers of the kings bear the name of ætheling. On the other hand must be alleged the existence of a noble (edhiling) class among the continental Saxons who had no kings at all: and the improbability that the kindred nations should undertake so large expeditions for conquest and colonisation with but one noble family in each, or that every noble family that came to England should succeed in obtaining a kingdom². The common use of the word nobilis in Bede and Eddius shows that the statement is far too sweeping, and the laws of Ethelbert prove the existence of a class bearing the name of eorl of which no other interpretation can be given³. That these, eorlas and æthel, were the descendants of the primitive nobles of the first settlement, who, on the institution of royalty, sank one step in dignity from the ancient state of rude independence, in which they had elected their own chiefs and ruled their own dependents, may be very reasonably conjectured: and when the heptarchic kingdoms gathered in the petty royalties of the earlier date, and were themselves in turn gathered in under the West Saxon supremacy, the numbers of the families which claimed blood nobility must have largely increased, whilst the accumulation of power in the king's hand must have at the same time widened the interval between nobility and royalty. The rise of royal dignity and the diminishing importance of the ancient nobles may likewise have tended to restrict the title of ætheling to the royal house. And this would certainly follow as soon as Question as to the existence of a nobility of blood.

The eorl and æthel.

Adels der Deutschen Stämme, München, 1846, and Krit. Ueberschau, iii. 424-440.

¹ Thorpe's Lappenberg, ii. 312, 313. The Franks had no true ancient nobility, such as the rest of the German tribes had. Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 280-291. See above, p. 55.

² K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 424. See Bede, H. E. iii. 14: 'nobilibus simul atque ignobilibus,' translated 'æthelum and unæthelum'; similar expressions are countless. For the 'eorl' see Ethelbert's laws, §§ 13, 14, 75, &c. &c. Schmid, Gesetze, pp. 566-568. The word eorl is said to be the same as the Norse jarl, and another form of ealdor (?); whilst the ceorl answers to the Norse karl; the original meaning of the two being old man and young man. See Max Müller, Lectures on Language, ii. 280.

³ K. Maurer, Wesen des ältesten Adels, &c. p. 187.

Changes of names and titles.

the nobility of blood began to be merged in the much more numerous nobility of official and territorial growth. The ancient name of eorl, like that of ætheling, changed its application and, under the influence perhaps of Danish association, was given like that of jarl to the official ealdorman. Henceforth the thegn takes the place of the æthel, and the class of thegns probably embraces all the remaining families of noble blood. The change may have been very gradual; the north people's law of the tenth or early eleventh century still distinguishes the eorl and ætheling with a wergild nearly double that of the ealdorman and seven times that of the thegn¹: but the north people's law was penetrated with Danish influence, and the eorl probably represents the jarl rather than the ealdorman, the great earl of the fourth part of England as it was divided by Canute². The eorlriht to which the successful thegn might aspire, and which he perhaps acquired by the possession of forty hides, may possibly be otherwise explained than by the supposition of a class of eorls as distinct from ealdormen, of which the histories preserve no individual names³.

Peculiar growth of nobility by service.

65. The development of the comitatus into a territorial nobility seems to be a feature peculiar to English History. Something of the kind might have occurred in the other Germanic races if they had not been united and assimilated under the Frank empire, and worked out their feudalism under the influence of the Frank system. The Lombard gasind, and the Bavarian sindman were originally the same thing as the Anglo-Saxon *gesith*⁴. But they sank into the general mass of vassalage as it grew up in the ninth and tenth centuries. And Frank vassalage, although it superseded and swamped the comitatus,

¹ The wergild of the king is 15,000 thrymsas, and his cynebot the same; the wergild of the archbishop and ætheling or eorl is 15,000; that of the bishop and ealdorman, 8000; that of the hold and high reeve, 4000; that of the thegn, 2000; that of eorl, 267. Schmid, Gesetze, pp. 396, 397.

² Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, ii. 281, refers the ealdorman and thegn to Saxon Northumbria, the earl and hold to the Scandinavian lords. This is most probable, but it is unnecessary to suppose the document earlier than the time of Canute.

³ See below, p. 157, n. 2.

⁴ Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 182; iv. 190. Grimm, R. A. p. 318; G. L. von Maurer, Hofverfassg. i. 167-170.

grew out of circumstances entirely unconnected with it¹. The practice of commendation and the beneficiary system were the basis of it. The beneficiary system bound the receiver of land to the king who gave it; and the act of commendation placed the freeman and his land under the protection of the lord to whom he adhered; the result was to bring all the landholders of the country gradually into personal dependence on the king. Each of these practices had its parallel in England. The bestowal of folkland, however, rather presupposed than created the close relation between the king and the receiver of the gift, and in most cases it was made to a gesith in consideration of past services, implying no new connexion. The choice of a lord by the landless man for his surety and protector, and even the extension of the practice to the free landowner who required such protection, was less liable here than on the continent to be confounded with feudal dependence, and in fact created no indissoluble relation. Hence the important difference. The comitatus with its Peculiar features of Anglo-Saxon

vassalage.

¹ Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 262: 'It is usual to derive the later vassalage from the ancient comitatus, but there are no grounds whatever for doing so. The former, wherever we find it, appears in wider extension, in relation to private persons as well as to the king; in relation to them it gives no honours or rights such as the members of the comitatus enjoyed; nor does it create that close personal connexion in which the comites stand to their lord.' See also vol. iv. 210 sq. The dependent might be connected with the king (1) by service, (2) by comitatus, (3) by commendation, (4) by reception of land as a benefice. Frank feudalism grew out of the two latter, the English nobility of service from the two first. It is not contended that either the principles at work in English society or the results at which they arrived before the Norman Conquest were very different from the corresponding influences and results on the continent; but they had a distinct history which was different in every stage, especially in the point that, as in so many other things, the personal relation in England takes the place of the territorial, as it was in France; and the feudalism that followed the Conquest was Frank and territorial, that which preceded it grew from personal and legal, not from territorial influences. On the growth of Frank feudalism, see Waitz, as quoted above; on the growth of dependence among the English, see the following chapter. Here the important point is this, that whereas the later Anglo-Saxon nobility grew out of gesith-ship and thegn-ship, on the continent the feudal nobility grew out of vassalage, the beneficiary system and immunity. There are however two points in question, (1) the creation of the Anglo-Saxon nobility of service, and (2) the creation of the general system of dependence of which the king was the centre and head: of these only the first is here noticed. In the Frank empire the beneficiary system is unconnected with the comitatus, in the English they are in the closest connexion. See below, p. 251, n. 2.

antrustions is on the continent absorbed in the landed vassalage. The comitatus of gesiths and thegns forms the basis of a new and only partially vassalised nobility.

Change in the character of the gesith.

But in the process the character of the gesith and thegn is largely modified. He who had at first been a regular inmate of the king's house begins to have an estate of land assigned him. He may be a noble, the son of a landed noble, like Benedict Biscop, who received a provision of land from King Egfrith which he resigned when he became a monk¹. To the folkland the sons of the nobles, and the warriors who had earned their rest, looked for at least a life estate²; and according to Bede the pretended church endowments, the pseudo-monasteries, of his day had so far encroached on the available stock as to be a public evil. It is unreasonable to suppose that the relation to his lord diminished at all the personal status of the gesith³. In the time of Tacitus, the noble German did not blush to be seen amongst the comites. Beowulf the son of the noble Ecgtheow became the gesith of King Hygelac, and when he rose to be a chieftain had lands, treasures, and gesiths of his own⁴. Of gifts of land to the gesiths we have abundant instances in the charters, and in almost every instance in which the comes is mentioned by Bede, it is as possessor of an estate. In this respect almost at the dawn of History the character of the association is varied: the ancient comes lived with his lord, and was repaid for his services by gifts and banquets; the English gesith, although bound by oaths to his lord still, lives on his own domain. There are still

¹ 'Cum esset minister Osuiu regis et possessionem terrae suo gradui competentem illo donante perciperet, . . . fastidivit possessionem caducam ut acquirere posset aeternam; despexit militiam cum corruptibili donativo terrestrem, ut vero Regi militaret, regnum in superna civitate mereretur habere perpetuum.' Bede, Hist. Abbatum, c. 1.

² 'Quod enim turpe est dicere, tot sub nomine monasteriorum loca hi qui monachicae vitae prorsus sunt expertes in suam ditionem acceperunt . . . ut omnino desit locus ubi filii nobilium aut emeritorum militum possessionem accipere possint; ideoque vacantes . . . hanc ob rem vel patriam suam pro qua militare debuerant trans mare abeuntes relinquunt, vel &c. &c.' Bede, Letter to Egbert, c. 7.

³ Kemble regards the status of the comes as unfree, 'the unfree chattel of a prince,' Saxons, i. 175; see above, p. 26, n. 2.

⁴ Kemble, Saxons, i. 168. Beowulf, ed. Thorpe, v. 391.

of course gesiths without land¹, who may live in the palace; but the ancient rule has become the exception.

Closely connected with the gesith is the *thegn*²; so closely that The thegn. it is scarcely possible to see the difference except in the nature of the employment. The thegn seems to be primarily the warrior gesith; in this idea Alfred uses the word as translating the miles of Bede³. He is probably the gesith who has a particular military duty in his master's service. But he also appears as a land-owner. The ceorl who has acquired five hides of land, and a special appointment in the king's hall, with other judicial rights, becomes thegn-worthy; his oath and protection and wergild are those of a *thegn*⁴. The thegn therefore is now the possessor of The land-owning thegn. five hides of land, and as such bound to service in war, not necessarily by his relation to the king, but simply as a land-owner. And from this point, the time of Athelstan, the gesith is lost sight of except very occasionally; the more important

¹ Ini, §§ 45, 50, 51, 63. K. Maurer, Wesen d. ält. Adels, &c. pp. 138, 139. Maurer understands the gesith of Ini's law, where contrasted with the thegn, as the landless gesith, p. 141. He also maintains that the original difference was that the gesith was bound only to military service, whilst the thegn had a special office in the court over and above the military one; the second stage is reached when the thegn has special service in the field; and a third when the military service is united to the possession of five hides, pp. 160-163.

² Thegn, 'thege[n], vir fortis, miles, minister.' Kemble, Saxons, i. 131, who however, at p. 169, regards the word as meaning originally a servant. Waitz compares the gesith with the Frank antrustion, and the thegn with the vassus; D. Verfassgs.-Geschichte, i. 363. K. Maurer identifies the geneat with the gesith (Wesen des ältesten Adels, &c. p. 146), and points out that the original meaning of thegn is not a servant, but a warlike man. Its origin is not the same as that of the German diener, to serve; the cognate word with which is thcow, a slave. See too K. Maurer, Kritische Ueberschau, ii. 389.

³ Bede, H. E. iii. 14: 'Divertitque ipse cum uno tantum milite (thegn) sibi fidelissimo nomine Tondheri, celandus in domo comitis (gesithes) Hunvaldi, quem etiam ipsum sibi amicissimum autumabat . . . ab eodem comite (gesith) proditum eum Osuiu, cum praefato ipsius milite (thegn) per praefectum (gerefan) suum . . . interfecit.' Hist. Eccl. iv. 22: 'Ad dominium ipsorum, comitem (gesith) videlicet Aedilredi regis, adductus; a quo interrogatus quis esset, timuit se militem (cyninges thegn) fuisse confiteri,' &c.

⁴ As the Danish wars compelled the king to call out the whole population to arms and not to rely on his own comitatus, or on his gesiths and king's thegns, the distinction of the king's thegn from other landowners disappeared (K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 409, 410), and the gesith with it.

The gesith
disappears.

members of the class having become thegns¹, and the lesser sort sinking into the rank of mere servants to the king. The class of thegns now widens; on the one hand the name is given to all who possess the proper quantity of land whether or no they stand in the old relation to the king²; on the other the remains of the older nobility place themselves in the king's service. The name of thegn covers the whole class which after the Conquest appears under the name of knights, with the same qualification in land and nearly the same obligations³. It also carried so much of nobility as is implied in hereditary privilege. The thegn-born are contrasted with the ceorl-born; and are perhaps much the same as the gesithcund. Such thegn-born and gesithcund men may themselves be called thegns even where they hold no land, but they do not acquire the privilege of their blood until they have reached the third generation from the founder of the family dignity⁴.

Nobility of the thegn.

Under the name of thegn are included however various grades of dignity⁵. The class of king's thegns is distinguished from

¹ This is self-evident in the case of the laws. As to charters the following is the general conclusion; down to the time of Egbert grants are made to comites and ministri in nearly equal numbers; Ethelwulf's grants are all to ministri; so are those of his successors down to Edmund who grants twice to his comites Ethelstan and Eadric, both of whom are ealdormen; and from this time comes frequently has that signification; the terms miles (Cod. Dipl. cccxxvi, mclvi, mclviii), homo (ccclxxxvi, ccccxi), and vassallus (ccccxxxi, mlxxx) occur occasionally during the tenth century. It would appear from this that the use of the word gesith in Alfred's translation of Bede may have been an intentional archaism.

² This is the great point maintained by K. Maurer, Wesen d. ält. Adels, p. 158; who asserts that in the later Anglo-Saxon times, the king's service without the five hides did not confer the rank of thegn, whilst the five hides without the king's special service did. The whole view is combated by Schmid, Gesetze, pp. 664-668. See Gneist, Self-government, i. 13, 16, 17.

³ Select Charters, p. 87, above p. 155. The word cnicht occurs in the charters occasionally, e. g. Cod. Dipl. dlvii, dexii, delxxxv, dexeiv, mcccii, mcccxxvi, apparently in the sense of minister or thegn to a noble person. See Schmid, Gesetze, p. 548.

⁴ There are doubts about the reading of the passage on which this depends, Wergilds, §§ 9-12. See K. Maurer, Wesen d. ält. Adels, &c. pp. 139, 140; who understands that although every possessor of five hides was a thegn, it was only in three generations that he became gesithcund or ennobled in blood; if a ceorl was a gesith or military follower without the five hides, he was not a thegn and could have only a ceorl's wergild.

⁵ Of the official thegns of the king's household, the hors-thegn, disc-thegn and the rest, it is not necessary to speak here; they are officers, not classes or ranks of society.

that of the medial thegns, and from a residuum that falls in rank below the latter¹. The heriot of a king's thegn by the law of Canute comes midway between that of an eorl and that of the medial thegn. His estate of land would seem then to fall between the forty hides of the one and the five hides of the other². Over a king's thegn none but the king himself could exercise jurisdiction³, whilst there were thegns who were in actual dependence on others bearing the same title⁴; and Canute in one of his charters addresses his thegns as 'twelfhynde and twyhynde,' as if some at least of the order were in wergild indistinguishable from the eorls⁵. Some thegns had socen or jurisdiction over their own lands, and others not⁶. We may well believe that the combinations and permutations of nobility by blood, office and service, would create considerable differences among men bearing the common title. The alodial eorl who for security has commended himself to the king and bears an honorary office at court, the official ealdorman who owes his place to royal favour earned in the humbler status of a dependent, thegns.

Ranks of

¹ Canute, Sec. § 72. Maurer (p. 171) refers this graduation merely to the extent of the possessions held by each class; citing Domesday, Nottinghamshire, p. 280; Yorkshire, p. 298; where the thegn who has more than six manors pays a relief of eight pounds to the king; he who has six or less pays three marks to the sheriff. The custom of Berkshire was different; there the whole armour was given to the king with one horse saddled and another unsaddled. Gneist (Self-government, i. 17) connects the extension of the heriot to alodial owners with the acquisition of the position of thegn by every owner of five hides.

² The forty hides that conveyed the dignity of a procer (Hist. Eliens. ii. 40) are of course eight times the five hides that made a thegn. So the eorl's wergild was 15,000 thrynsas and the thegn's 1200 shillings. I confess that I see no other explanation of the passage and of the similar one in the Ranks, than that the possession of forty hides entitled a man to the wergild and credibility of an earl; it could scarcely confer a claim on the ealdormanship in its character of magistracy, although there is a passage in Hist. Eliens. i. 5 which might lead to such a conclusion. Robertson, Essays, p. 169. But there may have been a rule, such as that of Clothair II (Baluze, i. 16), that no one should be an ealdorman who did not hold forty hides of land in the territory he was to rule; or the forty hides may have been the appanage or official estate of the earl.

³ Ethelred, iii. § 11.

⁴ Ranks, § 3. Select Charters, p. 64.

⁵ Cod. Dipl. dccxxxi. K. Maurer doubts the pertinency of this passage. Such persons were probably the scir-thegns to a large extent, simply land-owners, such as the numerous taini of the Western shires, noticed in Domesday-book. See Schmid, Gesetze, p. 667.

⁶ Canute, ii. § 71. 3.

Different sorts of thegns.

the mere courtier who occupies the place of the ancient gesith, the eorl who has thriven to thegn-right, the landowner of five hides or more, and the smaller landowner who has his own place in the shire-moot, all stand on different steps of dignity. The very name, like that of the gesith, has different senses in different ages and kingdoms; but the original idea of military service runs through all the meanings of thegn, as that of personal association is traceable in all the applications of gesith. The king's thegn was both the landowner and the military gesith. In the latter character he was bound by a very stringent oath of fidelity; and he received from his lord the equipment which was returned as a heriot on his death. He was a member of his personal council, and as such attested the acts of the witenagemot. Sometimes the assent and counsel of the comites is expressed in a charter¹, and occasionally a comes attests a grant, but more frequently the king's retainers style themselves ministri or thegns, and when the term comes ultimately emerges, it is as the translation of eorl or ealdorman, in the century immediately preceding the conquest².

The title of
ætheling.

When the more ancient blood nobility which had existed in the time of Ethelbert of Kent, and survived as late as that of Alfred, had finally merged in the nobility of service, when the eorl and æthel were lost in the thegn, it is no wonder that the title of ætheling was restricted to the king's kin. Then too the position of the eorl seems to have sunk, although not so low as it did after the Conquest: the mere possession of land, however free, was no longer the sole qualification for political power.

The ealdor-
man.

66. Whilst the title of thegn speaks distinctly of the origin of the rank in military service, that of ealdorman evinces equally clearly its connexion with executive government; for although it is sometimes loosely or generically applied as an equivalent to lord, senior, or noble, it is, when given to a particular person, or appearing in a public document, always referable to the chief magistrate of a shire or cluster of shires. It

¹ But only in suspicious documents, such as the grant of Ethelwulf, Cod. Dipl. ml.

² See above p. 111, n. 4.

thus answers to the comes or graf of the continent, and by Asser and the other historians who have used his work, the word comes is employed as its Latin equivalent. Alfred, however, uses ealdorman to translate the princeps of Bede. The use of dux for ealdorman is not rare in the Latin chronicles, and the term is occasionally found in charters as early as the eighth century interchangeably with *princeps*¹. Whether in such cases the dux should be understood to have the military command of the shire, whilst the ealdorman possessed the civil, and the gerefa was simply the guardian of the king's interest; whether the dux ruled over a wider territory than the simple ealdorman; or whether the terms are not really equivalents, can only be conjecturally decided. The dux.

The history of the ealdormanship is thus in close connexion with that of the shire². The smaller principalities of Mercia, retaining, under the rule of Penda and his sons, somewhat of their earlier individuality, have their ealdormen in the descendants of their royal house. Oshere, Osric, and their race³, rule Hwiccia for a century and a half as a hereditary lordship; the ealdorman of the Gyrwas is in the seventh century sufficiently noble to marry the daughter of the king of East Anglia⁴: and the ealdorman of the Gaini in the ninth took a wife of the royal house of Mercia, and gave his daughter as wife to King Alfred⁵. In the cases in which such an origin is clear, the relation of the ealdorman to the king has probably been created by commendation rather than by conquest; and consequently the hereditary descent of the office is only occasionally interfered with by royal nomination, as was the rule in Saxon Northumbria⁶. Ealdormen as under-
kings.

As the heptarchic kingdoms successively came under West Saxon domination, their ruling houses being extinct, ealdormen were placed over them. The Mercian kingdom, or so much of it as was not in Danish hands, was administered by the son-in-law of Alfred as ealdorman, and an attempt was made to render Ealdormen as viceroys.

¹ Cod. Dipl. lxxvii. &c.

² Above, p. 111.

³ See the charters in the Cod. Dipl. lv, lxxxiii, cii, cxvii, cxxv. Cf. Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. cclxxxviii.

⁴ Bede, H. E. iv. 19.

⁵ Asser, M. H. B. p. 475. Her mother was of the royal house of Mercia.

⁶ See the succession in Hoveden, i. 57 sq.

Ealdormen
of shires or provinces.

the dignity hereditary in the person of his daughter¹. Each of the West Saxon shires already had its ealdorman²; and as soon as the subjugation of the Danes made it possible to introduce a uniform shire-administration, the same organisation was adopted throughout the kingdom. But either the arrangement was carried out by the collection of several shires under one ealdorman, or a superior ealdormanship was established over a number of subordinate ones³; for in the time of Edgar and earlier, these great jurisdictions existed, as we have seen already⁴, and led the way for the summary division of the country by Canute into four earldoms, which continued with some slight variations until the Norman Conquest. The title of earl had begun to supplant that of ealdorman in the reign of Ethelred: and the Danish jarl, from whom its use in this sense was borrowed, seems to have been more certainly connected by the tie of comitatus with his king than the Anglo-Saxon ealdorman need be supposed to have been⁵. Hence in the laws of Canute the heriot of the earl appears side by side with that of the thegn, and he himself is included in the servitium nobilitatis. The original idea of the ealdormanship is, however, magistracy or jurisdiction, as implied in the attribute of age, and is not necessarily connected with either nobility of blood or with that of service, or even with the possession of a separate estate of land greater than that of the ordinary freeman.

Title of earl.

¹ Flor. Wig. A.D. 920.

² Ethelwulf is ealdorman of Berks in A.D. 860, Asser, M. H. B. p. 473; Athelhelm of Wilts in A.D. 887, ibid. p. 491; Eanwulf of Somerset, A.D. 867, Ethelw. M. H. B. p. 513; Osric of Hants in A.D. 860, Asser, p. 473; Odda of Devon, A.D. 878, Ethelw. p. 515; Ceolmund of Kent in A.D. 897, Chron. Sax.; Huda of Surrey in A.D. 853, Asser, p. 470; Osric is ealdorman of Dorset in A.D. 845, Chron. Sax. See Palgrave, Commonwealth, Appendix.

³ I cannot find that, after the consolidation of the kingdom, the Mercian shires ever had their own ealdormen like the West Saxon, except Lindsey, the ealdorman of which district was killed at Assandun. They were under the great ealdormen of Mercia; yet Offa had governed by ealdormen, and something must be allowed for the scantiness of records.

⁴ Above, p. 117. Robertson, Essays, pp. 177-189. The title of patricius, which appears from time to time in Anglo-Saxon records from the eighth century to the eleventh, is referred by Robertson to the senior ealdorman of the king's kin; according to Sohm it is equivalent to dux.

⁵ K. Maurer, Wesen d. ält. Adels, p. 180.

67. Although the various origins of the various ranks of dignity are thus involved, the distinction between man and man was sharply drawn for all the most important purposes of judicature by the institution of the wergild. Every man's life had its value, and according to that valuation the value of his oath in the courts of justice varied, and offences against his protection and person were atoned for. The oath of the twelfth-hynd man was worth six times that of the twyhynd man, and twice that of the sixhynd man. Each of the Germanic races had its own tariff of wergilds, varying according to the circumstances of the case¹; as the freemen were mingled more or less with lætic or native races, or affected by the influences of royalty and nobility². In most of the English kingdoms the basis of the calculation was the wergild of two hundred shillings, which marked the ceorl, twyhynd or simple free man. The thegn was worth twelve hundred shillings. The Briton or wealh was worth half as much as the Saxon or Angle: if he possessed five hides he was sixhynd, if he possessed but one he was worth a hundred shillings³. The higher ranks, the king, archbishop, bishop, ealdorman, and earl, were estimated in multiples of the same sort: the king's high reeve was worth twice the thegn, the bishop and ealdorman four times, the king and archbishop six times; but the rules are neither general nor constant.

The wergild as a distinction of rank.

But although English society was divided by sharp lines, and broad intervals, it was not a system of caste either in the stricter or in the looser sense. It had much elasticity in

No caste system.

¹ See them collected by Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, ii. 275-308.

² On this subject, which is in itself of great importance, but cannot be worked out here, see K. Maurer, Wesen des ältesten Adels, pp. 130-132, where the different usages of Kent, Wessex, and Mercia are compared.

³ The sixhynd-man is a difficulty. K. Maurer holds the twyhynd-man to be the landless ceorl, the freeman on another's land; and therefore the sixhynd-man would be the ceorl who had land of his own, but less than five hides, which was the qualification of the twelfth-hynd-man, p. 134; Robertson, Scotland, &c. ii. 280, 297, thought that the British owner of five hides (Inj, § 24) was the only sixhynd-man, and as such proprietors became extinct or merged early in the mass of the people, the rarity of the term may be thus accounted for; but in his Essays (p. xlviiii) he includes the Northumbrian dreng, and also the landless gesithcund-man of Wessex.

Possibility of rising in rank.

practice, and the boundaries between the ranks were passable. The eorl who had thriven so well as to have five hides of land rose to the rank of a thegn; his wergild became twelve hundred shillings; the value of his oath and the penalty of trespass against him increased in proportion; his descendants in the third generation became gesithcund. Nor was the character of the thriving defined: it might, so far as the terms of the custom went, be either purchase, or inheritance, or the receipt of royal bounty. The successful merchant might also thrive to thegn-right. The thegn himself might rise to the rank, the estimation, and status of an eorl.

Intricacy of the system.

68. With such an intricate system was royalty surrounded: a system rendered the more intricate by poverty of nomenclature, variety of provincial custom, and multiplicity of ranks, tenures, and offices. Most of these characteristics belong both to the heptarchic and to the aggregated kingdom. Under the former system the organisation ends here; for no higher machinery either of race or territorial nationality can be shown to have existed until the hegemony of the West Saxon kings began the work of consolidation. At several periods the most powerful monarch of the seven did, as we have seen, exercise a supremacy more than honorary, although not strictly of the nature of government. To such the name of Bretwalda¹ has been given by historians ; but the denomination is not contemporaneous or of common use. It is most probable that the superiority was one of power and influence only ; but it may have been recognised by occasional acts of commendation by which the weaker sovereign placed himself under the protection of the stronger, entering on an alliance for defence and offence in which the determination of the defence and offence belonged to the superior. The commendation was ratified by oath and was one of the chief steps towards organised feudalism. In itself however it was not feudal any more than the comitatus: the origin of the tie in each case being personal and not territorial, whilst in the feudal system the origin of the obligation is in the land, and not in the persons connected by it. Such a theory, however, will not account for all cases in which the title of Bretwalda is given: some may have been due to conquest and occupation of short duration, such as the alternate superiority of Mercia and Northumbria in the seventh century: some to the mere threat of war, or to the flattery of courtiers, or to the renown of the great king whose very name, as in Tacitus's time, settled the fate of battles.

¹ On the Bretwalda see Hallam, M. A. ii. 270, 352, and Archaeologia, xxxii. 245; Kemble, Saxons, ii. 8-22; Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 542-556. Bede, H. E. ii. 5, mentions seven kings who had a primacy (imperium or *ducatu*s)—Ella of Sussex, Ceawlin of Wessex, Ethelbert of Kent, Redwald of East Anglia, Edwin, Oswald, and Oswy, of Northumbria. One of these, Oswald, is called by Adaman, who wrote before Bede, 'totius Britanniae imperator ordinatus a Deo.' The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, A.D. 827, gives to these seven the title of Bretwalda; and makes Egbert of Wessex the eighth. The word occurs in a bilingual charter of Athelstan, Cod. Dipl. mex., as Brytenwalda, translating the title 'rex et rector totius hujus Britanniae insulae.' Kemble, however, derived it from the Anglo-Saxon breotan, to 'distribute,' and explained it 'widely ruling.' Rapin, who seems to have been the first historian who attached much importance to it, regarded it as denoting the headship of a federal union of kings; Sharon Turner also mentions it; Liugard goes so far as to assume that it was a regular title borne by several kings in succession, and arranges the early history under them as Bretwalda I, Bretwalda II, &c. Palgrave went on to connect it with the imperial status of the kings, as sharers in the remains of the Roman Caesarship, and supposed the Bretwaldas to be the successors of the

What was the Bretwalda?

During this period the unity of the church was the only working unity: the law of religion the only universally recognised common jurisprudence. The archbishop of Canterbury stood constantly, as the Bretwalda never stood, at the head of an organised and symmetrical system, all the officers of which were bound by their profession of obedience to him. The archbishop of York governed Northumbria with a much firmer and more permanent hold than the kings, and in secular as well as ecclesiastical matters occupied a position stronger and safer.

Ecclesiastical unity.

British pseudo-emperors Maximus and Carausius. Mr. Freeman of course throws over the latter part of Palgrave's theory, but regards the title as significant of a real and substantial hegemony, though in no way derived from Roman or British dominion. The supremacy of Egbert was acknowledged by all the English princes in Britain, and his successors took titles of emperor, basileus, &c., which express the same supremacy, and although in themselves quaint and pedantic imitations of foreign usage, imply a distinct assertion of the independence of the English crown of all earthly superiority. The Appendix B. to Mr. Freeman's first volume contains all the information on the subject, which is only very incidentally connected with constitutional history.

The bishops of the several kingdoms could meet for common council and issue canons that were of equal validity all over the land. And this fact was recognised by Offa and Egbert, the two kings who made the greatest strides towards a union of the kingdoms. But the origin, growth, and constitutional development of the English church requires separate and independent treatment.

CHAPTER VII.

DEVELOPMENT IN ANGLO-SAXON HISTORY.

69. Development in Anglo-Saxon history from personal to territorial system.—70. Increase of royal power in intension as the kingdom increases in extension.—71. The king becomes lord or patron of the people.—72. He becomes the source of justice.—73. Jurisdiction becomes territorial.—74. The tenure of land affected by the territorialising of judicature.—75. Territorialising of military organisation.—76. Legislation; absence of personal law.—77. Influence of the Danes.—78. Influence of Frank legislation.—79. No real growth of unity.—80. Seeds of national life still preserved.—81. National character.

69. ALTHOUGH the framework of Anglo-Saxon society was permanent, and its simple organisation easily adapted itself to the circumstances that fill the five centuries of its history, it was capable of development and liable to much internal modification, according to the variations of the balance of its parts, and the character of its regulative or motive force. The exact chronological sequence of these variations it is difficult to determine, but as to the fact of the development there can be no question. A comparison of the state of affairs represented in Domesday book with the picture that can be drawn from Bede sufficiently proves it. The ages had been ages of struggle and of growth, although the struggle was often fruitless and the growth ended in weariness and vexation. But the transition is more distinctly apparent if we look back further than Bede, and rely on the analogies of the other Germanic nationalities in drawing our initial outline. And this we are justified in doing by the completeness and homogeneity of the constitution when it first appears to us, and by the general character of the early laws.

Development in Anglo-Saxon
history.

Difficulties of treatment.

But the subject is not without its difficulties: the first and last terms of the development are as remote from each other in character as in date. There is a very great difference between the extreme and confusing minuteness of Domesday and the simplicity and elasticity of the ideal German system of the sixth century: whilst on the other hand the scantiness of our knowledge of the latter is compensated by its clearness, and the abundant information of the former is deprived of much of its value by the uncertainty of its terminology. For it is unquestionable that great part of the Anglo-Saxon customary law, of which Domesday is the treasury, was unintelligible to the Norman lawyers of the next century, on whose interpretation of it the legal historian is wont to rely. The process of change too was very gradual: it is not marked by distinct steps of legal enactment; the charters afford only incidental illustrations, and the historians were, for the most part, too far removed in time from the events they described to have a distinct idea of it, even if it had been possible for the annalist to realise the working of causes in so slow and so constant action. But all the great changes in the early history of institutions are of this character, and can be realised only by the comparison of sufficiently distant epochs. There are no constitutional revolutions, no violent reversals of legislation; custom is far more potent than law, and custom is modified infinitesimally every day. An alteration of law is often the mere registration of a custom, when men have recognised its altered character. The names of offices and assemblies are permanent, whilst their character has imperceptibly undergone essential change.

General
character of the development.

The general tendency of the process may be described as a movement from the personal to the territorial organisation¹; from a state of things in which personal freedom and political right were the leading ideas, to one in which personal freedom and political right had become so much bound up with the relations created by the possession of land, as to be actually subservient to it: the Angel-cynn of Alfred becomes the Engla-lande of Canute.

— The main steps also are apparent. / In the primitive German

¹ Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 62.

constitution the free man of pure blood is the fully qualified political unit¹; the king is the king of the race; the host is the people in arms; the peace is the national peace; the courts are the people in council; the land is the property of the race, and the free man has a right to his share. In the next stage the possession of land has become the badge of freedom; the freeman is fully free because he possesses land, he does not possess the land because he is free; the host is the body of landowners in arms; the courts are the courts of the landowners. But the personal basis is not lost sight of: the landless man may still select his lord; the hide is the provision of the family; the peace implies the maintenance of rights and duties between man and man; the full-free is the equal of the noble in all political respects. In a further stage the land becomes the sacramental tie of all public relations; the poor man depends on the rich, not as his chosen patron, but as the owner of the land that he cultivates, the lord of the court to which he does suit and service, the leader whom he is bound to follow to the host: the administration of law depends on the peace of the land rather than that of the people; the great landowner has his own peace and administers his own justice. The king still calls himself the king of the nation, but he has added to his old title new and cumbersome obligations towards all classes of his subjects, as lord and patron, supreme landowner, the representative of all original, and the fountain of all derived, political right.

Progress from personal to territorial system.

The first of these stages was passed when the conquest of ¹ Sohm, Fr. R. G. Verfg. i. 333 sq., maintains that in the Frank dominion it was not the possession of land but personal freedom that entitled or obliged a man to attend in the courts of law, in the host and other assemblies: and that it was only in trials in which land was concerned that the witnesses were required to have a land qualification (ibid. p. 355). In this as in many other points, this writer combats the received view. 'The full freedom of the German law is, in host and in court, given by personal freedom' (ibid. p. 359). Waitz on the other hand holds that 'the hide was the basis of freedom in the full sense of the word,' D. Verfassgs.-Gesch. i. 120; and 'only he who possessed land was fully qualified in the community' (ibid. iv. 450). See above, p. 78. Where there is so much divergence in the application of terms, it is somewhat dangerous to speak positively about stages of development; and in this, as in many other points, the statements of the text must be understood as referring chiefly if not solely to English history.

Britain was completed¹; and only showed what it had been in the vestiges of the mark system, and in the permanence of the personal nomenclature. The village was the kindred settlement, the hide of land the allotment of the head of the family, the tribal divisions—the hundred, the mægth, the theod,—all personal². The tracing of the process of change under the second and third stages is the problem of Anglo-Saxon Constitutional History. The series is not fully worked out. The Anglo-Saxon king never ceases to be the king of the nation, but he has become its lord and patron rather than its father; and that in a state of society in which all lordship is bound up with landownership: he is the lord of the national land, and needs only one step to become the lord of the people by that title. This step was however taken by the Norman lawyers and not by the English king; and it was only because the transition seemed to them so easy, that they left the ancient local organisation unimpaired, out of which a system was to grow that would ultimately reduce the landownership to its proper dimensions and functions. If the system had in England ripened into feudalism, that feudalism would in all probability have been permanent. Happily the change that produced feudalism for a time, introduced with it the necessity of repulsion. The English, who might never have struggled against native lords, were roused by the fact that their

The great
question of Anglo-Saxon
History.

¹ It may be thought that in granting so much, we are placing the landless Englishman on a lower level than the landless Frank; see the last note. But it is to be remembered that in Gaul and the other Romanised provinces, the fully free Frank was surrounded by a vast servile population, whilst in England the servile class formed a minority comparatively insignificant. The contrast is between full freedom and servitude in the former case; and in the latter between greater and smaller duties and liabilities. But it is quite probable that the rights of attending court and host were burdens rather than privileges to the Anglo-Saxons; and the rule that the landless man must have a lord was a measure rather compelling him to his duty, than depriving him of right. Until that rule was laid down, it is probable that the fully free Englishman, whether he owned land or not, was capable of taking part in the judicial business. Large numbers of landless men must have constantly attended the courts; and mere residence as well as possession of estate must have determined in what court they should attend.

² The mægth of Alfred is the provincia of Bede; the theod lande of Alfred is the regio, the theod being the gens. Bede, II. E. ii. 9, iii. 20, v. 12, &c.

lords were strangers as well as oppressors, and the Norman kings realised the certainty that if they would retain the land they must make common cause with the people.

Five historical events mark the periods within which these changes were working: the accretion of the small settlements in heptarchic kingdoms; the union of the heptarchic kingdoms under the house of Cerdic; the first struggle with the Danes; the pacification of England under Edgar; and the introduction of new forms and principles of government by Canute. Historical landmarks.

70. The development of constitutional life depends largely on the historical career of the nation, on the consolidation of its governmental machinery in equality and uniformity over all its area, on the expansion or limitation of the regulative power for the time being: in other words, on the general and external history marked by these eras; on the extension of the kingdom and on the condition of the royal power. England at the period of the Conversion, when for the first time we are able really to grasp an idea of its condition, was composed of a large number of small states or provinces bound in seven or eight kingdoms¹. The form of government was in each monarchical, and that of the same limited character. By the middle of the tenth century it has become one kingdom, and the royal power is much more extensive in character. During a great part of the intervening period the consolidation of the kingdom and the power of the king have undergone many variations. The tendency towards union has been developed first under one tribal supremacy and then under another, and the royal power, whose growth is of necessity greatly affected by the extension of its territory, and the presence or absence of rival royalties, has fluctuated also. The two of course rise and fall together. But as a rule, at the end of any fixed period, both manifest a decided advance. Growth of the kingdom.

It can scarcely be said that the tendency towards territorial

¹ I use the word heptarchy for the sake of brevity and convenience, and of course without vouching either for its accuracy of form or for its exact applicability to the state of things preceding the West Saxon hegemony. During far the greater portion of its duration there were actually seven kingdoms of Germanic origin in the island, and I see nothing in the term that implies any unity of organisation.

Causes of union of the seven kingdoms.

union proceeded from any consciousness of national unity or from any instinct of self-government. Nor can it be attributed solely to the religious unity, which rather helped than originated such a tendency. This tendency resulted not so much from the strivings of the peoples as from the ambition of the kings. The task which was accomplished by the West Saxon dynasty had been tried before by the rulers of Kent, Northumbria and Mercia, and the attempt in their hands failed. Nor would it have been more successful under the genius of Athelstan and Edgar, but for the Danish invasions, the extinction of the old royal houses, and the removal, to a certain extent, of the old tribal landmarks.

Maintenance of ancient boundaries, and royal families.

The ancient German spirit showed its tenacity in this. The land had been settled by tribes of kinsmen, under rulers who as kings acquired the headship of the kin as well as the command of the host. Whilst the kin of the kings subsisted, and the original landmarks were preserved, neither religion nor common law, nor even common subjection sufficed to weld the incoherent mass. And it may have been the consciousness of this which hindered the victorious kings from suppressing royalty altogether in the kingdoms they subdued: the vassal kings either became insignificant, sinking into eorls and hereditary ealdormen, or gradually died out. But, until after the Danish wars, provincial royalty remained, and the cohesion of the mass was maintained only by the necessities of common defence. When Ethelbert of Kent acquired the rule of Essex, when Ethelred of Mercia annexed Hwiccia, when Egbert conquered Mercia, the form of a separate kingdom was preserved; and the royal house still reigned under the authority of the conquerors until it became extinct. Such a system gave of course occasion for frequent rebellions and rearrangements of territory; when a weak king succeeded a strong one in the sovereign kingdom, or a strong chief succeeded a weak one in the dependent realm. But the continuance of such a system has the effect of gradually eliminating all the weaker elements.

This process of natural selection was in constant working; it is best exemplified in the gradual formation of the seven kingdoms and in their final union under Wessex : the heptarchic king was as much stronger than the tribal king, as the king of united England was stronger than the heptarchic king.

The kings of the smaller divisions disappear first, either altogether, or to emerge for a moment when the greater kingdom itself loses its royal house or falls into decrepitude. In the early days of Mercia, kings of Hwiccia, Hecana, Middle Anglia, and Lindsey, still subsisted¹. Kent in the eighth century broke up into the kingdoms of the East and West Kentings, probably on the lines of the earlier kingdoms which are said to have been united by Ethelbert². In Wessex, besides the kings of Sussex³ which has a claim to be numbered among the seven great states, were kings of Surrey⁴ also. On the death of Kenwalch in A.D. 672, Wessex was divided among the ealdormen (just as the Lombard kingdom broke up on the death of Clephis), and was reunited thirteen years later by Cædwalla⁵: Hampshire was separated

Gradual disappearance of the smaller sovereignties.

¹ The Hwiccian kings were connected with those of Sussex and Northumbria, and were under the protection of the Mercian kings until they sank into the rank of ealdormen. Bede gives to Osric, one of these princes, the title of king, and the see of Worcester no doubt owes its existence to the fact that their national existence apart from Mercia was still recognised. Hecana or Herefordshire was the kingdom of Merewald, one of Penda's sons (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. p. 638), and has Hereford for its see. Middle Anglia was the kingdom of Peada, another of his sons, and retained its separate organisation long enough to have a see of its own,—Leicester, settled like the other three by Theodore. The pedigree of the kings of Lindsey is preserved by Florence (M. H. B. p. 631), and although none of them are known in history, the territory was in dispute between Mercia and Northumbria in 678, so that they could not have been long extinct; its nationality also was recognised by the foundation of a see, at Sidnaeester.

² The existence of the see of Rochester is adduced in proof of the existence of a separate tribal kingdom in Kent, and the same inference is drawn from the fact that double settlements, as in Norfolk and Suffolk (of two fylkis), were common among the German tribes. See Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 342; Robertson, Essays, p. 120; Kemble, Saxons, i. 148. But the historical mention of the East and West Kentings is later: and where two kings are found reigning together they seem to be of the same family.

³ Mr. Robertson infers a twofold arrangement in Sussex from the fact that two ealdormen were slain there by Cædwalla (Essays, p. 120), but Sussex as an independent kingdom must have always been united. After its subjection to Wessex it seems to have had two or three kings at a time. (Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. cclxxiv.) They are no longer heard of under Egbert.

⁴ Frithewold, subregulus or ealdorman of Surrey, was the founder of Chertsey Abbey. Malmesb. G. P. lib. ii. The name seems sufficient to prove it an independent settlement.

⁵ Bede, H. E. iv. 12.

Small provincial kingdoms.

from the body of Wessex in A.D. 755¹, as a provision for the deposed Sigebert. The Isle of Wight had a king of its own². In East Anglia several traditionary kingdoms are commemorated by poetical traditions³. Northumbria was in constant division between Bernicia and Deira: and besides the Anglian and Saxon kingdoms, there were in Cornwall, Wales, Cumbria, and on the borders of Yorkshire⁴, small states of British origin whose rulers were styled kings. These kings were not merely titular; the kings of Hwiccia, in the endowment of their comites, exercised one at least of the most important powers of royalty, and continued to subsist as subreguli or caldormen, ruling their province hereditarily under the sovereignty of Mercia. But they died out, and by their extinction their territory was consolidated permanently with the superior state. And so it probably was in the other cases.

Extinction of the greater kingdoms.

Again when Wessex and Mercia have worked their way to the rival hegemonies, Sussex and Essex do not cease to be numbered among the kingdoms until their royal houses are extinct. When Wessex has conquered Mercia and brought Northumbria on its knees, there are still kings in both Northumbria and Mercia: the royal house of Kent dies out, but the title of king of Kent is bestowed on an atheling, first of the Mercian, then of the West Saxon house⁵. Until the Danish conquest the dependent royalties seem to have been spared; and even afterwards organic union can scarcely be said to exist. Alfred governs Mercia by his son-in-law as caldorman, just as Ethelwulf had done by his

¹ Chron. Sax. A.D. 755.

² Bede, H. E. iv. 16.

³ Thorpe's Lappenberg, i. 117.

⁴ Elmet had a king according to Nennius, M. H. B. p. 76.

⁵ The succession of the later kings of Kent is extremely obscure, and the chronology as generally received is certainly wrong. It would seem that it had become dynastically connected with Wessex in the latter part of the eighth century. Eallmund, father of the great Egbert, was king in Kent in the time of Offa; Chron. Sax. A.D. 784: after Offa's death the kingdom was seized by Eadbert Præn; he was overcome by Kenulf of Mercia, who made his brother Cuthred king; after Cuthred's death it was ruled by Kenulf himself; and on his death was seized by Baldred, who in his turn was conquered by Egbert. Ethelwulf son of Egbert ruled Kent during his father's life; when he succeeded to Wessex, his sons Ethelstan and Ethelbert reigned successively in Kent: and on Ethelbert's succession to Wessex, Kent was consolidated with the rest of Southern England.

son-in-law as king¹: but he himself is king of the West-Saxons; Edward the Elder is king of the Angul-Saxones²; some times 'of the Angles'; Athelstan is 'rex Anglorum' king of the English, and 'curagulus' of the whole of Britain³. The Danish kingdom still maintains an uncertain existence in Northumbria; Mercia under Edgar sets itself against Wessex under Eadwig. At last Edgar having outlived the Northumbrian royalty and made up his mind to consolidate Dane, Angle and Saxon, receives the crown as king of all England⁴ and transmits it to his son.

If the extinction of the smaller royalties opened the way for permanent consolidation, the long struggle with the Danes prevented that tendency from being counteracted. The attempts of Ethelwulf to keep central England through the agency of Mercian and East Anglian subject kings signally failed. It was Influence of the Danish struggle.

¹ Egbert conquered Mercia and deposed King Wiglaf in A.D. 828; he restored him in 830; in 839 Berhtwulf succeeded him and reigned till 851. Burhred his successor was Ethelwulf's son-in-law, and reigned until 874. Ceolwulf his successor was a puppet of the Danes. As soon as Alfred had made good his hold on Western Mercia he gave it to Ethelred as ealdorman, and married him to his daughter Ethelfleda: Ethelred died in 912, and Ethelfleda in 920. Her daughter Elfwin, after attempting to hold the government, was set aside by Edward the elder, by whom Mercia was for the first time organically united with Wessex.

² See Hallam, M. A. ii. 271. Edward is rex 'Angul-Saxonum,' or 'Anglorum et Saxonum,' in charters, Cod. Dipl. cccxxxiii, cccxxxv, mlxxvii, mlxxviii, mlxxx, mlxxxiv, mxc, mxvi; 'Rex Anglorum' simply in cccxxvii; and king of the West Saxons in mlxxxv.

³ A list of the titles assumed by the succeeding kings is given by Mr. Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 548-551. Athelstan's title of Curagulus or Coregulus is explained as derived from cura, caretaker (ibid. p. 552); and as co-regulus or coregulus in its natural sense seems to be opposed to monarcha, it is probable that the derivation is right; the cura representing the mund under which all the other princes had placed themselves.

⁴ On this subject see Mr. Robertson's remarkable essay, Hist. Essays, pp. 203-216; and Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 626. The last Danish king of Northumbria was killed in 954. In 959 Edgar succeeded to the kingdom of the West Saxons, Mercians and Northumbrians. Edgar's coronation at Bath took place immediately after Archbishop Oswald's return from Rome, which may be supposed to have been connected with it. Mr. Robertson concludes that Edgar 'would appear to have postponed his coronation until every solemnity could be fulfilled that was considered necessary for the unction and coronation of the elect of all three provinces of England, the first sovereign who in the presence of both archbishops—of the "sacerdotes et principes" of the whole of England,—was crowned and anointed as the sole representative of the threefold sovereignty of the West Saxons, Mercians and Northumbrians.' The ancient theories about this coronation may be seen in the Memorials of S. Dunstan, pp. 112, 214,

Amalgama-
tion of the Danes with the English.

only Wessex, although with a far larger sea-board, that successfully resisted conquest. Mercia and Northumbria, though conquered with great slaughter, and divided by the victorious Norsemen, exchanged masters with some equanimity, and the Danes within a very few years were amalgamated in blood and religion with their neighbours. The Danish king of East Anglia accepted the protection of the West Saxon monarch and Mercia was brought back to allegiance. Alfred, by patient laborious resistance as well as by brilliant victories, asserted for Wessex the dominion, as his grandfather had the hegemony, of the other kingdoms; and his son and grandsons perfected his work¹.

The king
increases in strength as the kingdom increases in area.

It could not fail to result from this long process that the character of royalty itself was strengthened. Continual war gave to the king who was capable of conducting it an unintermitted hold and exercise of military command: the kings of the united territory had no longer to deal alone with the witan of their original kingdom, but stood before their subjects as supreme rulers over neighbouring states; the council of their witan was composed no longer of men as noble and almost as independent as themselves, ealdormen strong in the affection of their tribes and enabled by union to maintain a hold over the kings, but of members of the royal house itself, to whom the kings had deputed the government of kingdoms and who strengthened rather than limited their personal authority². So, as the kingdom became united, the royal power increased, and this power extending with the extension of the territory, royalty became territorial also. The consolidated realm enters into continental politics and borrows somewhat of the imperial form and spirit ; and this brings on some important changes.

¹ The story that Egbert after his coronation at Winchester directed that the whole state should bear the name of England is mythical. It originates in the Monastic Annals of Winchester, MS. Cotton, Dom. A. xiii; extracts from which are printed in the Monasticon Anglicaum, i. 205. 'Edixit illa die rex Egbertus ut insula in posterum vocaretur Anglia, et qui Juti vel Saxonos dicebantur omnes communi nomine Angli vocarentur.' On the names England and English, see Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. App. A. The era of Egbert's acquisition of the ducatus, by which he dates some of his charters to Winchester (Cod. Dipl. mxxxv, mxxxvi, mxxxviii), must be A.D. 816; and, if the ducatus be really a Bretwaldaship, may be marked by his conquest of West Wales or Cornwall, which is placed by the Chronicles in A.D. 813, but belongs properly to A.D. 815. At this period however Kenulf of Mercia was still in a more commanding position than Egbert.

² See Mr. Robertson's essay on the king's kin; Hist. Essays, pp. 177-189

71. The earliest legislation exhibits the king as already in a position in which personal preeminence is secured and fortified by legal provisions. In the laws of Ethelbert the king's mundbyrd is fixed at fifty shillings, that of the eorl at twelve, and that of the ceorl at six ; and wrongs done to members of his household are punished in proportion¹. These laws mention no wergild for the king, but it seems probable that if there were one it also would be calculated on a like scale. A century later the laws of Wihtræd direct that the king is to be prayed for without command, that is, that intercession for him shall be part of the ordinary service of the church ; his word without oath is incontrovertible, and even his thegn may clear himself by his own oath. The king's mundbyrd is still fifty shillings². The laws of Ini king of Wessex, who was contemporary with Wihtræd, show that in that conquering and advancing kingdom the tendency was more strongly developed. If a man fight in the king's house both his life and property lie at the king's mercy ; his geneat may 'swear for sixty hides' ; his burh-bryce is a hundred and twenty shillings³. But in the reign of Alfred the king's borh-bryce or mundbyrd was five pounds, his burh-bryce a hundred and twenty shillings, whilst that of the ceorl was only five⁴. The value of the protection given by the higher classes rises in proportion to that given by the king, whilst that of the simple freeman remains as before, or is actually depressed. It is by the same code that the relation between the king and his subjects is defined as that between lord and dependent ; 'if any one plot against the king's life, of himself or by harbouring of exiles, or of his men, let him be liable in his life and in all that he has. If he desire to prove himself true, let him do so according to the king's wergild. So also we ordain for all degrees whether eorl or ceorl. He who plots against his lord's life let him be liable in his life to him and in all that he has, or let him prove himself true according to his Earliest status of the Anglo-Saxon king.

Increase in his personal importance.

Law of treason.

¹ Ethelbert, §§ 8, 15, &c.

² Wihtræd, §§ 1, 2, 16, 20.

³ Ini, §§ 6, 19, 45.

⁴ Alfred, §§ 3, 40.

Idea of treason.

lord's *wer*¹. The law of Edward the elder contains an exhortation to the witan for the maintenance of the public peace, in which it is proposed that they should 'be in that fellowship in which the king was, and love that which he loved, and shun that which he shunned, both on sea and land²:' a clear reference to the relation between the lord and his dependent as expressed in the oath of fealty. The same king, in A.D. 921, received the submission of the East Anglian Danes on the same condition: 'they would observe peace towards all to whom the king should grant his peace, both by sea and land³:' and the people of Northamptonshire and Cambridgeshire especially chose him to hlaforde and, to mundbora,⁴ so placing themselves under his personal protection. The principle is enunciated with greater clearness in the law of his son Edmund, in which the oath of fealty is generally imposed; all are to swear to be faithful to him as a man ought to be faithful to his lord, loving what he loves, shunning what he shuns⁴. This series of enactments must be regarded as fixing the date of the change of relation, and may perhaps be interpreted as explaining it. The rapid consolidation of the Danish with the Angle and Saxon population involved the necessity of the uniform tie between them and the king: the Danes became the king's men and entered into the public peace; the native English could not be left in a less close connexion with their king: the commendation of the one involved the tightening of the cords that united the latter to their native ruler. Something becomes the lord of his people.

The king

¹ Alfred, § 4. In the introduction to his laws, § 49. 7, he also excepts treason from the list of offences for which a bot may be taken: 'in prima culpa pecuniam emendationem capere quam ibi decreverunt, praeter proditionem domini, in qua nullam pietatem ausi sunt intueri, quia Deus omnipotens nullam adjudicavit contemptoribus suis.' This is referred to as a judgment of ancient synods.

² Edward, ii. 1, § 1, above p. 149.

³ Thurferth the earl and the holds and all the army that owed obedience to Northampton sought him 'to hlaforde and to mundboran;' all who were left in the Huntingdon country sought 'his frith and his mundbyrde;' the East Anglians swore to be one with him, that they would all that he would, and would keep peace with all with whom the king should keep peace either on sea or on land; and the army that owed obedience to Cambridge chose him 'to hlaforde and to mundbora.' Chron. Sax. A.D. 921.

⁴ Edmund, iii. § 1.

of the same kind must have taken place as each of the heptarchic kingdoms fell under West Saxon rule, but the principle is most strongly brought out in connexion with the Danish submission.

From this time accordingly the personal dignity of royalty becomes more strongly marked. Edmund and his successors take high sounding titles borrowed from the imperial court; to the real dignity of king of the English they add the shadowy claim to the empire of Britain which rested on the commendation of Welsh and Scottish princes¹. The tradition that Edgar was rowed by eight kings upon the Dee is the expression of this idea which it was left for far distant generations to realise².

Under Ethelred still higher claims are urged: again and again the witan resolve as a religious duty to adhere to one *cýne-hlaford*³: and the king himself is declared to be Christ's vicegerent among Christian people, with the special duty of defending God's church and people, and with the consequent claim on their obedience; 'he who holds an outlaw of God in his power over the term that the king may have appointed, acts, at peril of himself and all his property, against Christ's vicegerent who preserves and holds sway over Christendom and kingdom as long as God grants it⁴.' The unity of the kingdom, endangered by Sweyn and Canute, is now fenced about with sanctions which imply religious duty. Both state and church are in peril; Ethelred is regarded as the representative of both. A few years later Canute had made good his claim to be looked on as a Christian and national king. The first article of his laws, passed with the counsel of his witan to the praise of God, and his own honour and behoof, is this:

¹ Athelstan is 'rex Anglorum, et curagulus totius Britanniae,' or 'primicerius totius Albionis,' or 'rex et rector totius Britanniae.' Edred is 'imperator,' 'cýning and casere totius Britanniae,' 'basileus Anglorum hujusque insulae barbarorum;' Edwy is 'Angulsaxonum basileus &c.' or 'Angulsaexna et Northanhumbroorum imperator, paganorum gubernator, Breotonumque propugnator;' Edgar is 'totius Albionis imperator Augustus;' and so on. See Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 548 sq.

² In A.D. 922 the kings of the North Welsh took Edward for their lord; in 924 he was chosen for father and lord by the king and nation of the Scots, by the Northumbrians, Dane and English, and by the Strathclyde Britons and their king. On the real force of these commendations see Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 565; and Robertson, Scotland, &c. ii. 384. sq.

³ Ethelred, v. § 5; viii. §§ 2, 44.

⁴ Ibid. viii. § 42.

‘that above all other things, they should ever love and worship one God, and unanimously observe one Christianity, and love King Canute with strict fidelity’¹.

The increase of royal assumption not to be attributed to clerical adulation.

It is wrong to regard the influence of the clergy as one of the chief causes of the increase in the personal dignity of the kings. The rite of coronation substituted for the rude ceremony, whatever it may have been, which marked the inauguration of a heathen king, contained a distinct charge as to the nature of royal duties², but no words of adulation nor even any statement of the personal sacro-sanctity of the recipient. The enactments of the councils are directed, where they refer to royalty at all, rather to the enforcement of reforms than to the encouragement of despotic claims³. The letters of the early Anglo-Saxon bishops are full of complaints of royal misbehaviour: the sins of the kings of the eighth century almost seem to cancel the memory of the benefits received from the nursing fathers of the seventh⁴. Far from maintaining either in theory or in practice the divine right of the anointed, the prelates seem to have joined in, or at least acquiesced in, the rapid series of displacements in Northumbria⁵. Alcuin mourns over the fate of the national rulers, but grants that by their crimes they deserved all that fell on them. They are, like Saul, the anointed of the Lord⁶, but they have no

¹ Canute, i. § 1.

² Above p. 146; where I have protested distinctly against the view of Allen, Prerogative, pp. 18–24; and see Memorials of S. Dunstan, p. 355.

³ The canon (12) of the legatine council in A.D. 787 (Councils, &c. iii. 453), attempts to prohibit the murder of kings, so frightfully common at the time, by enforcing regular election and forbidding conspiracy; ‘nec christus Domini esse valet et rex totius regni, et heres patriae, qui ex legitimo non fuerit connubio generatus,’ &c., but the preceding canon (11) is an exhortation to kings; the bishops and others are warned, ‘fiducialiter et veraciter absque ullo timore vel adulatione loqui verbum Dei regibus,’ the kings are exhorted to obey their bishops, to honour the church, to have prudent counsellors fearing the Lord and honest in conversation, that the people instructed and comforted by the good examples of kings and princes may profit to the praise and glory of Almighty God.

⁴ See especially the letter of Boniface to Ethelbald, Councils, &c. iii. 350.

⁵ Above p. 137.

⁶ See Councils, &c. iii. 476; writing to Ethelred of Northumbria he says, ‘vidistis quomodo perierint antecessores vestri reges et principes propter injustitias et rapinas et immunditias . . . timete illorum perditionem . . .’ p. 491. ‘Qui sanctas legit scripturas . . . inveniet pro hujusmodi peccatis reges regna et populos patriam perdidisse.’ p. 493.

indefeasible status. In the preaching of peace and good will, the maintenance of obedience to constituted powers is indeed insisted on, but the duty of obeying the powers that be is construed simply and equitably¹. It is only when, in the presence of the heathen foe, Christendom and kingdom seem for a moment to rest on the support of a single weak hand, that the duty of obedience to the king is made to outweigh the consideration of his demerits. And yet Dunstan had prophesied of Ethelred that the sword should not depart from his house until his kingdom should be transferred to a strange nation whose worship and tongue his people knew not².

Importance of the religious side of the question.

Nor is it necessary to regard the growth of royal power, as distinct from personal pomp, among the Anglo-Saxons, as affected by the precedents and model of the Frank empire³. Although the theory of kingship was in Gaul perhaps scarcely less exalted than at Constantinople, the practice was very different, for the Merovingian puppets were set up and thrown down at pleasure. But during the eighth century the influence of England on the continent was greater than that of the continent on England. The great missionaries of Germany looked to their native land as the guide and pattern of the country of their adoption. It is only with the Karolingian dynasty that the imitation of foreign custom in England could begin; but even if the fact were far more clearly ascertained than it is, the circumstances that made it possible, the creation of national unity and the need of united defence, were much more important than a mere tendency to superficial imitation. The causes at work in Gaul and Britain were distinct and the results, in this point at least, widely different.

Royal assumption not the result of imitation of Frankish practice.

72. As the personal dignity of the king increased and the character of his relation to his people was modified, his official powers were developed, and his function as fountain of justice

The king becomes the source of justice.

¹ 'The words of the old writer followed by Simeon 'deinde Domini suffragio potitus' clearly show the opinion of the age that the God of battles gave his verdict in victory, and that war was only an appeal to the judgment of God on a large scale.' Robertson, Essays, p. 208. The principle thus expressed might be extended still further; there were no kings de jure except the kings de facto.

² Flor. Wig. ad ann. 1016.

³ Allen, Prerogative, p. 20.

Growth of the idea.

became more distinctly recognised. The germ of this attribute lay in the idea of royalty itself. The peace, as it was called¹, the primitive alliance for mutual good behaviour, for the performance and enforcement of rights and duties, the voluntary restraint of free society in its earliest form, was from the beginning of monarchy under the protection of the king. Of the three classes of offences that came under the view of the law², the minor infraction of right was atoned for by a compensation to the injured, the bot with which his individual good will was redeemed, and by a payment of equal amount to the king by which the offender bought back his admission into the public peace³. The greater breaches of the peace arising either from refusal to pay the fines, or from the commission of offences for which fines were inadequate, were punished by outlawry; the offender was a public enemy, set outside the law and the peace; his adversary might execute his own vengeance, and even common hospitality towards him was a breach of the law, until the king restored him to his place as a member of society⁴. The third class of offences which seemed beyond the scope of outlawry, and demanded strict, public, and direct rather than casual and private punishment, were yet like the former capable of composition, the acceptance of which to a certain extent depended on the king as representing the people⁵. In all share in the fines for breach of the peace.

The king's

His power of accepting money compensation.

¹ Wilda, Strafrecht, pp. 255 sq., 264 sq. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 391; 'the peace is the relation in which all stand whilst and in so far as all continue in the union and in the right on which the community rests. He who acts against this commits a breach of the peace. The breach of the peace is unright; the transgression against right is a breach of the peace.' He who sins against one, sins against all; and no man may redress his own wrongs until he has appealed to the guardians of the peace for justice. Hence the peace is the great check on the practice of private war, blood feuds, and the so-called lex talionis. I think the German writers take too high a view of the power of the Anglo-Saxon king as guardian of the peace. See Schmid, Gesetze, p. 584; Geist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 26.

² K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, iii. 26 sq. Bethmann-Hollweg, Civil-process, iv. 25 sq. Schmid, Gesetze, p. 584. Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 204. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 392; ii. 40.

³ K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, iii. 45. ll. Hloth. and Eadr. §§ 11, 12, 13. Ini. §§ 3, 6, 7, 10. Schmid, Gesetze, p. 679.

⁴ Athelstan, ii. § 20, 3. Edgar, i. § 3: 'et sit utlaga, id est exul vel exlex, nisi rex ei patriam concedat.' Ethelred, viii. § 2.

⁵ Alfred, § 7, 'sit in arbitrio regis sic vita sic mors, sicut ei condonare voluerit.' Also Ini. § 6; Edmund, ii. § 6; Ethelred, iv. § 4; but compare Alfred, Introd. § 49. 7; as given above, p. 176.

this the king is not only the executor of the peace, but a sharer in its authority and claims. But this position is far from that of the fountain of justice and source of jurisdiction. The king's guarantee was not the sole safeguard of the peace : the hundred had its peace as well as the king¹ : the king too had a distinct peace which like that of the church was not that of the country at large, a special guarantee for those who were under special protection².

The king is guardian of the peace.

The *grith*³, a term which comes into use in the Danish struggle, is a limited or localised peace, under the special guarantee of the individual, and differs little from the protection implied in the mund or personal guardianship which appears much earlier⁴; although it may be regarded as another mark of territorial development. When the king becomes the lord, patron and mundborh of his whole people, they pass from the ancient national peace of which he is the guardian into the closer personal or territorial relation of which he is the source. The peace is now the king's peace⁵; although the grith and the mund still retain their limited and local application, they entitle their possessor to no higher rights, they do but involve the transgressor in more special penalties; the frith is enforced by

The people pass into the king's peace or protection.

¹ Edmund, iii. § 2. Edgar, i. §§ 2, 3; iii. 7. Ethelred, iii. 3. Canute, ii. §§ 15, 30.

² Schmid, Gesetze, p. 584.

³ Grith [gridh] is properly the domicile, Vigfússon (Icelandic Dict. s.v.), and consequently, asylum; then truce or peace limited to place or time. Schmid, Gesetze, pp. 584, 604. So Church-grith is sometimes used for sanctuary; but it really means as much as Church-frith, the peace and security which the law guarantees to those under the church's protection. Schmid arranges the special peaces or several griths under three heads: (1) Place; churches, private houses, the king's palace and precincts; (2) Time; fasts and festivals, coronation days, days of public gemots and courts, special gatherings at drinking parties, sales, markets, guilds, &c., and the times when the fyrd is summoned; (3) Persons; clergy, widows, and nuns. Gesetze, p. 585. Gneist, Verwaltgsr. i. 38, 39. The curious enactment of Ethelred, iii. § 1, distinguishing the grith of the king, that of the ealdorman, that given in the burh-moot, the wapentake and the alehouse, with different fines for breach, is very noteworthy.

⁴ Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 26. The original meaning of mund is said to be hand, Schmid, Gesetze, p. 634; but it also has the meaning of word, sermo; and of patria potestas. Waitz, D. V. G. i. 55.

⁵ Edward, ii. 1, § 1: 'Inquisivit itaque qui ad emendationem velit redire, et in societate permanere qua ipse sit.' Edmund, ii. § 7: 'Pax regis.' See Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 26; Self-government, i. 29; K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, iii. 46.

Special
peace.

the national officers, the grith by the king's personal servants; the one is official, the other personal; the one the business of the country, the other that of the court¹. The special peace is further extended to places where the national peace is not fully provided for: the great highways, on which questions of local jurisdiction might arise to the delay of justice, are under the king's peace. But the process by which the national peace became the king's peace is almost imperceptible: and it is very gradually that we arrive at the time at which all peace and law are supposed to die with the old king, and rise again at the proclamation of the new². In Anglo-Saxon times the transition is mainly important as touching the organisation of jurisdiction.

The peace is the king's
peace.

The national officers now execute their functions as the king's officers, and executors of his peace; the shire and hundred courts, although they still call the peace their own, act in his

¹ The king's hand-grith, in the law of Edward and Guthrum, § 1, must mean the king's mund; the special peace given by the king's hand; see too Ethelred, vi. § 14, the 'pax quam manu sua dedit,' Canute, i. § 2. 2. To this belongs also the chapter on the Pax regis in the laws of Edward the Confessor, in which the peace of the coronation-days, that is, a week at Easter, Whitsuntide and Christmas; the peace of the four great highways, Watling-street, Ikenild-street, Ermin-street, and Foss-way, and the peace of the navigable rivers, are protected with special fines that distinguish them from the common-law peace of the country, which is also the king's peace. Besides these there is a fourth peace called the king's hand-sealde grith, and one given by the king's writ, which answer more closely to the idea of the mund as personal protection; and with this are connected the original pleas of the crown (see below, p. 187). Other offences against the peace, and the protection of other roads and rivers, belong to the view of the local courts, the shire and the sheriff, although not less closely related to the king's peace and jurisdiction. Cf. Glanvill, de Legg. i. 1; Ll. Edw. Conf. § 12; Palgrave, Commonwealth, pp. 284, 285.

² 'The Sovereign was the fountain of justice; therefore the stream ceased to flow when the well spring was covered by the tomb. The judicial bench vacant; all tribunals closed. Such was the ancient doctrine—a doctrine still recognised in Anglo-Norman England.' Palgrave, Normandy and England, iii. 193. Speaking of the special protections above referred to, the same writer says: 'Sometime after the Conquest all these special protections were replaced by a general proclamation of the king's peace which was made when the community assented to the accession of the new monarch, and this first proclamation was considered to be in force during the remainder of his life, so as to bring any disturber of the public tranquillity within its penalties. So much importance was attached to the ceremonial that even in the reign of John, offences committed during the interregnum, or period elapsing between the day of the death of the last monarch and the recognition of his successor, were unpunishable in those tribunals whose authority was derived from the Crown.' Commonwealth, p. 285.

name; the idea gains ground and becomes a form of law. Offences against the law become offences against the king, and the crime of disobedience a crime of contempt to be expiated by a special sort of fine, the *oferhyrnesse*¹, to the outraged majesty of the lawgiver and judge. The first mention of the oferhyrnesse occurs in the laws of Edward the elder², at the era accordingly at which the change of idea seems to have become permanent³.

Contempt of the king's law is specially punishable.

73. But although it may be convenient to accept this approximation to a date, the influence of the idea may be traced much further back. The administration of the peace is inseparable from the exercise of jurisdiction; those who are in the national peace are subject only to the national courts; those who are in the church's grith, are also in the church's soen; those who are in the king's mund, are under his cognisance; those who are amenable to any jurisdiction, owe suit and service to the courts of the jurisdiction; when all are in the mund or grith or frith of the king, he is the supreme judge of all persons and over all causes, limited however by the counsel and consent of his witan.

Growth of the idea of royal jurisdiction.

¹ Ofer-hyrnesse (subauditio, male audire) answers to the later over-seunnesse (over-looking, contempt); it is marked by special penalty in the cases of buying outside markets, refusal of justice, accepting another man's dependent without his leave, refusing Peter's pence, sounding the king's coin, neglect of summons to gemot or pursuit of thieves, and disobedience to the king's officers. See Schmid, Gesetze, p. 638.

² 'Si quis extra portum barganniet, oferhyrnesse regis culpa est.' Edward, i. § 1.

³ The concluding chapter of Asser's life of Alfred (M. H. B. p. 497) gives some important data, not only as to the participation of the king in judicature, but as to the composition of the local courts in his day. The nobiles and ignobiles, the eorls and ceorls, were constantly disagreeing in the gemots, 'in concionibus comitum et praepositorum;' a proof that ealdorman and gerefá, eorl and ceorl, had their places in these courts. None of the suitors were willing to allow that what the ealdormen and gerefán determined was true; a proof that although the officers might declare the law the ultimate determination rested in each case with the suitors. This caused a great number of causes to be brought before the king: he summoned the faulty judges before him and carefully examined into each case; or examined them through his messengers: insisting when he found them guilty that they should either resign the offices which he had committed to them, or devote themselves to the study of equity. We learn from this that the appointments to the sheriffdoms and ealdormanships were made by him, not by election of the people; and, as ignorance was the excuse of their sin, equity the object of their enforced study, that it is clearly in the declaration of law not in the determination of suits that they were faulty. The same general conclusion results from the reading of his laws.

Royal jurisdiction over the tenants of folkland.

In regard to the holders of folkland, the special royal jurisdiction must have been much older than the time of Alfred; as these tenants were liable to special burdens payable directly to the state, and as the profits of jurisdiction which were counted among these burdens, were inseparable from jurisdiction itself, it is probable that the jurisdiction of these lands was administered by royal officers, not necessarily separate from the business of the hundred courts, but as a part of their work, having special reference to the king's interests¹. They would be from the first in the peace of the king rather than in that of the hundred. When, however, folklands were turned into booklands in favour of either churches or individuals, and all their obligations save the trinoda necessitas transferred with them, the profits of jurisdiction and jurisdiction itself followed too. Such jurisdiction as had been exercised by the king, in or out of the popular courts, was now vested in the recipient of the grant. This may have been a very early innovation. The terms sac and *soc*², which imply it, are not found until late in the period, but occur almost universally in Norman grants of confirmation, as describing definite immunities which may have been only implied, though necessarily implied, in the original grant, and customarily recognised under these names³.

Private jurisdictions.

Sac and soc.

¹ In the Salian Mallus (above, p. 54), the thunginus acted on behalf of the nation, the sacebaro looked after the interests of the king. In the later county court, some such division of duties and interests must have existed between the sheriff and the coroner; and in the Anglo-Saxon time, there may have been a hundred-reeve as well as a hundreds-caldor (above, p. 101). Yet in the county court the sheriff was nominated by the crown, the coroner chosen by the people; and earlier, the caldorman was appointed by the king and witan, the sheriff apparently by the king alone. And it is extremely difficult to distinguish between the duties of the sheriff executing the peace as the officer of the nation, and collecting the revenue as steward of the king.

² Sac, or sacu, seems to mean litigation, and sôcn to mean jurisdiction; the former from the thing (sacu) in dispute; the latter from the seeking of redress; but the form is an alliterative jingle, which will not bear close analysis. Kemble refers sacu to the preliminary and initiative process, and sôcn to the right of investigation. (Cod. Dipl. i. p. xlv.) Ellis makes sac the jurisdiction, and soc the territory within which it was exercised. (Introd. i. 273). See also Schmid, Gesetze, p. 654.

³ Kemble (C. D. i. p. xlv), remarks, that except in one questionable grant of Edgar, sac and soc are never mentioned in charters before the reign of Edward the Confessor; and concludes that 'they were so inherent in the land as not to require particularisation; but that under the Normans, when every right and privilege must be struggled for, and the conse-

The idea of jurisdiction accompanying the possession of the soil must be allowed to be thus ancient, although it may be questioned whether, except in the large territorial lordships, it was actually exercised, or whether the proprietor would not as a rule satisfy himself with the profits of jurisdiction, and transact the business of it through the ordinary courts. It is probable that, except in a very few special cases, the sac and soc thus granted were before the Conquest exemptions from the hundred courts only, and not from those of the shire¹; and that thus they are the basis of the manorial court-leet, as the mark-system is that of the court baron. There is no evidence of the existence of a domestic tribunal by which the lord tried the offences or settled the disputes of his servants, serfs, or free tenantry; he satisfied himself with arbitrating in the latter case, and producing the criminal in the public courts². But when grants of sac and soc became common, these questions would swell the business of his private courts, and his jurisdiction would apply as much to those who were under his personal, as to those who were in his territorial protection. By such grants then, indirectly as well as directly, large sections of jurisdiction which had been royal or national, fell into private hands, and as the tendency was for all land ultimately to become bookland, the national courts became more and more the courts of the landowners. The ancient process was retained, but exercised by men who derived their title from the new source of justice. Their juris-quences of the Norman love of litigation were bitterly felt, it became a matter of necessity to have them not only tacitly recognised but solemnly recorded.' The idea that the manor originates in the gradual acquisition by one family of a hereditary right to the headship of the township and the accumulation in that capacity of lands and jurisdiction, does not seem to have anything to recommend it. In fact, within historic times the headman of the township does not occupy a position of jurisdiction, simply one of police agency.

Grants of sac and soc removed the lands from the jurisdiction of the hundred court.

Growth of private courts.

¹ In Cod. Dipl. dcccxxviii and decclviii, Edward frees certain estates of Westminster, 'mid sace and mid soene, scotfree and gavelfree, on hundrede and on scire,' but the exemption is unusual, and even in these passages may not be a full exemption from jurisdiction. However, when in Domesday the sheriff of Worcestershire reports that there are seven hundreds out of the twelve in which he has no authority, it is clear that such jurisdictions must have been already in being.

² K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 56.

Jurisdiction
of the thegus.

diction was further modified by enactment: as the thegn had soen over his own men, the king had soen over his thegns; none but the king could exercise or have the profits of jurisdiction over a king's *thegn*¹; none but the king could have the fines arising from the offences of the owner of bookland². And although this might practically be observed by recognising the popular courts as royal courts for the smaller owners of bookland, the king had a 'thening-manna' court, in which his greater vassals settled their disputes³. But the time came when the great local landowner was vested with the right of representing the king as judge and landrica in his whole district, and so exercised jurisdiction over minor landowners. This change, the bearing of which on the history of the hundred courts, which also were placed in private hands, is very uncertain, seems to have taken place in the reign of Canute; and may have been a local enactment only⁴. Wherever it prevailed it must have brought the local jurisdictions into close conformity with the feudalism of the continent; and may thus serve to explain some of the anomalies of the system of tenure as it existed in the times reported in Domesday.

Hereditary
jurisdictions.

Weakening of the real power of the king.

These immunities, tying the judicature, as it may be said, to the land, and forming one of the most potent causes of the territorial tendency, so far ousted the jurisdiction of the national courts, whether held in the name of the king or of the people, that it might be almost said that the theoretical cha-

¹ Ethelred, iii. § 11: 'Et nemo habeat soenam super taynum regis, nisi solus rex.' Gneist insists that this refers only to thegns who were members of the witenagemot. Verwaltungsrecht, i. 25, 37, 38.

² Ethelred, i. §§ 1, 14: 'Et habeat rex forisfacturas omnium eorum qui liberas terras (böceland) habent, nec componat aliquis pro ulla tyhtla, si non intersit testimonium praepositi regis.' See also Canute, ii. §§ 13, 77.

³ Kemble, Cod. Dipl. mcdlviii; Saxons, ii. 46, 47. In this instance the bishop of Rochester sues the widow of Elfric in the king's 'theningmanna gemot' for certain title deeds alleged to have been stolen: the court adjudged them to the bishop. Afterwards her relations brought the matter before the caldorman and the folk, who compelled the bishop to restore them. It is a very curious case, and certainly serves to illustrate the principle that the shire could compel recourse to itself in the first instance even where such high interests were concerned. See K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 57.

⁴ Laws of the Northumbrian Priests, § 49; K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 50.

rafter of the sovereign rises as the scope for his action is limited. This, however, was to some extent counteracted by the special retention of royal rights in laws and charters. Accordingly, in the later laws, the king specifies the pleas of criminal justice, which he retains for his own administration and profit; such a list is given in the laws of Canute; breach of the king's protection, house-breaking, assault, neglect of the fyrd, and out-lawry¹. These were the original pleas of the crown, and were determined by the king's officers in the local courts. By a converse process, such small parts of criminal process as still belonged to these courts, arising from the offences of smaller freemen, together with the voluntary and contentious jurisdiction for which the courts of the landowners were not competent, came to be exercised in the king's name. He interfered in suits which had not passed through the earlier stage of the hundred and the shire²: and asserted himself as supreme judge in all causes, not in appeals only. All jurisdiction was thus exercised either by the king through his officers, or by landowners who had their title from him. The royal officers acted in the hundred courts with freemen of all classes that still owed suit to them; and the shire courts were composed of all lords of land, scir-thegns, and others, including a representation of the humblest landowners.

Pleas of the crown reserved in grants of jurisdiction.

74. The subject of tenure in Anglo-Saxon times is beset with many apparently insuperable difficulties³. We have not materials for deciding whether a uniform rule was observed in the several kingdoms or in the legal divisions which continued to represent them down to the Norman Conquest and later: whether the Danish conquest may not have created differences in Mercia, Northumbria, and East Anglia; or whether the variety of nomenclature found in Domesday Book implies a difference of character in the relations described, or merely the variations

Difficulties of Anglo-Saxon tenure.

¹ Canute, ii. § 12; K. Maurer, Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 55. The charter of Alfred, in which these rights are granted away to the abbey of Shaftesbury (Cod. Dipl. ccex), seems to be very doubtful.

² Kemble, Saxons, ii. 46; Cod. Dipl. dexciii, deelv. In the reign of Ethelred the king sends his insegele or writ to the shiremoot of Berkshire, bidding them arbitrate between Leofwine and Wynflæd; C. D. dexciii.

³ Hallam, M. A. ii. 293; Palgrave, Commonwealth, pp. 576 sq.

The Anglo-Saxon system of vassalage grew out of the law not out of the land.

of local and customary terminology; the result of an investigation transacted by different officers, many of whom were Normans, and scarcely understood the meaning of the witnesses whose evidence they were taking. There is, however, no question of any general subversion of the primitive rule before the Norman Conquest. No legislation turned the free owner into the feudal tenant: whatever changes in that direction took place were the result of individual acts, or of very gradual changes of custom arising indirectly from the fact that other relations were assuming a territorial character. Domesday Book attests the existence in the time of Edward the Confessor of a large class of freemen who, by commendation, had placed themselves in the relation of dependence on a superior lord¹; whether any power of transferring their service still remained, or whether the protection which the commended freeman received from his lord extended so far as to give a feudal character to his tenure of land, cannot be certainly determined; but the very use of the term seems to imply that vassalage had not in these cases attained its full growth: the origin of the relation was in the act of the dependent. On the other hand, the occupation of the land of the greater owners by the tenants or dependents to whom it was granted by the lord prevailed on principles little changed from primitive times and incapable of much development. It would seem, however, wiser to look for the chief cause of change in the alteration of other relations. This tendency with reference to judicature we have just examined. When every man who was not, by his own free possession of land, a fully qualified member of the commonwealth, had of necessity to find himself a lord, and the king had asserted for himself the position of lord and patron of the whole nation; when every free man had to provide himself with a permanent security for his own appearance in the courts of justice, of which the king was the source, and for the maintenance of the peace, of which the king

¹ Ellis, Introd. to Domesday, i. 64-66. The term is most frequent in Essex and East Anglia; but descriptions that imply the general use of the practice are abundant; such as 'ire cum terra ubi voluerit,' 'quaerere dominium ubi voluerit.' Hallam, M. A. ii. 276, note z.

was the protector ; when every owner of bookland had the right of jurisdiction, and the king alone could exercise jurisdiction over the owner of bookland ; the relation of the small land-owner to the greater or to the king, and the relation of the landless man to his lord, created a perfectly graduated system of jurisdiction, every step of which rested on the possession of land by one or both of the persons by whose relations it was created. The man who had land judged the man who had not, and the constant assimilation going on between the poor land-owner and the mere cultivator of his lord's land, had the result of throwing both alike under the courts of the greater proprietors. As soon as a man found himself obliged to suit and service in the court of his stronger neighbour, it needed but a single step to turn the practice into theory, and to regard him as holding his land in consideration of that suit and service¹. Still more so, when by special grant other royal rights, such as the collection of Danegeld and the enforcement of military service, are made over to the great lords² ; the occupation, though it still bears the name of alodial, returns to the character of usufruct out of which it sprang, when the national ownership, after first vesting itself in the king as national representative, has been broken up into particulars, every one of which is capable of being alienated in detail.

75. In the obligation of military service, may be found a second strong impulse towards a national feudalism. The host was originally the people in arms ; the whole free population, Growth of the idea of lordship as connected with land.

Military service.

¹ Hence the alodiaries of Domesday are represented as holding their lands of a superior : not because they had received them of him, but because they did suit and service at his court, and followed his banner. Hence, too, Edward the Confessor was able to give to the Abbey of Westminster his own alodiaries ; the king being lord of all who had no other lord. They remained alodiaries by title and inheritance, and probably escaped some of the burdens of territorial dependence.

² Gneist, who treats this subject from a different point of view, inclines to refer the sinking of the ceorl into dependence generally to three causes : (1) The burden of military service, which led him to commend himself to a lord who would then be answerable for the military service ; (2) to the convenience which the poor alodial owners found in seeking justice from a strong neighbour rather than from a distant court ; and (3) in the need of military defence during the Danish wars, which drove men into the protection of fortified houses. Verwaltungsrecht, i. 52, 53.

Military service originally a personal obligation.

whether landowners or dependents, their sons, servants, and tenants. Military service was a personal obligation: military organisation depended largely on tribal and family relations: in the process of conquest, land was the reward of service; the service was the obligation of freedom, of which the land was the outward and visible sign. But very early, as soon perhaps as the idea of separate property in land was developed, the military service became, not indeed a burden upon the land, but a personal duty that practically depended on the tenure of land; it may be that every hide had to maintain its warrior; it is certain that every owner of land was obliged to the fyrð or expeditio; the owner of bookland as liable to the trinoda necessitas alone; the occupier of folkland as subject to that as well as to many other obligations from which bookland was exempted. But although folkland and bookland agreed in this, there was no doubt a fundamental difference in their respective obligations, which was probably expressed in the penalty to which they were severally liable in case of default. The holder of allodial land was subject on the continent to the fine for neglecting the *Heerbann*¹; the holder of a beneficium to forfeiture². The same practice would apply in England to bookland and folkland, although from the peculiarly defensive character of English warfare after the consolidation of the kingdom, it might very early be disused. The law of Ini, that the landowning gesitheundman in case of neglecting the fyrð, should forfeit his land as well as pay 120 shillings as *fyrðwite*³, may be explained either of the gesith holding an estate of folkland, or of the landowner standing in the relation of gesith to the king: it seems natural however to refer the fine to the betrayal of his character

It becomes connected with land.

Difference of penalty for neglect of the host.

¹ 'Quicumque liber homo in hostem bannitus fuerit et venire contempserit plenum heribannum id est solidos 60 persolvat.' Cap. Bonon. 811, c. 1; Baluze, i. 337; Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 486.

² 'Quicumque ex his qui beneficium principis habent parem suum contra hostes in exercitu pergentem dimiserit, et cum eo ire vel stare noluerit, honorem suum et beneficium perdat.' Cap. Bonon. 811, c. 5; Baluze, i. 338; Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 492.

³ Ini, § 51. 'Si homo sithcundus terrarius expeditionem supersedeat, emendet cxx solidis et perdat terram suam; non habens terram lx solidis; ciriscus xxx solidis pro fyrðwita.'

of free man, his forfeiture to his desertion of his duty as gesith. The later legislation, which directs forfeiture in case of the king's presence with the host, whilst a fine of 120 shillings was sufficient atonement if he were not present, would seem to be the natural result of the change which placed the whole population in dependence on him as lord¹.

It is by no means improbable that the final binding of land-ownership with military attendance on the king in the form of the thegn's service², is connected with the same legislation of Alfred and Edward, which we have already examined in reference to treason and the maintenance of the peace. To their date approximately belong the definitions of the thegn as possessing five hides of his own land, church and kitchen, bell-house and burh-geat-setl, and special service in the king's hall: the thegn of Alfred is the miles of Bede; the history of the year A.D. 894 shows an amount of military organisation on Alfred's part, of which there is no earlier evidence, an army of reserve and a definite term of service³. The military policy too of Charles the Great may by this time have affected England; the improvement of organisation involves a more distinct definition of military duties; and it is certain that the increased importance and costliness of equipment must have

The military obligation of the thegn.

¹ Ethelred, v. § 28; vi. § 35. 'Quando rex in hostem pergit, si quis edictu ejus vocatus remanserit, si ita liber homo est ut habeat socam suam et sacam et cum terra sua possit ire quo voluerit, de omni terra sua est in misericordia Regis. Cujuscunque vero alterius domini liber homo si de hoste remanserit, et dominus ejus pro eo alium hominem duxerit, xl solidis domino suo qui vocatus fuit emendabit. Quod si ex toto nullus pro eo abierit ipse quidem domino suo xl sol., dominus autem ejus totidem sol. regi emendabit;' Domesday, i. 172, Worcestershire. In Canute, ii. § 65, neglect of the fyrd involves a fine of 120 shillings, but in § 77, whoever flies from his lord or his companion, in sea or land expedition, is to lose all that he has, and even his bookland is forfeited to the king. His lord enters on the land that he has given him, and his life is forfeit; but this is not the neglect of the fyrd, but the herisliz of the continental law, which was punishable by death. Cap. Bonon. 811, c. 4; Baluze, i. 338.

² Gneist, Self-government, i. 11: The thegn's service was clearly, (1) personal; (2) at his own cost of equipment; (3) he paid his own expenses during the campaign.

³ Chron. Sax. A.D. 894. 'The king had divided his forces (fierd) into two, so that one half was constantly at home, half out in the field; besides those men whose duty it was to defend the burhs.'

No exact parallel with feudal legislation on military matters.

confined effective service to the rich¹. But although the thegn was bound to military service, we have not sufficient warrant for accepting the theory that his service bore to the extent of his land the exact proportion that is laid down in feudal times². The hide might furnish its man; the thegn might be answerable for five men, or for one warrior five times as well equipped as the ordinary free man: in the reign of Ethelred, eight hides furnished a helm and a coat of mail³; in Berkshire in the time of Edward the Confessor, the custom was that every five hides sent one warrior (miles)⁴, and each furnished him with four shillings for the provision of two months: if he failed to attend he suffered forfeiture. But we have few more indications of local, and none of general practice, and it is probable that the complete following out of the idea of proportion was reserved for Henry II, unless his military reforms are to be understood, as so many of his other measures are, as the revival and strengthening of anti-feudal and prae-feudal custom. Still even these traces are sufficient to show the tendency to bind up special possession with special service, and consequently to substitute some other liability for that of military service in cases where that special qualification did not exist. Whether the simple freeman served as the follower of the lord to whom he had commended himself or to whose court he did service, or as the king's thegn under the banner of the sheriff or other lord to whom the king had deputed the leading, he found himself a member of a host bound together with territorial relations⁵. If he were too poor to provide his arms, or preferred

¹ Gneist, Self-government, i. 10. The stages may be thus marked: (1) the universal obligation; (2) the obligation of the hundred to furnish a hundred warriors; (3) the increased cost of armour restricting effective service. In the seventh century, on the continent, full equipment was worth 33 solidi, that is the price of as many oxen, or of a hide of land: in England, the service was on foot. (4) Although the fully armed warrior might be the king's thegn, all owners of five hides were liable to the same service, and the whole population was still summoned to defensive war, like that against the Danes. Ibid. i. 11-13, 14. Robertson, Hist. Essays, pp. vii-xix, has some very valuable remarks on the whole subject.

² Gneist, Self-government, i. 13.

³ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1008.

⁴ Above, p. 117.

⁵ Gneist (Self-government, i. 15; Verwaltgsr. i. 15) rightly maintains that the military service was still a personal duty, not a burden on the land;

safe servitude to dangerous employment in warfare, there was no lack of warlike neighbours who, in consideration of his acceptance of their superiority, would undertake the duty that lay upon his land: he was easily tempted to become a socager, paying rent or gavel, instead of a free but overworked and short-lived man-at-arms.

But a further conclusion may be drawn on other grounds. From the time of Alfred the charters contain less and less frequently the clause expressing the counsel and consent of the witan to the grant. It never altogether disappears; but the witan gradually sink into the position of witnesses, and their consent, probably perfunctory enough at any time, becomes a mere attestation. It would seem to follow from this that the folkland was becoming virtually king's land, from the moment that the West Saxon monarch became sole ruler of the English; a date agreeing nearly with those which we have fixed for the turning point of the system. If then the king was henceforth special lord of the folkland, the folkland itself becomes scarcely distinguishable from the royal demesne; and every estate cut out of it, whether turned into bookland or not, would seem to place the holder in a personal relation to the king which was fulfilled by military service. Every man who was in the king's peace was liable to be summoned to the host at the king's call, but the king's vassals especially; the former for national defence, the latter for all service¹: but all the English wars of the tenth and eleventh

Commuta-
tion of military service.

Change of the folkland to royal demesne.

The duty of national defence.

but the personal duty was at every turn conditioned by the possession of the land.

¹ See Gneist, Self-government, i. 13, 18. In the Karoling period this general armament already bore the name of the landwehr. 'Ad defensionem patriae omnes sine ulla excusatione veniant.' Edict. Pistense, A.D. 864, c. 27. 'Et volumus ut cujuscumque nostrum homo, in cujuscumque regno sit, cum seniore suo in hostem vel aliis suis utilitatibus pergat, nisi talis regni invasio, quam lantveri dicunt, quod absit, acciderit, ut omnis populus illius regni ad eam repellendam communiter pergat.' Conv. Marsn. A.D. 847. adv. Karoli, § 5. The continuance of the fyrd as a general armament of the people during Anglo-Saxon times was no doubt the result of the defensive character of the warfare with the Danes; otherwise it might have sunk, as on the continent, to the mere vacta or police of the country (see above, p. 77); a character which it possessed in England also, and which was called out by the legislation of Edward I. It is important to note this double character of the third obligation of the trinoda necessitas; watch and ward; centuries were wars of defence, and hence the fyrd system was maintained in its integrity, although the special duty of the thegns, as afterwards that of the knights, subsisted side by side with it. Still, as in the most primitive times, the host contained the free people fighting in their local organisation, and the specially qualified, specially bound, servants and companions of the leaders¹. The cultivators of Kent might not be bound by the special service², might pay gavel, or rent, instead of fighting, be drengs instead of thegns or knights, but they had no right to hold back from the defence of the country.

Composition of the army.

Form of legislation unchanged.

76. In the region of legislation, beside the general tone and tendency which have been illustrated under the heads of justice and land-tenure, the growth of the royal power and the accompanying increase of territorial influences could appear only in the form of enactment, or in the growth or elimination of the principle of personal law. In the former point no change is perceptible. Ethelred and Canute invariably express the counsel and consent of the wise men of the nation to their promulgation of the laws, just as Ini and Alfred had done. The king never legislates by his own ordinance. The codes are in fact not so much the introductions of new principles as the declarations of the customs or common law of the race, dating from far beyond the existence of written record, preserved in the memories of the wise, and kept alive for the most part in constant general experience. It may be that, when the knowledge of law has become professional, or when under new influences indigenous customs are becoming obsolete, they are written down in books; but as a rule it may be said that a publication of laws is the result of some political change or series of changes; so that the very act of legislation implies some crisis in the history of the legislator.

one against malefactors, the other against armed hosts. In the German trinoda necessitas the wacta is more important because in more constant requisition, than the lantweri; in England the fyrd is in more constant requisition, until after the Conquest, than the watch; but the two ideas are never really divorced.

¹ Above, p. 30.

² See Robertson, Essays, pp. 1-1iv. Elton, Tenures of Kent, pp. 45-58. The drengs who held lands under the archbishop were turned into knights by Lanfranc. Epp. Cantuar. p. 225.

The most ancient Germanic code, the Pactus Legis Salicæ,¹ seems to mark the period at which the several Frank tribes admitted the sovereignty of the Salian king. The laws of Ethelbert of Kent were the immediate result of the conversion¹; those of Wiltræd and Ini, of the changes which a century of church organisation made necessary in that kingdom and in Wessex. The codes of Alfred and Edgar are the legislation which the consolidation of the several earlier kingdoms under the West Saxon house demanded, the former for Wessex, Kent and Mercia², the latter for the whole of England. Not the least important part of the laws of Alfred and Edward are clothed in the form of treaty with the East Anglian Danes. The laws of Canute are the enunciation, with the confirmation of the conqueror, now the elected king, of the legislation which he had promised to preserve to the people who accepted him. Most of the shorter laws are of the nature of amendments, but serve occasionally to illustrate the growth of a common and uniform jurisprudence which testifies to the increase in strength of the power that could enforce it. Thus the very fact of the issue of a code illustrates the progress of legislative power in assimilating old customs or enacting provisions of general authority. The share of the provincial folkmoets in authorising legislation, though not in originating it, appears as late as the reign of Athelstan; but the single instance that proves it exhibits it in the form of acceptance only. The bishops and thegns of Kent, eorl and ceorl, acquiesce in the enactments of the witenagemot at Greatley³.

New legislation the result of some national crisis.

The increase of territorial influences might naturally be expected to put an end to the system of personal law wherever it existed, except in the border territories of Wales and Scotland. But in spite of the differences of local custom, it may be

Question of personal law.

¹ Bede, H. E. ii. 5. 'Inter caetera bona quae genti suae consulendo conferebat, etiam decreta illi iudiciorum juxta exempla Romanorum cum consilio sapientium constituit.'

² 'Nolui multa de meis in scriptura ponere quia dubitamus quid posteris inde placeret; sed quae repperi diebus Inae regis cognati mei, vel Offae Mercenorum regis, vel Æthelbrihtes qui primus in Anglorum gente baptizatus est rex, quae mihi justiora visa sunt, haec collegi et caetera dimisi.'

Alfred, Introd. 49, § 9.

³ See above, p 115.

Tables of wergilds.

Division of the country
according to law.

Right of the Danes.

questioned whether in England the system of personal law ever prevailed to an extent worth recording. It is true that the table of wergilds of the different kingdoms differ¹; but the differences are very superficial, nor is there anything that shows certainly that the wergild of the slain stranger was estimated by the law of his own nation and not by that of the province in which he was slain. But if there ever was a period at which the former was the rule, it must have disappeared as soon as the united kingdom was ranged under the threefold division of West Saxon, Mercian and Danish law, an arrangement which appears to be entirely territorial². The practice of presentment of Englishry in the case of murder which was once attributed to Canute³ is now generally regarded as one of the innovations of the Norman Conquest. The laws of Edgar however contain an enactment which seems to give to the Danes some privilege of personal law, if not also of actual legislation. In the Supplementum enacted at the Council of Wihthordesstan, the king and witan enact an ordinance for the whole population of the kingdom, English, Danish and British; but with a sort of saving clause, 'I will that secular rights stand among the Danes with as good laws as they best may choose. But with the English let that stand which I and my witan have added to the dooms of my forefathers for the behoof of all my people. Only let this ordinance be common to all⁴.' This is a distinct recognition of the right of the Danes of the Danelaga not only to retain their own customs, but to modify them on occasion: the few customs which they specially retained are enumerated by Canute, and seem to be only nominally at variance with those of their neighbours, whilst of their exercise of the right of separate legislation there seems to be no evidence. And what is true of the Danes,

¹ Schmid, Gesetze, pp. 394-400.

² See Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 433.

³ Ll. Edw. Conf. § 16. Dialogus de Scaccario, I. cap. x (Select Charters, p. 193). A similar measure may possibly have been taken by Canute. If an unknown man was found slain, he was presumed to be a Norman, and the hundred fined accordingly, unless they could prove that he was English. 'Non procedit nec solvatur pro murthero Anglieus sed Francigena; ex quo vero deest qui interfectum hominem comprobet Anglicum esse, Francigena reputatur.' Ll. Henr. I, § 92. 6.

⁴ Edgar, iv. § 2. 1.

is equally true of the Mercians and Northumbrians; the variations of custom are verbal rather than real; and where, as in the case of the wergilds, they are real, they are territorial rather than personal. The deeper differences of Briton and Saxon laws on the Western border, or of early Danish and English custom in East Anglia were settled by special treaty, such as those of Alfred and Edward with Guthrum, and the ordinance of the Dunsætas. The subject of personal law then illustrates the Anglo-Saxon development only incidentally; there was no such difference amongst the customs of the English races as existed between Frank, Visigoth and Roman, or even between Frank, Alemannian and Lombard.

Personal law not important in England.

77. Of the influence of the Danes and Norsemen on the constitutional life of England, whether in their character as conquerors generally, or in special relation to the districts which they ravaged, divided and colonised, little that is affirmative can be certainly stated. For nothing is known of their native institutions at the time of their first inroads; and the differences between the customs of the Danelaga and those of the rest of England, which follow the Norse occupation, are small in themselves and might almost with equal certainty be ascribed to the distinction between Angle and Saxon. The extent of the Danish occupation southward is marked by the treaty of Alfred and Guthrum, 'upon the Thames, along the Lea to its source, then right to Bedford and then upon the Ouse to Watling Street¹.' To the north they were advanced as far as the Tyne; and their Western boundary was the mountain district of Yorkshire, Westmoreland and Cumberland². Over all this region the traces of their colonisation abound in the villages whose names end in 'by,' the Scandinavian equivalent of the English 'tun,' or 'ham': the division into wapentakes may be Scandinavian more probably than Anglian, and the larger arrangement of the trithings or ridings of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire may be of the same origin. But it is not probable that they introduced any

Effect of Danish invasion.

Limits of Danish occupation.

¹ Alf. and Guthr. § 1.

² See Mr. Robertson's Essay on the Dane-law in Scotland under her Early Kings, ii. 430-444. Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 644-647.

The infusion of Danish usages was not great, owing to their own condition;

substantial changes into the customs of the common law, for several reasons. In the first place their organisation for the purpose of colonisation was apparently only temporary. It was nearly two centuries before they effected a permanent settlement, during which period they ravaged the coasts in the summer, and in the winter either returned home or remained in camp. Their expeditions were headed by independent chieftains allied, as the old Saxons had been, for the purpose of war, and after the war was over returning to equality and isolation. They were accordingly far more likely to amalgamate with the Anglian population which submitted to them¹ than to create a great and new nation upon lines of their own. The evidence of a popular migration, as distinguished from mere settlement, is wanting, and although the local extermination of the natives must have occasionally made the institution of a new organisation necessary², it would appear that such instances were not numerous enough to alter the general complexion of society. In the second place, the Angles whom they conquered were, of all the English tribes, the most closely connected with them in their primitive homes. The civilisation which the Danes now possessed was probably about equal to that which the Angles had had three centuries before; they were still heathens, and of their legal system we know no more than that they used the universal customs of compurgation, wergild, and other pecuniary compositions for the breach of the peace³. Their heathenism they renounced with scarcely a struggle, and the rest of their jurisprudence needed only to be translated into English. Just as in France the Normans adopted the religion and institutions of the conquered, so in England the Danes sank almost immediately into the mass of the Angles.

and possibly to their affinity with the Angles.

It cannot be doubted that the influx of a body of new settlers whose ideas of freedom had not been trained or shackled with three centuries of civilisation, must have introduced a strong impulse in favour of the older institutions which were already on the wane. The alodial tenure of the North must have been reinstated in Yorkshire and East Anglia in its full strength¹, even if the subject Angle sank one degree in the scale of liberty. The institutions of the Danish settlements of the Five Boroughs² stand out as late as the Conquest, in the possession of a local constitution which, as well as their confederation, seems to date from their foundation in the ninth century. But speculation on such points is scarcely necessary. The amalgamation of the Dane and Angle population began from the moment of the conversion. The peace of Alfred and Guthrum established the social equality of the races: the prowess and policy of Edward and of Ethelfleda reunited the Southern Danes under the West Saxon dynasty, and the royal houses of Northumbria and Wessex intermarried. The attraction of the larger and more coherent mass, itself consolidated by the necessity of defence, and the quarrels of the Danish chieftains amongst themselves, led the way to their incorporation. The spasmodic efforts of the Northumbrian Danes were checked by Edmund and Edred; and Edgar, who saw that the time was come to join Dane and Mercian on equality in all respects with the West

¹ Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 148.

² Such perhaps was the original confederation of the Five Boroughs; above, p. 93.

³ See the laws of Alfred and Guthrum, and Edward and Guthrum. The lahslit of the Danes is the wife of the Anglo-Saxons; and in many cases, as we have already seen, new names, rather than new customs, date from the Danish occupation: the carl, the hold, the grith, the trithing, the wapentake perhaps, supersede the old names, but with no perceptible difference of meaning. For the word law itself (lah) we are, it is said, indebted to the Danes.

Bracing influence of the Danish infusion.

Speedy union of Danes and English.

¹ Robertson, Scotland, &c. ii. 269. 'It will be found that at the date of the Norman Conquest, contrary to the usually received idea, a greater amount of freedom was enjoyed in the Danelage than in England proper, or in other words Wessex and English Mercia. Throughout the latter district, except in the case of the Gavellers of East Kent, military tenure seems to have prevailed with hardly any exception . . . In the Danelage, on the contrary, omitting Yorkshire from the calculation, between a third and a fourth of the entire population were classified either as liberi homines, or as soemen . . . Free socage, the very tenure of which is sometimes supposed to have been peculiarly a relic of Anglo-Saxon liberty, appears to have been absolutely unknown except among the Anglo-Danes.' Whether these conclusions are to be accepted may be questionable, but the argument illustrates remarkably the expression in the text.

² It would be hazardous to argue from what is called the 'North People's Law,' Schmid, Gesetze, p. 396; but a reading of it suggests that the Danes estimated their own wer-gilds at twice the value of the Angles, just as in early days the Saxons had valued themselves at twice as much as the wealth. The eorl is worth 15,000 thrymsas; the ealdorman 8,000; the hold is worth 4,000, and the thegn 2,000; the king's high reeve is worth 4,000, and there is no counterpart to him, probably because he would always be valued as a Dane. Mr. Robertson dates this earlier than Canute, Scotland, &c. ii. 281.

Ecclesiastics
of Danish extraction.

Saxon, consolidated the Northumbrian kingdom with his own. The Danish Odo, Oskytel, and Oswald were archbishops in less than a century after Halfdane had divided Northumbria; and in the struggles of Ethelred, Sweyn and Canute, the national differences can scarcely be traced. The facility with which the Danes of the eleventh century conquered the provinces which their kinsmen had occupied in the ninth can scarcely be referred to this cause with more probability than to the fact that Mercia and East Anglia during the Anglian period had never united with Wessex. The ill-consolidated realm of Edred broke up between Edwy and Edgar, just as that of Ethelred broke up between Edmund and Canute, and that of Canute between Harold and Hardicanute.

The want of cohesion not a result of Danish infusion only.

General conclusion as to the first Danish
struggle.

It may be concluded then, that whilst very considerable political modifications and even territorial changes followed the Danish conquest of the ninth century, whilst a rougher, stronger, and perhaps freer element was introduced into the society, into the language, and even into the blood of the Angles, the institutional history is not largely affected by it. During the conquest the Danes were the host, or here; when it was over they subsided into the conditions of settled society as they found it; their magistrates, their coins, their local customs, like their dwelling places, retained for a while their old names; but under those names they were substantially identical with the magistrates, coins and customs of the Angles, and in the course of time sank all differences in a common nomenclature.

The second
Danish
struggle.

Nor again can much of the constitutional change which followed the second Danish domination, that founded by Sweyn and Canute, be attributed to the infusion of new customs from the North¹. Its chief effects were political, and its constitutional

¹ If the authenticity of the Constitutiones Forestae, ascribed to Canute, were proved, they might be useful as marking the introduction of forest law into England; but they are either spurious, or so much interpolated as to be without value. They are accepted indeed by Kemble and Lappenberg, and with some hesitation by Schmid also (Gesetze, p. lvi), but K. Maurer rejects them as a fabrication of much later date (Krit. Ueberschau, ii. 410). Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 732, thinks that the code carries its own confutation with it, and Brunner (in Holtzendorff's Encyclopädie, p. 232) detects in it the ring of Norman legal terminology. Besides these laws the institution of the huskarls is the only peculiarity of the Danish régime: on consequences may be referred to political far more than to ethnical causes. The laws of Canute are but a reproduction of those of Edgar and Ethelred; not a single custom can be assigned to his rule with any certainty that it cannot be found earlier; and the infusion of Danish blood and language is less important in the eleventh century than in the ninth. The changes which are traceable, and which have been adverted to in the general sketch just given of the growth of the royal power, are to be ascribed to the fact that Canute was a great conqueror and the ruler of other far wider if less civilised territories than England. His changes in the forms of charters and writs, if they were really anything more than clerical variations, simply show that he did with a strong hand what Ethelred had done with a weak one. Even the great mark of his policy, the division of England into four great earldoms or duchies, may be paralleled with the state of things under Edgar and his sons.

No new usages introduced by Canute into the laws.

It is however possible to refer the last measure to an idea of reproducing something like the imperial system which Canute saw in Germany. He ruled, nominally at least, a larger European dominion than any English sovereign has ever done; and perhaps also a more homogeneous one. No potentate of the time came near him except the king of Germany, the emperor, with whom he was allied as an equal. The king of the Norwegians, the Danes, and a great part of the Swedes¹, was in a position which might have suggested the foundation of a Scandinavian empire with Britain annexed. Canute's division of his dominions on his death bed, showed that he saw this to be impossible; them see Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 733. Although they recall very distinctly the features of the primitive comitatus (above, p. 150. n. 2), they do not concern Constitutional History further, and add in no important degree to the elements already existing in English society. The heriot is often regarded as an institution of Canute; but there are many examples of the custom in the charters much earlier, which show that he simply declared the law of an ancient, probably primitive, usage. Kemble, Saxons, ii. 99. The heriots of Theodred, Bishop of Elmham (Cod. Dipl. decceclvii), Ethelwald the ealdorman (meclxxiii), Elfgar (mecxxiii), Beorhtic (cccxcii), and many others are known; and they seem to imply an assessment similar to Canute's own. And in this view of the case, where the payment had become a settled amount due from persons of a particular rank, it became possible for women to be charged with it. In other words the heriot was become a burden on the land rather than on the person.

Imperial character of Canute.

¹ See his letter to the bishops, in Florence of Worcester, A.D. 1031.

Canute's empire not permanent or consolidated.

Norway, for a century and a half after his strong hand was removed, was broken up amongst an anarchical crew of piratic and bloodthirsty princes, nor could Denmark be regarded as likely to continue united with England. The English nation was too much divided and demoralised to retain hold on Scandinavia, even if the condition of the latter had allowed it. Hence Canute determined that during his life, as after his death, the nations should be governed on their own principles, and as the Saxons, the Bavarians, the Swabians and the Franconians obeyed Conrad the Salic, so the Danes, the Norwegians, the Swedes and the English should obey him. But still further, the four nations of the English, Northumbrians, East Angles, Mercians and West Saxons, might, each under their own national leader, obey a sovereign who was strong enough to enforce peace amongst them.

Feudal tendency of Canute's government by earls.

The great earldoms of Canute's reign were perhaps a nearer approach to a feudal division of England than anything which followed the Norman Conquest. That of Mercia was a vast territory in which the earl, an old Mercian noble, united the great territories of the national æthel with the official authority and domain of the ealdorman, and exercised the whole administration of justice, limited only by the king's reeves and the bishops. And the extent to which this creation of the four earldoms affected the history of the next half century cannot be exaggerated. The certain tendency of such an arrangement to become hereditary, and the certain tendency of the hereditary occupation of great fiefs ultimately to overwhelm the royal power, are well exemplified. The process by which, as we have seen, the king concentrates in himself the representation of the nation, as judge, patron, and landlord, reaches its climax only to break up, save where the king's hand is strong enough to hold fast what he has inherited, and the people are coherent enough to sustain him. The history of the reign of Edward the Confessor is little more than the variation of the balance of power between the families of Godwin and Leofric; the power of the witenagemot is wielded by the great earls in turn; each has his allies among the Welsh, Irish and Scottish princes, each his friends and refuge on the continent: at their alternate dictation the king receives and dismisses his wife, names and sets aside his bishops. The disruption of the realm is imminent. The work of Godwin is crowned by the exaltation of Harold, who saw the evils of the existing state and attempted at the sacrifice of his own family interests to unite the house of Leofric in the support of a national sovereignty. But the policy of Leofric, followed out by the lukewarm patriotism of Edwin and Morcar, opened the way to the Norman Conquest by disabling the right arm of Harold. The Norman Conquest restored national unity at a tremendous temporary sacrifice, just as the Danish Conquest in other ways, and by a reverse process, had helped to create it.

Reign of Edward the Confessor.

In all this however there is nothing that would lead to the conclusion of any formal infusion of Scandinavian polity¹. The measure, so far as it is new, is rather Frank or German, and in advance rather than in the rear of the indigenous development.

78. A glance at the Karolingian legislation of the ninth century suggests the important question whether the legal measures adopted by Alfred and his descendants were to any great extent influenced by continental precedents. The intercourse between the two courts had been close and constant, the social condition of the two nations was far more uniform than a superficial view of their history would lead us to believe, and in the laws of their respective legislative periods there are coincidences which can scarcely be regarded as accidental. During the reign of the Great Charles the Frank court was the home of English exiles, as well as of English scholars². Egbert spent as a banished man in France three years, one of which was marked by Charles's

Question of the infusion of Frank elements in the later Anglo-Saxon system.

¹ Hallam, M. A. ii. 272, comes to the same conclusion. The views of Northern antiquaries, who refer every point of similarity between Scandinavia and England to Norse and Danish influences in Britain, seem to be maintained in ignorance of the body of English history which existed earlier than the Norse invasions, the civilising and Christianising influence of England on Scandinavia, and the common stock of institutions that both nationalities possessed. The temperate and critical treatment of Konrad Maurer is strongly in contrast with this. But even the introduction of the huskarls and the forest law are to a certain extent outside our present subject: the former was no permanent institution, and the latter rests on too weak evidence to be accepted. I have therefore preferred to mention what is important about them under other heads.

² See the letters of Offa, Alcuin and Charles, in the Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents, iii. 487, 498, 561-565.

Intercourse
of the West Saxon kings
with the Karolings;

assumption of the imperial dignity¹. It is quite possible that there he conceived the desire of establishing a supremacy over the English kingdoms as well as the idea of binding to himself and his dynasty the mother church of the land in alliance for mutual patronage². The character and some part of the history of Ethelwulf are in strict parallel with those of Lewis the Pious, whose correspondent he was in his early years and whose granddaughter he married on his return from his Roman pilgrimage. Alfred drew from the empire some at least of the scholars whose assistance in the restoration of learning repaid to a great extent the debt due to England for the services of Alcuin. Charles the Simple and Otto the Great were married to two of the sisters of Athelstan; and whilst Otto was consolidating the Saxon empire on the continent, his nephew was gathering subject kings at his court and taking to himself the titles of emperor and Augustus.

contemporary policy of the Saxon emperors.

As Otto collected the great duchies of Germany into the hands of his sons and sons-in-law, Edgar placed the great ealdormanships of England in the hands of his own kinsmen. In ecclesiastical legislation at the same time England was largely copying from the manuals of Frank statesmanship. The Anglo-Saxon Canons and Penitentials of the tenth century are in great part translations and expansions of the Frank books of discipline which had a hundred years earlier been based on the works of Theodore and Egbert. It would be very rash to affirm that while the bishops, who composed so large a part of the witenagemot, sought foreign models for their canons, they did not seek foreign models for the secular laws. Dunstan had learned monastic discipline where he might also have furnished himself with the knowledge needed for the great office of first adviser to the king. But the brilliant period of imperial legislation was over before the time of Alfred; in the disorganisation of the latter period of the Karolings much of the framework of their system had ceased to exist except in the law books; and the parallels between Frank and English law must not be pressed of churches.

Intercourse

Periods of Frank and English
legislation
do not coincide.

¹ Chron. Sax. A.D. 836. Brihtric died in A.D. 802; Egbert's stay in France must have covered the date of Charles's coronation.

² See Chapter VIII. p. 236.

without allowing for the similarity of the circumstances which prompted them and for the fundamental stock of common principles and customs which underlay them. The law which provided that the landless man must have a lord appears in the Capitularies of Charles the Bald half a century before it appears in the dooms of Athelstan¹. The judicial investigations made by Alfred through his 'fideles' may remind us of the jurisdiction of the Frank 'missi': in England, as in the empire, the head of the shire receives a third part of the profits of the law courts²: and the great thegn is allowed to swear by the agency of a representative³. Yet all these may be merely the results of similar circumstances. In other points, where the coincidences are more striking, difference of circumstances may be fatal to an affirmative theory. It cannot be safely said that Edgar's regulations for the hundred were borrowed from the law of Childebert and Clothair, or that Ethelred's rating of the eight hides to furnish a helm and coat of mail was an imitation of the Frank practice⁴, or that the payment of Danegeld in A.D. 991 was consciously adopted on the precedent created by Charles the Bald in A.D. 861, 866 and 877 in Gaul and Lotharingia⁵. Jurists will probably always differ as to the relation between the scabini of Lewis the Pious and the Coincidence of law and usage.

Uncertainty of connexion.

¹ Above, p. 80.

² Asser, M. H. B. 497. 'Nam omnia pene totius suae regionis judicia, quae in absentia sua fiebant, sagaciter investigabat qualiter fierent, justa aut etiam injusta; aut vero si aliquam in illis judiciis iniquitatem intelligere posset, leniter advocatos illos ipsos iudices aut per se ipsum aut per alios suos fideles quoslibet interrogabat.'

³ Above, p. 113.

⁴ Ranks, § 5. Select Charters, p. 64. Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 228. 'Honorem enim talem nostris vassallis dominicis concedimus, ut ipsi non sicut reliqui manu propria sacramentum jurent, sed melior homo illorum et credibilior illud agere non differat.' Cap. Vern. A.D. 884, c. 11. 'Exceptis nostris vassis dominicis pro quibus illorum homines meliores juramentum persolvunt.' Ibid. c. 4. Baluze, ii. 195, 197. But this existed a century before in the Lex Saxonum, where the noble is allowed to swear 'in manu liti sui vel sua armata;' c. 8.

⁵ Robertson, Essays, p. x.

⁶ See the Capitularies of A.D. 861 (Baluze, ii. 103) and 877. 'Haec constituta est exactio Nortmannis qui erant in Sequana tribuenda ut a regione ejus recederent.' The tax in A.D. 877 is twelve denarii from the mansus indomiticatus; from the mansus ingenuilis four from the rent, four from the tenant; from the mansus servilis two from the rent and two from the tenant. Baluze, ii. 175, 176. Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 102. Robertson, Essays, pp. 116, 117. Ann. S. Bertin, A.D. 866.

Parallels not proofs.

assistant thegns of the shire moot¹; whether the twelve senior thegns who swear to accuse none falsely are a jury of inquest like the inquisitors of Lewis, or a compurgatory body to determine on the application of the ordeal. The oath imposed by Canute on every one above the age of twelve, that he will not be a thief nor cognisant of theft², runs back through the common form to Edmund's oath of allegiance³, and finds parallels in the earliest legislation of Charles the Great⁴. In more than one passage the collection of early English usages, known as the Leges Henrici Primi, recalls the exact language of the Capitularies and of still earlier laws⁵. But although we may be inclined to reject the theory that refers all such importations of Frank law to the Norman lawyers, and to claim for the institutions, which like trial by jury came to full growth on English soil, a native or at least a common Germanic origin, it is wiser and safer to allow the coincidences to speak for themselves; and to avoid a positive theory that the first independent investigator may find means of demolishing. It is enough that, although in different lines and in widely contrasted political circumstances, royalty was both in England and on the continent working itself into forms in which the old Germanic

¹ See above, p. 103.

² 'Volumus ut omnis homo post duodecimum aetatis suae annum juret quod fur esse nolit nec furi consentaneus.' Canute, ii. § 21. Compare with this the later regulations of Henry II and Richard I. Select Charters, pp. 137, 256.

³ Select Charters, p. 66. 'Ut nemo concelet hoc in fratre vel proximo suo plus quam in extraneo.'

⁴ Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 368. 'Judex unusquisque per civitatem faciat jurare ad Dei judicia homines credentes juxta quantos praeviderit, seu foris per curtes vel vicoras mansuros, ut cui ex ipsis cognitum fuerit, id est homicidia, furta, adulteria et de illicitas conjunctiones, ut nemo eas concelet.' Capit. Langobard. A.D. 782, c. 8. Cf. Capit. Silvac. A.D. 853; Baluze, ii. 44, 45.

⁵ See Schmid, Gesetze, pp. 437, 438, 471, 472, 484, 485; Thorpe, Ancient Laws, pp. 507, 509, 510, &c. The regulations of Athelstan (ii. § 14), Edgar (iii. § 8) and Ethelred (iv. § 6) respecting coin, may be compared with those of Lewis the Pious (Baluze, i. 432, 500), and Charles the Bald (ibid. ii. 120, 121). Cf. both with the Roman Law (Just. Cod. ii. § 24), from which they were doubtless derived. The law against holding gemots on Sundays and festivals (Ethelred, v. 13; Canute, i. 15) also resembles that of Charles the Great (Baluze, i. 183) and Charles the Bald (ibid. ii. 140, 141).

idea of the king is scarcely recognisable, whilst the influence of long-established organisations, of settled homes, and hereditary jurisdictions, was producing a territorial system of government unknown to the race in its early stages. A strong current of similar events will produce coincidences in the history of nations whose whole institutions are distinct; much more will like circumstances force similarly constituted nations into like expedients; nay, great legislators will think together even if the events that suggest the thought be of the most dissimilar character. No amount of analogy between two systems can by itself prove the actual derivation of the one from the other.

79. Although the progress of the Anglo-Saxon system, from the condition in which its whole organisation depends on personal relations to that in which everything depends on territorial ones, is marked at each step by some change in the royal power, it is better described in this formula than as a progress from democracy to monarchy, or from a democratic to an aristocratic monarchy, or from alodialism to feudalism. The growth of the royal power was theoretical rather than practical; what it gained on one side, it lost on another. The king became the source of justice, the lord and patron of his people, the owner of the public lands; but he had almost immediately to part with the substantial exercise of the powers so appropriated. By the grants of land, constantly increasing in number, the royal demesne was continually diminished, and the diminution of royal demesne made the taxation of the people the only available means of meeting public emergencies. The immunities which, by grant or by prescription, were vested in the holders of bookland, actually withdrew the profits and powers of jurisdiction from the source from which they themselves emanated. The patronage or lordship which was to unite the king more closely than ever before with the people, was intercepted by a number of mesne lordships and superiorities, which kept them in reality further asunder.

Edgar had perfected so far as we can see the theory of royalty. He had collected, we are told, a fleet of not less than 3600 ships, which every summer he reviewed and exercised in circumnavigating Britain, thus providing for present defence and for the Similar tendencies in Frank and English history.

Formula of development.

Diminution of the king's real powers.

Royalty reached its highest point in Edgar.

Edgar's administration.

maintenance of permanent discipline. The winter and spring he devoted to judicial circuits, in which he traversed all the provinces of the English, and accurately inquired how the magistrates observed the laws of the nation and his own decrees, that the poor might not suffer injury or oppression at the hands of the mighty¹. Possibly the tradition is brighter than the reality, for the evil times that followed may well have suggested an exaggeration of past blessings. But the spirit of Edgar's legislation is good. The preamble of his secular laws declares that every man shall be worthy of folkright, poor as well as rich; and the penalties for unrighteous judgment, with the promise of redress by the king in the last resort, immediately follow². With his death the evil days began at once. The strong men whom he had curbed to his service, took advantage of the youth and weakness of his sons; and internal divisions rendered the kingdom of Ethelred an easy prey to the Danes. The real benefit of the changes of the preceding century fell into the hands of the great ealdormen, and through them to the thegns. The local jurisdictions grew: the feeling of national union which had been springing up, was thrown back: the tribal divisions had become territorial, but they were divisions still. The great lords rounded off their estates and consolidated their jurisdictions: each had his own national and ecclesiastical policy. The Mercian Elfhere banished the monks and replaced them with married clerks; the East Anglian Ethelwin, God's friend, and the East-Saxon Brihtnoth, drove out the clerks and replaced the monks³. Where ecclesiastical order was settled by the local rulers, notwithstanding the strong hand of Dunstan, it was scarcely to be expected that temporal liberties could be sustained by Ethelred. Another Danish inroad

His legislation.

Increase of the power of the great lords.

¹ Florence of Worcester, A.D. 975. Edgar's judicial circuits were copied by Canute; Hist. Ramsey (ap. Gale), p. 441: and they may have been copied from the practice of Alfred; Asser, M. H. B. 497.

² Edgar, iii. § 1; 'Volo ut omnis homo sit dignus juris publici, pauper et dives, quicumque sit, et eis justa judicia judicentur; et sit in emendationibus remissio venialis apud Deum et apud saeculum tolerabilis.' The latter clause is re-echoed in the charters of Henry I and John; and may be traced further back in the legislation of Alfred. Ll. Introd. § 49. 7.

³ Flor. Wig. A.D. 975.

seemed needed to restore the state of things that Edgar had created.

80. One good result attended this apparent retrogression. There had been centralisation without concentration: all rights and duties were ranging themselves round the person of the king, and there was a danger that the old local organisations might become obsolete. Edgar had found it necessary to renew the law of the hundreds and to forbid recourse to the king's audience until the local means of obtaining justice had been exhausted¹. His fleets and armies may not improbably have been organised on a plan of centralisation. Such a tendency was almost a necessity where the royal authority was becoming recognised as imperial, or as limited only by a witenagemot of royal nominees in which no representation or concentration of local machinery had a place. The fact then that the great lords, by the extension of their own rights and the practical assertion of independence, took to themselves the advantages of the change and maintained their jurisdictions apart, gave a longer tenure of life to the provincial divisions. The national unity was weakened by the sense of provincial unity, and individual liberty was strengthened against the time when the national unity should be, not the centralisation of powers, but the concentration of all organisation; a period long distant and to be reached through strange vicissitudes. In the maintenance of provincial courts and armies was inherent the maintenance of ancient liberty.

Premature centralisation under Edgar.

The events that followed his death had the result of maintaining local divisions and popular institutions.

For notwithstanding the series of developments which have been traced so far, the forms of primitive organisation still generally survived. The warriors of the shire, whether free men of full political right, or the church vassals, or the contingents of the great thegns, fought as men of the shire under the ealdorman or his officer. The local force of Devonshire and Somersetshire was beaten by the Danes at Penho; the East Anglians and the men of Cambridgeshire fought apart at Ringmere; the men of Dorset, Wilts and Devon at Sherstone². Even the Maintenance of provincial administration in military matters.

¹ Edgar, iii. § 2: 'Nemo requirat regem pro aliqua causa nisi domi negetur ei omne dignum recti vel rectum impetrare non possit.'

² Flor. Wig. A.D. 1001, 1010, 1016.

Political independence of the earls.

political attitude of the province was determined by the ealdorman and the thegns. The Northumbrian earl Uhtred and the West Saxon earl Ethelmar make their separate agreements with Sweyn, and in so doing declare their independence of Ethelred¹.

Permanence of old customs.

But still more certainly in the local courts the old spirit of freedom found room. The forms were the same whether the king's gerefa or the lord's steward called them together: the hundred retained its peace, the township its customs: the very disruption of society preserved these things for the better days.

Old customs contain the seed of new liberties.

In the preservation of the old forms,—the compurgation by the kindred of the accused, the responsibility for the wergild, the representation of the township in the court of the hundred, and that of the hundred in the court of the shire; the choice of witnesses; the delegation to chosen committees of the common judicial rights of the suitors of the folkmoot; the need of witness for the transfer of chattels, and the evidence of the hundred or shire to the title to lands; the report of the hundred and shire as to criminals and the duty of enforcing their production and punishment, and the countless diversity of customs in which the several communities went to work to fulfil the general injunctions of the law,—in these remained the seeds of future liberties; themselves perhaps the mere shakings of the olive tree, the scattered grains that royal and noble gleaners had scorned to gather, but destined for a new life after many days of burial. They were the humble discipline by which a down-trodden people were schooled to act together in small things, until the time came when they could act together for great ones.

Growth of national character.

81. The growth of national character under these changes is a matter of further interest. Although the national experience was not enough to produce a strong and thorough feeling of union, it had been equable and general. No part of England was far behind any other in civilisation. The several kingdoms had been Christianised in rapid succession, and the amalgamation of the Danes had been so speedy as little to affect the comparative civilisation of the districts they occupied after it had once fairly begun. Northumbria had indeed never recovered the learning and cultivation of her early days, but Kent and Wessex had retrograded nearly as much during the dark century that preceded Alfred. The depression of national life under Ethelred was much the same everywhere. The free man learned that he had little beyond his own arm and the circle of his friends to trust to. The cohesion of the nation was greatest in the lowest ranges. Family, township, hundred, county held together when ealdorman was struggling with ealdorman and the king was left in isolated dignity. Kent, Devonshire, Northumbria, had a corporate life which England had not, or which she could not bring to action in the greatest emergencies. The witenagemot represented the wisdom, but concentrated neither the power nor the will, of the nation.

¹ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1013.

Uniform condition of England.

Greatest cohesion in the lowest ranges of organisation.

The individual Englishman must have been formed under circumstances that called forth much self-reliance and little hearty patriotism. His sympathies must have run into very narrow and provincial channels. His own home and parish were much more to him than the house of Cerdic or the safety of the nation. As a Christian, too, he had more real, more appreciable social duties than as an Englishman. He could accept Sweyn or Canute, if he would be his good lord and not change the laws or customs that regulated his daily life. There was a strong sense of social freedom without much care about political power. It was inherent in the blood. Caesar had seen it in the ancient German, and the empire of Charles and Otto strove in vain to remodel it in the medieval aggregation of the German-speaking nationalities; Bavarian, Saxon, Franconian, Swabian, were even less inclined to recognise their unity than were the nations which now called themselves English.

Effect of
national history on character.

The form however which this tendency took in the Anglo-Saxon of the eleventh century, is distinct from the corresponding phases of French and German character. The Frenchman can indeed scarcely be said as yet to have developed any national character; or rather the heavy hand of Frank supremacy had not so far relaxed its pressure as to allow the elastic nature of the Gallic element with French.

Contrast

The growing life in France is civic rather than rural.

But it is as yet scarcely conscious.

Contrast with the German.

Absence of a feeling of nationality among the English.

to assert itself; and the historical Frank of the age is still for the most part German. The territory itself scarcely ventures to take a collective name, and resembles the Gallia of Caesar more than that of Honorius. But the new life that is growing up is city life, and the liberties at which it grasps are collective rather than individual privileges. The rural populations of France are, as they were in the latter days of Roman rule, and as they continued to be more or less until the revolution, a people from whom social freedom had so long departed that it was scarcely regretted, scarcely coveted; to whom Christianity had brought little more than the idea of liberty in another life to be waited for and laboured for in the patient endurance of the present. The true life was in the towns, where, in the interests of commerce, or under the favour of some native lord temporal or spiritual, or under the patronage of a king who would fain purchase help on all sides against the overwhelming pressure of his too powerful friends, in the guild and the commune, men were making their puny efforts after free action. But this life had scarcely reached the surface: the acts of kings and councils fill the pages of history. Law was either slowly evolving itself in the shape of feudal custom, or resting on the changeless rock of Roman jurisprudence: the one unconscious of its development and calling forth no active participation in the people, the other subject to no development at all. Even the language has scarcely declared itself, except in the fragments of courtly minstrelsy.

The contrast between the Englishman and the native German is not so strong. The disruptive tendency in the English state is little connected with primitive national divisions. There is little evidence to show that the people in general felt their nationality as West Saxons or Mercians, however much they might realise their connexion as Yorkshiremen or men of Kent. The Saxon and Bavarian of the continent had each their national policy: their national consciousness was so strong that, like that of the Irish, it constantly impressed itself even upon alien rulers. The Saxon emperor made his nearest kinsman duke of Bavaria only to discover that he had made his son or brother a Bavarian instead of making the Bavarians loyal. The Swabian emperor sent a Swabian duke to Saxony in the idea that the Saxons would cling rather to the emperor than to an alien governor; but the Swabian duke became forthwith a Saxon, and the loyalty that was called forth was devoted entirely to the adopted ruler. And these nations had their political and ecclesiastical aims; the Saxons preferred the pope to any emperor but a Saxon one; the Bavarians were ready to give up the empire altogether if they might have a king of their own. In both there was a singular development of personal loyalty with a distinctly national aim in the politics of the empire. But in the Anglo-Saxon history there is an equally singular lack of personal loyalty, and a very languid appreciation of national action. Such loyalty as really appears is loyalty to the king, not to the provincial rulers whom they saw more closely and knew better. The poetic lamentations of the chronicler over the dead kings may perhaps express the feeling of the churchmen and the courtiers, but have nothing to answer to them in the case of the provincial rulers. The great earls had not, it would seem, an hereditary hold upon their people; and although they had political aims of their own, these were not such as the people could sympathise with. The popularity of Harold the son of Godwin is only an apparent exception: it was won indeed by his personal gifts and his ubiquitous activity, but carried with it no feeling of loyalty. Much even of that higher sentiment which was bestowed on his kingly career was retrospective; they valued him most when he was lost. Throughout, the connexion between patriotism and loyalty, such patriotism and loyalty as exist, seems to want that basis of personal affection which is so natural and necessary to it. It is not on national glories, but on national miseries that the Chronicler expatiates; and the misery brings out, perhaps more than necessary, the querulous and helpless tone of national feeling; a tone which no doubt is called forth by the oppressions of the Norman régime, but which might, under the same circumstances, in the mouths of other men, have been exchanged for one of very different character: the song of the people emulous of ancient glories, girding itself up for a strong and united effort after liberty. There is no breath of this in the English remains of the eleventh century, and the history of the ill-contrived and worse executed attempts to shake off the yoke of the Conqueror proves that there was little life of the kind. Yet there was life; although it lay deep now, it would be strong enough when it reached the surface: nor had the Conqueror any wish to break the bruised reed.

Strength of political provincial feeling among the Germans.

And of personal loyalty.

Languid consciousness of loyalty and patriotism among the English.

Little interest felt in England as to the ecclesiastical quarrels of the continent.

The lack of political aims which might give a stimulus to provincial patriotism, was not compensated by ecclesiastical partisanship, although the struggle between the seculars and regulars does fill a page in English history to the loss it may be feared of more important matter. But the great disputes between the imperial and papal pretensions that moved the continent, found no echo here, and called forth no sympathy. The English, like the continental Saxons, were proud of their faithfulness to Rome; but it was a far distant Rome that interfered very little with them, and that in the minds of their kings and prelates had the aspect of a spiritual city, very different from anything that was really to be found there. The clergy had but a faint notion of the difference between pope and antipope: even in doctrine they had scarcely advanced with the age, and there were points on which they were falling as far behind Roman orthodoxy as the British bishops had been in the Paschal controversy. When an English archbishop visited Rome he spent his time in pilgrimages to holy places: the pope received him with a splendid hospitality, that shewed him only what it was desirable that he should see; and he came back rich in relics, but as poor as ever in political experience. The secular world was still farther away from him: Canute, who had certain cosmopolitan and imperial instincts, knew better than to involve England in foreign complications. For a century and a half scarcely one Englishman has left his name on record in the work of any foreign historian.

The reasons of this isolation are apparent. The Englishman had enough to do at home in constant resistance to a persevering foe. But the isolation is not, as might be expected, combined with intenser patriotism. The fire of sympathy burns in a very narrow circle: there is little to call forth or diversify the latent energies.

But this is only one aspect of the Englishman. He may be phlegmatic, narrow, languid in political development, but he is neither uncivilised nor uncultivated. The isolation which has been fatal to political growth, has encouraged and concentrated other energies. Since the time of Alfred a national literature has been growing up, of which the very fragments that have survived the revolution of conquest and many centuries of literary neglect, are greater than the native contemporaneous literature of any other people in Europe. No other nation possesses a body of history such as the Anglo-Saxon Bede and the Chronicles. The theological literature, although slight in comparison with that of the Latin-speaking nations, testifies, by the fact that it is in the tongue of the people, to a far more thorough religious sympathy between the teachers and the taught than can be with any degree of probability attributed to the continental churches. In medicine, natural science, grammar, geography, the English of the eleventh century had manuals in their own tongue. They had arts too of their own; goldsmith's work, embroidery, illumination of manuscripts, flourished as well as the craft of the weaver and the armourer. The domestic civilisation of England, with all its drawbacks, was far beyond that of France. The Norman knights despised, undervalued and destroyed much that they could not comprehend. England was behind Europe in some of the arts which they had in common, but she had much that was her own, and developed what she had in common by her own genius. She might be behind in architecture, although that remains to be proved, for much that we know as the work of Northern architects was imitated from Roman models; an imitation which, although it later developed into systems far freer and nobler than anything that had existed before, was still only advancing from its rudest stage in France and Germany. England was slow in following the architecture as she was in following the politics of the continent. It is seldom remembered in comparing Norman and Anglo-Saxon in point of civilisation, how very little the Norman

Development of national life in other forms.

National
literature.

National art and domestic life.

Contrast of Norman and Englishman.

brought in comparison with what he destroyed, and how very little he brought that was his own. His law was Frank or Lombard, his general cultivation that of Lanfranc and Anselm, far more Italian than native: in civilisation—taken in the truer sense of the word,—in the organisation of the social life, in the means of obtaining speedy and equal justice, in the whole domain of national jurisprudence, he was far behind those whom he despised with the insolence of a barbarian; he had forgotten his own language, he had no literature, his art was foreign and purchased. But he was a splendid soldier, he had seen the great world east and west, he knew the balance of power between popes and emperors; and he was a conqueror: he held the rod of discipline which was to school England to the knowledge of her own strength and power of freedom: he was to drag her into the general network of the spiritual and temporal politics of the world, rousing her thereby to a consciousness of unsuspected, undeveloped powers: he was to give a new direction to her energies, to widen and unite and consolidate her sympathies: to train her to loyalty and patriotism; and in the process to impart so much, and to cast away so much, that when the time of awakening came, the conqueror and the conquered, the race of the oppressor and the race of the oppressed were to find themselves one people¹.

¹ 'After the closing scenes of the great drama commenced at Hastings, it ceased to exist as a national character; and the beaten, ruined and demoralised Anglo-Saxon found himself launched in a new career of honour, and rising into all the might and majesty of an Englishman. Let us reflect that the defeats upon the Thames and Avon were probably necessary preliminaries to victories upon the Sutej.' Kemble, Cod. Dipl. iv. pref. vi. Carlyle, Fred. II., i. 415, taking a different view of the Anglo-Saxon temperament, says, 'without them (i. e. the Normans and Plantagenets) what had it ever been? a gluttonous race of Jutes and Angles, capable of no grand combinations; lumbering about in pot-bellied equanimity; not dreaming of heroic toil, and silence, and endurance, such as leads to the high places of this universe and the golden mountain tops where dwell the spirits of the dawn.' . . . 'Nothing but collision, intolerable interpressure (as of men not perpendicular), and consequent battle often supervening, could have been appointed those undrilled Anglo-Saxons; their pot-bellied equanimity itself continuing liable to perpetual interruption, as in the heptarchy times.' This recalls the words of earls Ralph and Roger, 'Angli sua solummodo rura colunt, conviviis et potationibus non praeliis intendunt.' Ord. Vit. ap. Maseres, p. 304.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE ANGLO-SAXON CHURCH.

82. Growth of the church organisation in England.—83. Freedom from the leaven of Roman imperialism.—84. Monasticism.—85. Divisions of dioceses and origin of parishes.—86. Tithes and endowments.—87. Ecclesiastical councils.—88. Relations of the church to the states.—89. Revival under Alfred.—90. The eleventh century.

82. THE conversion of the heptarchic kingdoms during the seventh century not only revealed to Europe and Christendom the existence of a new nation, but may be said to have rendered the new nation conscious of its unity in a way in which, under the influence of heathenism, community of language and custom had failed to do so. The injunctions of Pope Gregory to the first mission would seem to show that he knew the whole cluster of tribes under the name of English¹, and regarding them as one nationality provided a simple scheme of ecclesiastical organisation for them; there were to be two provinces each containing twelve episcopal sees, governed by two metropolitans, one at London, the other at York. But the comparative failure of the Kentish mission after the death of Ethelbert, and the fact that each of the seven kingdoms owed its evangelisation to a different source, must have rendered the success of S. Gregory's scheme problematical from the very first. Kent remained permanently Christian under the successors of Augustine; but Wessex was converted by Birinus, a missionary from Northern Italy, East Anglia by a Burgundian, Northumbria and Mercia by Irishmen, Essex and Sussex by the labours of Cedd and Wilfrid. It might have seemed by the middle of the century that the heptarchic

The nation awakes to the consciousness of its unity at the conversion.

S. Gregory's scheme for organising the church.

Distinct sources of mission in the several kingdoms.

¹ Bede, H. E. i. 27. 29.

Causes of division in the early English
church.

divisions were to be reproduced in the ecclesiastical ones. The questions of discipline arising between the Roman and the Irish converts lent an additional element of division. Each kingdom might have had a church of its own, distinct in ritual and traditions from all the rest. This danger was averted by the kings Oswy and Egbert when they joined in sending to Rome a candidate for the see of Canterbury¹; and Oswy himself, by renouncing the Irish custom of Easter at the synod of Streonshalch, set the seven churches at peace on that most fruitful matter of discord². The policy of Oswy was thoroughly carried out by Archbishop Theodore of Tarsus. Theodore's scheme of organisation opened the prospect of a more complete unity than that of S. Gregory: there was to be one metropolitan at Canterbury under whom the whole of England was to be carved out into new dioceses. Oswy died before it could be seen whether he and Theodore could work together, and the merit of the scheme actually carried out is due to the latter. This great prelate, himself a philosopher and divine of Eastern training, who had accepted the Roman tonsure and credentials for his message of peace, began his career by consolidating as well as he could the several elements of life that had survived the great pestilence of A.D. 662. The Augustinian succession had almost, if not entirely, died out³. Wilfrid and Chad, although they had ceased to differ on points of discipline, represented in their history, their sympathy and their claims, the two opposing schools. Theodore's first care was to settle the personal disputes between them, and through them to make permanent peace between the two sources of mission. He next, in A.D. 673, at the council of Hertford, combined the whole episcopate in a single synod, and provided, by instituting an annual council of Clovesho⁴, for their permanent cooperation. In A.D. 678 he divided Northumbria, and in the following year Mercia also, into new dioceses: Wessex alone of the larger kingdoms resisted; but a few years after Theodore's

Policy of Oswy and Theodore.

Theodore's scheme of organisation.

¹ Bede, H. E. iii. 29.

² Ibid. iii. 25.

³ It is questionable whether Boniface of East Anglia survived at the arrival of Theodore; but if so he must have died shortly after: and Damian of Rochester is described as having been long dead Ibid. iv. 2.

⁴ Ibid. iv. 5.

death it was subdivided and the whole nation then ranged under sixteen sees, subject to the metropolitan primacy of Canterbury. The arrangement was broken up shortly after, so far as to allow to the see of York its title of archbishop and the obedience of three suffragans ; but until the Norman Conquest the Northern primate occupied a very subordinate position to his brother at Canterbury. The institution of the archbishopric of Lichfield by Offa, in A.D. 787, threatened once more to break up the ecclesiastical system. The third metropolitanate however was very short-lived¹. The final subdivision of Wessex by Edward the Elder completed the scheme of Theodore and the territorial organisation of the dioceses, which has continued with some minor changes and additions to the present day.

Creation of dioceses.

Besides devising this constitution, Theodore did his best to secure and promote cultivation and civilisation in other ways, especially by educating the clergy and tightening the reins of moral and religious discipline. In this he was assisted by the kings, without whose cooperation it could not have been attempted, and who showed an amount of policy, judgment and foresight, in these matters which could scarcely be looked for in the rulers of a half-Christianised people, themselves as much marked by internecine family bloodshed as by religious devotion. In a single century England became known to Christendom as a fountain of light, as a land of learned men, devout and unwearied missions, of strong, rich and pious kings.

Other features of Theodore's policy.

83. The whole material fabric had to be built up from the foundation. Roman Christianity had passed away from Eastern Britain leaving few and indistinct traces. The greater part of the Britons either had never been converted or during the attacks of the Saxons had fallen back into heathenism². British

Attitude of British Christianity towards the English church.

¹ Councils, &c. iii. 444, 445, 542-545. It lasted from A.D. 787 to A.D. 803. The only archbishop of Lichfield was named Higbert.

² Bede, H. E. iv. 13, 16, describes Sussex and the Isle of Wight as entirely heathen in the time of Wilfrid ; that is either the Christian Britons had been exterminated or they had become heathenised. From the words of Eddius, c. 40, referring to the same transaction, it would seem that the pagans were Saxons, 'gentis nostrae quaedam provincia gentilis usque ad illud tempus perseverans.' In the North of England the British clergy had fled long before, deserting their property, which Wilfrid accordingly

Result on the Britons
themselves.

Christianity had taken refuge in the Welsh mountains, and made no attempt either to convert the conquerors or to maintain a spiritual hold on the conquered. There was no reason why the English should not have become Christian when and as the Franks did, but from the condition and temper of the native population, on whom the continuance of the conquerors in idolatry and persecuting cruelty brought ultimate extermination. The positive paganism of the Anglo-Saxons was, as far as concerns its mythology and ritual, in the most attenuated condition. Scarcely was Christianity presented to them by the seventh-century missions when they embraced it with singular fidelity and singleness of heart. It could not have failed to prevail earlier but for the attitude of the Britons, who, demoralised by desertion and cut off from all the supports and advantages of communion with foreign churches, had sunk into a despairing lethargy which took for its main principle obstinate and indiscriminating isolation.

The English
church saved
from the traditions of the Romano-British
system.

Anglo-Saxon Christianity was thus saved from the danger of inheriting the traditions and the burdens of the earlier system. The wave of conquest obliterated in all the South and East of Britain every vestige of Romano-British Christianity. The seats of the bishops had become desolated ruins: the diocesan divisions, if they had ever existed, had been effaced with the civil landmarks on whose lines they may have been drawn¹. And thus the wonderful vitality of imperialist traditions which did so much to leaven the character and history of the churches of France and the Rhineland, finding their way to light, in some cases, after devastation and desolation scarcely less than that which befel Britain, took no hold here. Escaping this, the English church was saved from the infection of court-life and corruption which forms nearly the whole history of the early claimed for the Northumbrian church, Eddius, c. 17. Except on the borders of Wessex and Mercia no traces of British church organisation are discoverable from Bede.

¹ Haddan, Councils, i. 142, regards the attestation of the British bishops at Arles in A.D. 314, as proving the existence of diocesan episcopacy in the British church, as opposed to the Irish and Scottish system 'of government by abbots, with bishops as subordinate officers discharging episcopal functions but without jurisdiction.' Wales also had diocesan bishops, and their parochiæ are mentioned by Gildas. Ibid. p. 143.

Franco-Gallican church. Nor was it called on to act as the protector of a down-trodden people, and undergo the risks that attend political and party religion; it escaped the position forced upon the bishops of France as secular officers, defenders, and civil magistrates. And this fact is marked by the choice of the sees of the bishops. They were in many cases selected in full agreement with the German instinct of avoiding cities; and planted in villages or country monasteries which served as a nucleus for the later towns¹. Hence, with some few exceptions, the bishops were not local potentates in the way that the French and German prelates were². They were members of the council of the realm to which they belonged and sat also in the local folkmoot with the prestige of wisdom and sanctity, with higher wergild and oath incontrovertible; but they did not become the counts or dukes of their dioceses, or entangle themselves with the secular intricacies of the divided and bewildered nation whose spiritual guides they were. Thus Archbishop Egbert sat at York undisturbed in his primacy during the reigns of five princes bound in close relationship with himself, all of whom owed their elevation and deposition to revolt. In Kent the archbishops ruled from A.D. 740 to A.D. 789, during a period of so much subdivision and anarchy in the kingdom that not even the names of the competitors or the dates of their reigns have been preserved. In scarcely any case was a bishop removed from his see for political causes³, until Offa attempted to disturb the

It escapes the danger of becoming political.

Important position of the prelates apart from secular commotions.

¹ In the cases of York, London, Canterbury, Rochester, Leicester, Winchester, and possibly Sidnacester and Worcester, the mother church was placed in the chief town of the kingdom. In the cases of Lichfield, Lindisfarne, Hereford, Sherborne, Selsey, Elmham, Dunwich, Hexham, villages were chosen or created for the purpose; and of the new sees of Edward the Elder, Wells, Ramsbury, and Crediton were villages.

² The archbishops seem always to have had a more distinctly secular position than the diocesan bishops, a consequence no doubt of their exercising jurisdiction in several kingdoms. They also coined money bearing their own name and likeness. The coins of the archbishops of Canterbury run back to the middle of the eighth century, and those of York are only a little later. Councils, &c. iii. 403.

³ There are very few cases of deposition of bishops in the Anglo-Saxon church history at all. Archbishop Theodore deposed Winfrith of Mercia for disobedience, and Trumbert of Hexham also; Bede, H. E. iv. 6, 28; Wilfrid of York was banished and restored more than once; Acca of Hexham had to fly from his see in A.D. 732, probably in consequence of the disorders

balance and reform the provincial arrangement of the dioceses. The bishops were occasionally able to act as peacemakers, they were probably always the friends and advisers of their kings, but they were distinctly spiritual men and unfettered by secularity, at least until the consolidation of the West Saxon hegemony.

Prevalence of monasticism.

84. The universality of monasticism is the less pleasant side of this picture; and yet it may be questioned whether anything but monasticism could have kept the church and clergy free from the political combinations and dangers of the early time. The original missionaries were nearly all monks; the mission stations, the bishop's houses, and the homes of the country clergy, were all monasteries; not, it is true, in the strict sense of the Benedictine rule, but sufficiently near it to claim all the rights, privileges and immunities which were accorded to it. There were great evils in this arrangement; the privileges and immunities were so great as to invite false brethren. Many houses in which no rule or system of religion was observed, took the name of monasteries to escape public burdens, and brought discredit and reproach upon those that truly bore the name¹. Even the regularly endowed communities grew too rich, and in the time of Bede engrossed too large a share of the public land²: in their wealth they lost sight of the strict obligations of a religious life, so that before the middle of the eighth century, a stringent reform was demanded, and the secular were synodically divided from the monastic clerks³. But with all these drawbacks, the mon-

of Northumbria; Wulfstan of York was set aside and imprisoned for treason in A. D. 952, but afterwards restored; Brihthelm, the bishop appointed by Edwy to Canterbury, was set aside by Edgar. Of resignation there are very many instances.

¹ Council of Clovesho, A. D. 747, c. 5: 'Monasteria, si tamen ea fas est ita nominare, quae utique quamvis temporibus istis propter vim tyrannicae quandam avaritiae, ad religionis Christianae statum nullatenus immutari possint; id est a saecularibus, non divinae scilicet legis ordinatione, sed humanae adinventionis praesumptione, utcumque tenentur.' Councils, &c. iii. 364. Bede also speaks of innumerable places 'in monasteriorum ascripta vocabulum sed nihil prorsus monasticae conversationis habentia.' Ep. ad Egbert. ; Councils, iii. 319.

² 'Tot sub nomine monasteriorum loca hi qui monachicae vitae prorsus sunt expertes in suam ditionem acceperunt . . . ut omnino desit locus ubi filii nobilitum aut emeritorum militum possessionem accipere possint.' Ibid. p. 320.

³ Council of Clovesho, A. D. 747, cc. 4, 5, 19, 28. Still more strongly is it astic system did its work well, and that a most important work for the time. It colonised the country by means of missions, furnished the supply of teachers in districts too poor and too thinly peopled to provide for their own clergy; and in a manner levelled and equalised the country for parochial administration. The monastic spirit has, further, had in all ages a singular corporate consciousness; and, besides the influence of common councils and canonical customs, the fact that the clergy felt their vows and spiritual relations to be a much more real tie and basis of consolidation than mere nationality, must have led to the elimination of provincial feeling amongst them. The Mercian priest was free of all the churches. A Mercian or West Saxon prelate might rule at Canterbury; the bishop of East Anglia might be a Kentish man, and a South Saxon rule at Rochester¹.

Real services of the monastic system.

Whilst then the church formed a basis of national union, the clergy escaped the danger of sinking into a hereditary caste, as was the case largely both in the Irish churches and on the continent. Some marked traces of this tendency however are found in England, in the age immediately preceding the Conquest²; and that the escape was a narrow one is shown by the number insisted on in the decrees of the legatine councils of A.D. 787: 'Ut episcopi diligentibus cura provideant quo omnes canonici sui canonice vivant et monachi seu monachae regulariter conversentur.' Councils, iii. 450. This is the first time the word canon occurs in an English document; and the term never became common until the eve of the Norman Conquest.

No clerical caste.

¹ Instances of the international character of the priesthood, and especially of monachism, are abundant. Tatwin, the ninth archbishop of Canterbury, was a Mercian (Bede, H. E. v. 23), and after the time of Alfred the archbishops were generally West Saxons. Pecthelm, the deacon of Aldhelm, was made bishop of Whithern: Damian, a South Saxon, was bishop of Rochester. Ibid. v. 13, iii. 20. In the North of England, and during the later Anglo-Saxon period, the instances are less frequent; freedom of election, or local influence, would generally determine in favour of a native candidate.

² On the descent of ecclesiastical property through an hereditary line of priests, see Raine's preface to the Memorials of Hexham. 'The institution of the Culdees, which was maintained by this custom, had probably spread into the Northumbrian church. The particular Keledan laxity appears to have been that, precisely like their Irish and Welsh congeners, they lapsed into something like impropiators (to use the modern term), married, and transmitting their church endowments, as if they had been their own, to their children, but retaining, at any rate in most cases, their clerical office.' Haddan, Councils, ii. 178.

Hereditary descent of clerical estates.

of early charters, which distinctly prove the descent of the half-secular monastic estates through a series of generations, in which either clerical celibacy was unknown, or the successive heads of the monasteries must have delayed ordination until they became fathers and mothers of families large enough to continue the succession. These occur throughout the history of the early Anglo-Saxon church, and must not be regarded as a mark of monastic decadence, though distinctly an abuse¹. The royal and noble monasteries were clearly regarded as family benefices, for which the only requisite was the assumption of orders or the taking of vows; they served as places of retirement for worn-out statesmen and for public functionaries—kings, queens, and ealdormen, whose forced seclusion gave to their retreats somewhat of the character of reformatories².

Formation of dioceses out of the early kingdoms.

85. The development of the local machinery of the church was in a reverse order to that of the state; the bishoprics being first formed, then the parishes; and at a much later period, the archdeaconries and deaneries. The original bishoprics of the conversion were the heptarchic kingdoms; and the see was in some instances the capital. The kingdom of Kent formed the dioceses of Canterbury and her suffragan Rochester; Essex was the diocese of London; Wessex that of Dorchester or Winchester; Northumbria that of York; East Anglia that of Dunwich; the site of the original Mercian see is not fixed, but within a few years of the conversion it was placed by S. Chad at Lichfield. In all cases, for a short time, the diocese coincided with the kingdom, and needed no other limitation; the court was the chief mission-station, and sent out monks or priests to convert the outlying settlements. There were as yet very few churches; crosses were set up in the villages and on the estates of Christian nobles, at the foot of which the missionaries preached, said mass, and baptized¹. The only officer of the bishop was his deacon, who acted as his secretary and companion in travel, and occasionally as interpreter. The bishop's house, however, contained a number of clerks, priests, monks and nuns, and was both a home of retreat to the weary missionary and a school for the young. These inmates lived by a sort of rule, which was regarded as monastic, and the house and church were the monasterium or minster. Gifts of land were at this very early stage bestowed both on the bishop's minster and on others, which, although under his governance spiritually, were less exclusively his own, having their abbots and abbesses with full powers of economical administration. These houses were frequently of royal foundation, ruled by persons of noble blood; some of them contained both male and female votaries, and might be ruled by persons of either sex².

¹ See, for example, the charters referring to monasteries at Fladbury; Sture and Withington, in the Cod. Dipl. xxxiii, cxlvi, ccxv; lxxx, cxvii; lxxxii, cxxiv. In one case the principle is laid down thus: Abbot Headda left his monastery at Onnanford to the see of Worcester, under condition 'quod mei haeredes in mea genealogia in ecclesiastico gradu de virili sexu percipiant, quamdiu in mea prosapia tam sapiens et praesciens inveniri potest qui rite et monastice ecclesiasticam normam regere queat, et nunquam potestati laicorum subdetur.' Ibid. clxix. Benedict Biscop thought differently; he declared that he would rather his monastery should become an eternal solitude than that his brother should be elected abbot, not having entered the way of truth. Bede, Hist. Abbat. c. 9. It was forbidden also by Theodore, Penit. ii. 6: 'Ipse non potest aliquem ordinare de suis pinquis.'

² Abundant instances, in which the retirement can scarcely be regarded as voluntary, may be found in Simeon of Durham's annals of the eighth century. An adulteress may retire to a monastery. (Theod. Penit. ii. 12.) The thief has a choice between a monastery and slavery. Ibid. i. 3: 'Aut intret in monasterium Deo servire aut humanum subeat servitium.' Ibid. i. 7: 'Eat in monasterium et poeniteat usque ad mortem.'

The diocese at first coincided with the kingdom.

Simplicity of organisation.

Early endowments.

When archbishop Theodore undertook to organise the church, he found little more than this to work on. He found dioceses identical with kingdoms; no settled clergy, and no definite territorial subdivisions. His first measure was, as we have seen, to

Scanty materials for Theodore's work.

¹ 'Quia sic mos est Saxonicae gentis, quod in nonnullis nobilium bonorumque hominum praediis, non ecclesiam sed sanctae crucis signum Domino dicatum cum magno honore alium, in alto erectum, ad commodam diurnae orationis sedulitatem solent habere.' V. S. Willibaldi, Mab. AA. SS. saec. iii. pt. 2, p. 334. This is late in the eighth century. Bede describes the building of churches throughout Northumbria under Oswald, H. E. iii. 3: 'Construebantur ergo ecclesiae per loca, confluebant ad audiendum verbum populi gaudentes, donabantur regio munere possessiones.'

² These mixed monasteries are animadverted on but not forbidden by Theodore, Penit. ii. 6: 'Non licet viris feminas habere monachas neque feminis viros, tamen non destruamus illud quod consuetudo est in hac terra.' The custom was perhaps derived from Ireland. S. Hilda's monastery at Whitby is the most famous instance. The practice seems to have subsisted until the ninth century.

Subdivision of dioceses on the still earlier provincial lines.

break up the dioceses; and in doing so, he followed the lines of the still existing territorial or tribal arrangements which had preceded the creation of the seven kingdoms. East Anglia was first divided between the northern and southern divisions of the folk; the former with its see at Elmham, the latter clinging to Dunwich. Northumbria followed; York, the capital of Deira, had already put in its claim, according to the direction of S. Gregory, and had its own bishop. Bernicia remained to Lindisfarne and Hexham; and the Picts had a missionary bishop at Whithern: the Lindisfari, of modern Lincolnshire, who at the moment of the division were under the Northumbrian king, received a bishop with his see at Sidnacester. Next, Mercia was divided; the recovered province of Lindsey was recognised as a new diocese; the kingdom of the Hwiccas, which still existed as an under-kingdom, furnished another with its see at Worcester; North and South Hecana had their bishop at Hereford, and the Middle Angles theirs at Leicester. Wessex broke up after Theodore's death; Sussex, which now was permanently subject as a kingdom, was made the diocese of the mission see at Selsey; the kingdom of Wessex proper was divided by the forest of Selwood into two convenient divisions, of which the Western half had its see at Sherborne, Winchester remaining the see of the Eastern half, with a sort of primacy of its own, as the mother church¹.

Great development
of monas-
ticism.

The subdivision of the dioceses was followed by a great development of monasticism; the monastery continued to be the typical church settlement, and the monastic history casts almost all other into the shade. Still we may learn from Bede that the country churches were also multiplied, and local provision of some sort was made for the village clergy². What measures

¹ The dates of the foundation of these sees are as follows: Canterbury, A.D. 597; London and Rochester, A.D. 604; York, A.D. 625, restored in A.D. 664 and 678, and endowed with the pall in A.D. 735; Dunwich, in A.D. 630; the see of Wessex, at Dorchester, A.D. 634 (afterwards at Winchester); Lindisfarne, A.D. 635; that of Mercia, A.D. 656, settled at Lichfield in A.D. 669. In A.D. 673 Theodore instituted the see of Elmham; in A.D. 676, Hereford; in A.D. 678, Sidnacester and Hexham; in A.D. 680, Worcester and Leicester; in A.D. 681, Whithern. In A.D. 705 Sherborne was founded; and in A.D. 709, Selsey.

² Bede urges on Egbert the importance of this: 'necessarium satis est ut plures tibi sacri operis adjuutores adsciscas, presbyteros videlicet ordinando

Theodore, who is the traditional creator of the parochial system¹, Organisation of parishes. took in this direction can only be conjectured: it is unnecessary to suppose that he founded it, for it needed no foundation. As the kingdom and shire were the natural sphere of the bishop, so was the township of the single priest; and the parish was but the township or cluster of townships to which that priest ministered². The fact that the two systems, the parish and the township, have existed for more than a thousand years side by side, identical in area and administered by the same persons, and yet separate in character and machinery, is a sufficient proof that no legislative act could have been needed in the first place; nor was there any lay council of the whole nation which could have sanctioned such a general measure. Considering, moreover, the thorough harmony of church and state in these ages, any legislation would probably have altogether sunk one of the two systems in the other. The parish, then, is the ancient vicus or tun-scipe regarded ecclesiastically. The parish is the township in its ecclesiastical character. As many townships were too small to require or to support a separate church and priest, many parishes contain several townships; but the fact of a township lying partly in one parish and partly in another, without being very uncommon, is rare enough to be exceptional, and may generally be accounted for by more recent local history.

86. The maintenance of the clergy thus settled was provided chiefly by the offerings of the people: for the obligation of tithe in its modern sense was not yet recognised. It is true that the duty of bestowing on God's service a tenth part of the goods was a portion of the common law of Christianity, and as such was impressed by the priest on his parishioners³. Maintenance of the clergy. But it was

atque instituendo doctores qui in singulis viculis prædicando Dei verbo, et consecrandis mysteriis coelestibus ac maxime peragendis sacri baptismatis officii, ubi opportunitas ingruerit, insistant.' Ep. ad Egeb. c. 3.

¹ Elmham, ed Hardwick, pp. 285, 286: 'Excitabat fidelium devotionem et voluntatem, in quarumlibet provinciarum civitatibus necnon villis, ecclesias fabricandi, parochias distinguendi, assensus eisdem regios procurando, ut qui sufficientes essent et ad Dei honorem pro voto haberent super proprium fundum ecclesias construere earundem perpetuo patronatu gauderent.' This is mere tradition or invention.

² Above, p. 85.

³ Tithes are mentioned by Theodore in the genuine Penitential, in a way that proves the duty of making the payment, but not the right of the clergy

Origin of Tithes.

not possible or desirable to enforce it by spiritual penalties : nor was the actual expenditure determined except by custom, or by the will of the bishop, who usually divided it between the church, the clergy, and the poor. It was thus precarious and uncertain, and the bestowal of a little estate on the church of the township was probably the most usual way of eking out what the voluntary gifts supplied¹.

Legislation
on the subject of Tithes.

The recognition of the legal obligation of tithe dates from the eighth century, both on the continent and in England. In A.D. 779 Charles the Great ordained that every one should pay tithe, and that the proceeds should be disposed of by the bishop²: and in A.D. 787 it was made imperative by the legatine councils held in England, which being attended and confirmed by the kings and ealdormen had the authority of witenagemots³. From that time it was enforced by not unfrequent legislation. The famous donation of Ethelwulf had nothing to do with tithe⁴; but almost all the laws issued after the death of Alfred contain some mention of it. The legislation of Edgar is somewhat minute on the subject: directing the tithe of young to be paid at Whitsuntide, and that of the fruits of the earth at the autumnal equinox, thus testifying to the general devotion to the sole use of them: 'Presbiter (or presbitero) decimas dare non cogitur.' Lib. ii. 2. 'Tributum ecclesiae sit, sicut consuetudo provinciae, id est ne tantum pauperes inde in decimis aut in aliquibus rebus vim patientur. Decimas non est legitimum dare nisi pauperibus et peregrinis, sive laici suas ad ecclesias.' Lib. ii. 14. Bede praises Bishop Eadbert of Lindisfarne, as 'maxime eleemosynarum operatione insignis, ita ut juxta legem omnibus annis decimam non solum quadrupedum verum etiam frugum omnium atque pomorum, necnon et vestimentorum partem pauperibus daret.' Hist. Eccl. iv. 29. In the laws of Edward the Confessor the obligation is alleged to have been introduced by Augustine, that is, at the Conversion.

¹ See Cap. de partibus Saxoniac, Baluze i. 183, Art. 15, which shows that this was the rule approved by Charles; 'ad unamquamque ecclesiam curtem et duos mansos terrae pagenses ad ecclesiam recurrentes condonent, et inter centum viginti homines nobiles et ingenuos, similiter et litos, servum et ancillam eidem ecclesiae tribuant.'

² Cap. A.D. 779, Art. 7: 'De decimis, ut unusquisque suam decimam donet atque per jussionem pontificis dispensentur.' Baluze i. 142.

³ 'Praecipimus ut omnes studeant de omnibus quae possident decimas dare, quia speciale Domini Dei est.' Can. 17; Councils, &c. iii. 456.

⁴ Except as showing the sanctity of the tenth portion. See Councils, &c. iii. 636 sq.; Kemble, Saxons, ii. 481-490. See p. 237 below.

of the tithe of increase¹. The legal determination of the church to which the tithe was to be paid was not yet settled. The same king directs that it shall be paid to the 'eald mynster,' or mother church to which the district belongs²; the thegn who had on his bookland a church with a buryingplace was bound to give a third of his own tithe to that church; if there were no buryingplace, his gift to the priest might be what he pleased³: the cathedral church being it would seem the normal recipient, and the bishop the distributor. But the actual determination was really left very much to the owner of the land from which the tithe arose; and although in the free townships it must have become the rule to give it to the parish priests, the lords of franchises found it a convenient way of making friends and procuring intercessions to bestow it on monasteries. This custom became very frequent after the Norman Conquest, and it was not until the council held in A.D. 1200 that the principle was summarily stated that the parochial clergy have the first claim on the tithe even of newly cultivated lands⁴. Even after that time, by the connivance of bishops and popes, the appropriation system worked widely and banefully. Besides the tithe, the clergy received, under the name of cyric-sceat or church-sceat, a sort of commutation for firstfruits paid by every householder; and sawl-sceat, soul-sceat or mortuary-dues, with other occasional spontaneous offerings⁵.

Rapidly and regularly as the organisation and endowment of the church proceeded under Theodore and his successors, it was not such as to satisfy the pious longings or to silence the severe judgment of Bede. He saw that in the northern province much greater subdivision was necessary⁶, and he viewed with fear and anger the corruptions of the monastic life, which the rich and

Law of Tithe.

Bede's desire for progress and reform.

¹ Edgar, ii. § 3.

² Ibid. §§ 1, 2.

³ Ibid. § 2.

⁴ Can. Westm. 9; Johnson's Canons. ii. 89.

⁵ The church-sceat was paid at Martinmas, Ini, § 4; 'according to the hearth that a man is at at midwinter,' Ibid. § 61; i.e. in the township where he keeps Christmas. See, on the whole subject, Kemble, Saxons, vol. ii.; Schmid, Gesetze, 545 sq.

⁶ See especially the letter to Archbishop Egbert, c. 5; Councils, &c. iii. 319; and compare the appeals of Boniface to Ethelbald, King of Mercia, ibid. 350-356.

Mischievous effects of Mercian supremacy.

vicious were perverting in a strange degree. But the bright days of the early church were already over, and notwithstanding the efforts of Cuthbert of Canterbury in his councils, and of Egbert of York in court, school, and study, the evil days of Mercian supremacy told heavily on the church. These reached their climax when Offa in A.D. 787 proposed and carried out the division of the province of Canterbury, established a new archbishopric at Lichfield to which the sees now included in the Mercian kingdom should pay obedience, and obtained by a liberal tribute to Rome the papal authorisation of his plan¹. This payment,—for there is a want of evidence as to the institution by Ini of a similar tribute for the maintenance of the English school at Rome,—is probably the origin of the Rom-feoh, or Peter's pence, a tax of a penny on every hearth, which was collected and sent to Rome from the beginning of the tenth century, and was a subject of frequent legislation². But the archiepiscopate of Lichfield scarcely survived its founder.

Archbishopric of Lichfield.

Rome-scot.

Ecclesiastical councils.

87. The ecclesiastical councils of the heptarchie period were either national, such as those of Hertford and Hatfield under Theodore³, or provincial, as was generally the case after the vindication of the metropolitanical claims of York under Egbert. Of ecclesiastical assemblies of the single kingdoms there are perhaps occasional traces, but they are scarcely distinguishable from the separate witenagemots. All these councils in many respects resemble the witenagemots. The presence of the kings and ealdormen seems to have been by no means unusual⁴: and although actual participation by the latter in ecclesiastical legislation may not have been permitted, their confirmation and attestation of the results was not undervalued. The bishops,

Presence of kings and ealdormen.

¹ The annual tribute of 365 mancuses was, according to Pope Leo III, bestowed by Offa in the legatine council of A.D. 787. Councils, &c. iii. 445. A similar benefaction of Ethelwulf (W. Malmesb.; Councils, iii. 646) is also recorded.

² Edw. and Guthr. 6, § 1; Ethelred v. 11. It was paid on the feast of S. Peter and S. Paul, June 29.

³ Bede, H. E. iv. 5, 17, 18.

⁴ At the legatine council of A.D. 787 Offa was present 'cum senatoribus terrae;' Councils, &c. iii. 460. At the council of Chelsea in A.D. 816 Kennif was present 'cum suis principibus, ducibus et optimatibus.' Ibid. p. 579.

however, were the chief permanent element: abbots are not unfrequently mentioned as attending, though not in large numbers: and in one case, that of the Council of Clovesho of A.D. 803, each bishop appears at the head of a body of diocesan clergy, many of whom are abbots¹. These are not necessarily to be regarded as the heads of strictly Benedictine houses, but as the rulers of churches which had lost much of the cenobitic character, and answer rather to the holders of large family preferment or other benefices, like the mass-thegns of the laws.

Members of these
councils:
bishops and abbots.

It was part of Theodore's plan that these assemblies should be held every August at Clovesho², a now forgotten place in the Mercian kingdom, probably near London. But the rule, although frequently observed as to place, does not seem to have prevailed as to time or frequency. Yet on the whole the councils are more numerous than could be expected in the unsettled state of the kingdoms. Most of them are held on the confines of the states, where the subjects of each king could at nightfall retire into their own country. Such places were Brentford and Chelsea, and most likely Clovesho also. As during this period there could be no witenagemots of the whole nation, any council at any of these places, or at which all or a majority of the bishops were present, must be regarded as either an ecclesiastical council pure and simple, or as a mixed gathering under the eye of some king who at the moment was supreme in church and state.

Places of assembly.

The subjects of discussion were various, but the strictly ecclesiastical councils contented themselves with ecclesiastical legislation. They passed canons in which any interference with secular law or custom is wisely avoided, and they never imitate the Theocratic system of the Spanish councils with which in some respects they have much in common. They seem also to have exercised a friendly jurisdiction in suits for property between different churches; herein acting rather as arbitrators than as judges, and probably expecting review or confirmation by the folkmoot or witenagemot. Their legislation shows no sign of needing any further confirmation, but from the frequency of discussion.

Subjects of

¹ Councils, &c. iii. 546, 547.

² Bede, H. E. iv. 5.

Harmony of lay and church councils. ecclesiastical regulations in the general codes of the kings and witan, it is certain that no jealousy as yet existed between the two systems; the bishops were members of both bodies, and did not hesitate to accept the confirmation of the national council to strengthen the pressure or increase the publicity of their own enactments.

Power of the bishops in the popular courts; in their own franchises; in penitential discipline; over the clergy; in questions of morals; and others.

The judicial power and coercive jurisdiction of the great spiritual officers are matters of further question. The bishops sat in the popular courts as they sat in the witenagemot, and in both with much the same power as the lay witan. They had also temporal jurisdiction within the limits of their own franchises, in which the legal process by compurgation and ordeal was in no wise distinguishable from that of the hundred moot. They had further, as a result of that penitential discipline which, partly perhaps through the oriental training of Theodore, and partly through the labours of the Irish missionaries, obtained an early and general acceptance in the Anglo-Saxon church, a powerful coercive machinery quite apart from the common law or customs of the nation at large, for the enforcement of which they must have been indebted to the pious assistance or neutrality of the laity. But between these two regions of judicature there lay a class of suits, concerning the disputes and offences of the clergy and the morals of the laity, with which it would seem the bishops were especially charged. Unfortunately our evidence on this head is very small. The Penitential of Theodore contains a provision that the bishop shall determine the causes of the poor up to fifty shillings, the king if the sum in question be greater. At the other end of the period, in Domesday book, we find among the Customs of Kent, that in cases of adultery, the king is to have the man, the archbishop the woman¹. There is no reason to suppose that in such cases any peculiar court was provided. They would be tried in the hundred-moot and shire-moot, and the bishop would claim his share in the penalties as well as declare the law and the sentence of the judges¹: just as the king's officers would in cases where royal rights and interests were concerned. And the offences of the clergy would be tried in the same way; the special rules for compurgation in their case being observed under the eye of the bishop, who stood to them in the relation of lord and patron². In contentious suits it is difficult to draw the line between judicial decision and arbitration; the bishop with his clerks would however be fully competent to arbitrate, and were probably frequently called upon to do so. None of these generalisations however cover the cases in which the spiritual offences of the clergy, disobedience, heresy, drunkenness, and the like, called for authoritative treatment: they would not come before the popular courts, for they were not breaches of secular law, and they were not crimes for which the penitential jurisdiction alone was sufficient. For such, then, it is probable that the bishops had domestic tribunals not differing in kind from the ecclesiastical courts of the later ages³ and of matured canon law: in which according to the common practice of the post-Nicene church, the archdeacon⁴ as the bishop's officer executed the sentence of his superior⁵; whilst for the enforcement of these

¹ The law of Wihtræd orders the excommunication of such offenders, § 3. The penalty of the adultery of the gesitheundman goes to his lord, 'according to ancient usage.' Ibid. § 5. Alfred directs the excommunication of the fugitive perjurer; Ll. Alfr. § 1, and Canute also joins outlawry and excommunication in his denunciation of evil doers.

Much of their jurisdiction exercised in the popular courts.

Possible existence of separate ecclesiastical courts.

¹ See LL. Henr. I, vii. § 3. This he would have to do in other causes in which no specially religious principle was involved, as, for example, in cases where the property of churches had been stolen, or their peace infringed. It is observable that the very first of our written laws, Ethelb. § 1, places the property of the churches under the special protection of the law.

² If a priest kill a man his property is confiscated, and the bishop is ordered to 'secularise' him, after which he is to be given up (to the relations of the slain?) unless his lord will compound for his wer. Alfred, § 21. This looks as if the clergy had some personal immunities which could not be infringed until they were formally degraded. The bishop is indeed the 'mæg and mundbora' of clergy and strangers. Edw. and Guthr. § 12.

³ The doom of the bishop is referred to in the case of a criminal priest, in the law of Wiltræd, § 6; Edw. and Guthr. § 4. If any one before a bishop belie his testimony, he pays a fine of 120s; Iui, § 13.

⁴ The first person who is called archdeacon is Wulfred, who became archbishop of Canterbury in A.D. 805, and who is so named in a charter of his predecessor. Bede knew only the deacon as the bishop's officer: throughout the period his office is simply ministerial.

⁵ The archdeacon is only once mentioned in the laws, 'If a priest disobey the order of the archdeacon he has to pay twelve ores;' Northumbrian Priest's law, § 6. The deans mentioned in the so-called laws of Edward the Confessor, § 27, are also officers of the bishop. The territorial deaneries, decisions the servants of the bishop were competent and sufficient. In such circumstances it is probable enough that the secular and ecclesiastical powers would act in concert: and even if the national force were not called in to the assistance of the clergy, it can scarcely be doubted that it offered no hindrance to the execution of the spiritual sentence. The outlaw of God and the outlaw of the king, the excommunicated man and the convicted criminal, are alike set without the protection of the peace.

Spiritual sentences enforced by the secular arm.

Peculiar relation of church and state.

The relation of the church to the state was thus close, although there was not the least confusion as to the organisation of functions, or uncertainty as to the limits of the powers of each¹. It was a state of things that could exist only in a race that was entirely homogeneous and becoming conscious of political unity. The history, however, of the church of the united or West-Saxon dominion, on which the fury of the Danes fell, and which rose from ruin in closer union than before with the national polity, has many features in marked contrast with the earlier and simpler life of the heptarchic churches.

The West-Saxon period.

88. The rapid growth of the power of Egbert was the result not merely of his own valour and policy but of the weakness of the enemies with whom he had to contend: the same exhaustion and incapacity for resistance which laid the nation open to the Danes. Mercia sustained in the early years of Kenulf² some of the glory that she had gained under Offa; but the end of his reign was inglorious, and a rapid and disputed succession of however, as well as the territorial archdeaconries, are later than the Conquest. The Anglo-Saxon deans mentioned in the Chronicle and in the lives of the saints are either monastic officers exercising discipline within the house, like the later deans of colleges, or possibly the executors of the spiritual authority of exempt monasteries, in the way in which the archdeacons executed the sentence of the bishops.

¹ Religion, morality, and law seem to be regarded throughout the period as much the same thing. The principle stated by Tacitus that among the ancient Germans, 'plus ibi boni mores valent quam alibi bonae leges,' is thus amplified by Alfred: 'Ex hoc uno iudicio perpendi potest, ut unicuique justum iudicetur; nec opus est aliquo libro iudiciali praeter hoc fatigari, quam ne quis alii iudicet quod sibi iudicari nollet si iudicium haberetur super eum.' The annu iudicium is of course 'Quod vobis non vultis fieri non faciatis aliis.' Alfr. Ll. Intr. § 49. 6.

² Kenulf reigned from A.D. 796 to 821 or 822; nearly twenty years contemporaneously with Egbert.

kings after his death deprived the kingdom of any hope of continued independence. Kent was now only nominally a kingdom, becoming a mere appendage to Mercia and Wessex in turn, with a spasmodic effort between times to revive the ancient status. The history of East Anglia is exactly parallel, sometimes under Mercia, sometimes broken up under several caldormen. Northumbria continues the tale of revolution and anarchy which marked her history in the preceding century. The royal power, and with it the tribal nationality, was in suspension or solution. One result of this was the supremacy of Wessex; another was prostration before the Danes; the third was the throwing of much power and secular work on the clergy, especially the bishops, who represented the most permanent element of society; and a fourth, the consequence of the others, the general decline of civilisation and learning. It was natural that in those kingdoms in which the church was strong, the extinction or other defeasance of the old royal houses should increase the importance of the bishops. The Kentish church under archbishop Wulfred had sustained a long and fatal dispute with Mercia, in which appeals to the pope and emperor were discussed as a possible solution. Not only had Canterbury succeeded in effecting the humiliation of the rival archiepiscopate¹, but on the death of Cuthred, the brother and dependent of Kenulf, Wulfred is found in open opposition to Kenulf; for seven years he contested with him and his heiress the possession of the royal monasteries in Thanet, and was at last victorious. Baldred, the king who attempted to assert the independence of Kent during the Mercian troubles², seems to have been in alliance with Wulfred, and we may conjecture that the sturdy prelate submitted with reluctance to the rule of Egbert although he also was of Kentish descent. Archbishop Ceolnoth however, who succeeded Wulfred,

Growth of West-Saxon
power.

Its effects on the church.

Increase of the secular importance
of the bishops.

¹ Kemble, C. D. cexx. Councils, &c. iii. 596. In a council at London Kenulf threatened to send Wulfred into exile 'et nunquam nec verbis domini papae nec Caesaris seu alterius alicujus gradu huc in patriam iterum recipisse.'

² Baldred was king from A.D. 823 to 825, when he was dethroned by Egbert. He had attempted to secure the good will of the archbishop by the gift of Malling to Christ Church (Kemble, C. D. cxcl.) at the very moment of his downfall.

Alliance of the West-Saxon kings
with the church of Canterbury.

was wise enough to throw himself into the arms of Egbert, even if he did not, as is possible, owe his promotion to him¹; and in A.D. 838 at Kingston a permanent alliance was concluded between the church of Canterbury and the house of Cerdic. Ceolnoth undertook to maintain 'firm and unshaken friendship from henceforth for ever,' and received in return a promise of perpetual peace and protection². A similar agreement was made at the same time with the church of Winchester: and both were repeatedly confirmed by Ethelwulf³.

Decline of religion in the North.

A similar state of things existed in the North of England. Eanbald the archbishop of York, after a long struggle with the king Eardulf, had seen him dethroned and a fugitive; he was restored by the intervention of the pope and emperor, but on the immediate result the veil of ninth-century darkness settles down. We know the consequences only from the Danish conquest of the North. One or two letters of the succeeding archbishops show that the light of learning was not quite extinct, although it was becoming obscured by the superstitious and impious fabrications which were made possible by its decline. Whilst continental scholars were still applying to England for manuscripts⁴, the English bishops were puzzled with strange forms of heresy at home. Nial the deacon was said to have risen from the dead after seven weeks; letters were spoken of⁵, written by the hand of God in letters of gold, and the whole court of Ethelwulf was perplexed with the vision of a priest, portending grievous calamities on account of the profanation of Sunday⁶.

Decline of
monachism.

The same period is traditionally fixed for the extinction of primitive monachism throughout the nation⁷. It is now for the first time that we find the bishops in arms; two West-Saxon

¹ Robertson, Hist. Essays, 196, 200, conjectures that Ceolnoth was a West Saxon in whose favour the Kentish Feologeld, who had been elected to succeed Wulfred, was set aside. See Councils, &c. iii. 609.

² Council of Kingston; Councils, iii. 617.

³ Ibid. p. 619.

⁴ See the letters of Lupus of Ferrières to Ethelwulf, and Wigmund archbishop of York; Councils, iii. 634, 635, 648, 649.

⁵ Letter of Eged Bishop of Lindisfarne to Wulfsige archbishop of York; Councils, iii. 615. Alcuin had had to protest against the wearing of relics by way of charms; Epp. ed. Dümmeler, pp. 719, 721.

⁶ Prudentius Trecens. ap. Pertz, i. 433. Councils, &c. iii. 621.

⁷ See the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, A.D. 870.

prelates fell in the battle of Charmouth in A.D. 835¹; and bishop Eallstan of Sherborne acted as Egbert's general in Kent in A.D. 825, and was one of the commanders who defeated the Danes on the Parret in A.D. 845². The same prelate thirteen years later took a leading part in the supplanting of Ethelwulf by his son Ethelbald³. Ethelwulf was a poor substitute for his father: his pilgrimage to Rome, contemplated in his first year⁴ and carried out nearly at the end of his reign, his magnificent gifts to the pope⁵, and his marriage with the daughter of Charles the Bald⁶, are, with the exception of his famous Donation, the best-known parts of his history. That celebrated act, the devotion of a tenth part of his private estate to ecclesiastical purposes, the relief of a tenth part of the folkland from all payments except the trinoda necessitas, and the direction that every ten hides of his land should provide for one poor man or stranger, testifies to his piety and liberality⁷. Possibly the further subdivision of the West-Saxon dioceses was begun under him: we find Ethelred the bishop of Wiltshire appointed to the see of Canterbury by his sons⁸. This is the age of Swithun also. But, notwithstanding occasional flashes of light, the darkness in church and state deepens. Alfred has to act as warriors.

The bishops

The Donation of Ethelwulf.

Increased darkness of the period.

¹ Chr. Sax. A.D. 833.

² Ibid. A.D. 823, 845.

³ Asser, V. Alfr. M. H. B. 470.

⁴ Prud. Tree., Pertz, i. 433. Councils, iii. 621.

⁵ Anastasius, Vit. Bened. III. ap. Mansi, xv. 109, 110. It was on this occasion, it is said, that he obtained from the pope a decree that English penitents should no more be forced to work in chains; T. Rudborne, in Ang. Sac. i. 202. See Lappenberg, ii. 26.

⁶ Ann. Bertin. Pertz, i. 450. Baluze, ii. 209-212.

⁷ Councils, iii. 636-648. Kemble, Saxons, ii. 481-490.

⁸ Chr. Sax. A.D. 870. There seems to be no reasonable doubt that this was finally carried out by Edward the Elder, who mentions in more than one charter that he had divided the old diocese of Winchester into two parts. Cod. Dipl. mxc. &c.; and we know from the lists of bishops drawn up in the tenth century, that a further division almost immediately followed by which the West-Saxon sees became five in number. Of the three new sees, one, that of Ramsbury, had no cathedral, and was moved about in Wiltshire and Berkshire, resting sometimes at Sunning, but finally joined to Sherborne just before the Conquest. It may have existed in the same way before the time of Alfred, and been a sort of suffragan see to Winchester. The idea of having a bishop to each shire of Wessex seems to have been in the mind of the creator of the new sees; Somersetshire had Wells, Dorsetshire, Sherborne, Sussex Selsey, Devonshire Crediton, Cornwall Bodmin or S. Germans, Hampshire Winchester; whilst Wilts and Berks joined at the bishop of Ramsbury. None of the other kingdoms had such a complete organisation of either bishops or ealdormen.

Darkness in the early days of Alfred.

record that when he came to the throne there were none south of the Thames who could understand their rituals in English, or translate a letter from the Latin; very few south of the Humber and not many beyond¹. The monasteries still stood with their libraries, but the books were unintelligible to their owners. Then the Danes had come and destroyed all.

Revival of learning and religion under Alfred, coinciding with the restoration of national vigour in the Danish wars.

It is perhaps not unreasonable to connect the revival of learning and ecclesiastical order under Alfred and his son with the bracing up of the national vigour that resulted from the Danish struggle, and so with the growth of royal power which was traced in the last chapter. At all events they coincide in time. It was Plegmund, the associate of Alfred in his labours in the service of English literature², who consecrated the seven bishops at Canterbury in Edward's reign, thus completing the diocesan arrangements of Wessex³. The final annexation of Cornwall is marked by the foundation of a new see under Athelstan⁴. The prelates, too, begin to be statesmen. Odo of Ramsbury goes as ambassador to France to secure the succession of Lewis the Fourth⁵: as archbishop of Canterbury he acts as prime minister to Edmund and Edred; a position which he leaves to Dunstan and a long series of successors. But whilst they acquire this new secular position, the bishops lose somewhat of their old security. Brihthelm, the immediate predecessor of Dunstan, is summarily set aside by Edgar for incapacity⁶. Notwithstanding the restoration of monastic order, canonical custom is set at naught for party or political purposes; one bishop holds two or even three sees: translations become more common, and the great prelates constantly find themselves in positions in which they have to choose between their duties as bishops, as ministers of the king, and as patriots. Archbishop Sigeric acts as chief magistrate temporally and spiritually in Kent⁷, and earns the discredit of

The bishops are found acting as statesmen.

¹ Preface to the translation of S. Gregory's Pastoral Care, ed. Sweet, p. 1.

² Ibid. p. 6.

³ W. Malmesb. G. R. ii. § 129. Reg. Sac. Angl. p. 13.

⁴ Between A.D. 924 and 931. See Pedler's Ancient Bishopric of Cornwall.

⁵ Hist. Richer, ii. c. 4; ed. Pertz, p. 53.

⁶ Memorials of S. Dunstan, p. 38.

⁷ Ethelred, ii. § 1. Robertson, Hist. Essays, p. 178.

having been the first to propose the Danegeld¹. Under the later kings the successor of Augustine appears far more as a secular than as a spiritual potentate; and the last of the native primates, Stigand, has an unhappy pre-eminence, as holding the richest see of England in plurality, as the partisan of a schismatic pope, and as the chief minister of a distinctly patriotic but not thoroughly spiritual party organisation.

But the Danish conquest of the north and middle of England had other effects than the rousing of the spirit of the people and kings. It cut off the Northumbrian church from the see of Canterbury almost as completely as it had been cut off before the days of Oswy. The archbishop of York became the head of a distinct nationality, preserving his seat,—with one exception, the seven years exile of Wulfhere²,—during the numerous vicissitudes of the Danish kingdom. Under Athelstan the northern primate appears at the English court³, but not quite as a subject. Wulfstan, after Athelstan's death, took sides with the Ostman Anlaf, and had to fly before Edmund⁴. In A.D. 947 at Tanshelf he brought the Northumbrian witan to plight their troth to Edred⁵, but the next year he revolted with his people, and in A.D. 952 was imprisoned⁶. Two years after, he made his peace with the king and was restored. His immediate successor Oskytel ruled peaceably under Edgar; but the importance of the position of the archbishop is shown by the fact that from the year A.D. 963 to the Conquest, the see of Worcester was generally either held by him in plurality, or bestowed on one of his near kinsmen, at once a reward of faithfulness and a pledge of obedience⁷. The wisdom of the arrangement is shown by the Stigand a representative of the secular prelate.

Effects of the Danish conquest on the Northumbrian church.

¹ Chron. Sax. A.D. 991.

² Sim. Dun. Hist. Arch. ed. Twysden, p. 79.

³ Rodward archbishop of York appears as witness to three charters of Athelstan, which are questionable, Cod. Dipl. cccxvi, cccxlix, mcl; and to one which is less suspicious, dated in A.D. 929, Ibid. cccxlviii.

⁴ Chron. Sax. A.D. 943.

⁵ Ibid. A.D. 947.

⁶ Ibid. A.D. 952.

⁷ S. Oswald and his two immediate successors held Worcester and York together from A.D. 963 to A.D. 1016, when Leofsi seems to have been appointed, probably in consequence of political events. On his death Brihtege, nephew of archbishop Wulfstan, held Worcester until A.D. 1038. It was then disputed between archbishop Elfric and the bishop of Crediton. Ealdred, who ultimately obtained it, was obliged to resign on his promotion to York in A.D. 1061; and S. Wulfstan followed, A.D. 1062-1096. Bishop of the North.

Settlement

adhesion of Northumbria generally to the English king. Whilst the mother church of York underwent these changes, the northern suffragan sees of Hexham and Whithern became extinct; and the church of Lindisfarne only survived in exile and pilgrimage with S. Cuthbert's bones, not settling finally at Durham until A.D. 995.

Extinction and abeyance of Mercian
and East-Anglian
sees.

The ecclesiastical machinery of Mercia and East Anglia suffered scarcely less. The see of Dunwich perished altogether: and in that of Elmham the succession of the bishops is uncertain for nearly a century after the martyrdom of S. Edmund¹. The bishop of Leicester fled southwards, and placed his chair at Dorchester in Oxfordshire, close to the West-Saxon border. The succession in Lindsey vanishes²; and the see of Lichfield itself only occasionally emerges, although there is reason to suppose that there was no long vacancy. Even in London the episcopate seems to have had a narrow escape from extinction. As much as was possible of the old system was restored under Edgar, but the modifications in the arrangement of the dioceses were permanent. We do not know enough of the local history of the period to ascertain how far the Mercian church underwent the same secularising process as the West-Saxon and Northumbrian.

The glories of the tenth century in church and state.

89. The process of restoration begun by Alfred was carried out by the great kings who succeeded him on the lines which he had drawn. The vernacular literature which he had founded flourished continuously: the tenth century not only is the great age of the chroniclers, but abounds in legal and disciplinary enactments in the native tongue. Every attempt to secure the consolidation of the national and royal power in the state is

Sampson, his successor, was brother to archbishop Thomas I of York, and father to Thomas II. The disputes about the property of the two sees were continued until the reign of Henry II. The later archbishops possessed the church of S. Oswald at Gloucester, which was given them by William Rufus.

¹ The year 870 is the epoch at which the Mercian churches seem to collapse; they emerge in the time of Edward the Elder, but the succession of bishops is very uncertain until the middle of the century. Reg. Sac. Angl. pp. 12-14.

² It re-appears in A.D. 953, but is joined with Dorchester about fifty years later.

accompanied by a similar effort for the re-establishment of the church in strength and purity. The memory of Dunstan has suffered rather than gained by the praises of his monastic admirers, but it cannot be doubted that his monastic reforms were one of the least of the measures that he had at heart, and that the exaggerated views entertained of them in the middle ages threw his greater deeds into the shade¹. He was the prime minister, perhaps the inspirer, of the consolidating policy of Edgar; he restored, through the monastic and educational revival, the intercourse between the English Church and those of France and Flanders², and established a more intimate communication with the Apostolic See; in so doing he did what could be done to restore piety and learning. Under his influence the Mercian bishoprics again lift up their heads: the archbishops henceforth go to Rome for their palls: the Frank writers begin to record the lives of English saints³. But the contrast between this restored life and communion and the state of things that had existed earlier is strongly marked. Instead of England setting the example to France she borrows from her neighbour. John the Old Saxon and Grimbold had come from the northern provinces of the empire; the new monachism comes from Fleury⁴. The English scribes copy the disciplinary works of Theodulf and Halitgar⁵, just as a century and a half before the Franks had copied the penitentials of Theodore and Egbert. The royal marriages⁶ promote intercourse with the German churches also. Bishop Kinewold of Worcester in A.D. 928 visited all the monasteries of Germany with offerings from Athelstan, and

Influence of Dunstan.

Renewal of foreign intercourse.

England
borrows from the continent.

¹ See Robertson's Essay on Dunstan, Hist. Essays, pp. 189-262; Hook's life of him in volume i. of the Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury; and the preface to the Memorials of S. Dunstan in the Rolls Series.

² He spent his exile in the monastery of Blandinium at Ghent. Flor. Wig. A.D. 956.

³ E.g. Abbo of Fleury wrote the life of S. Edmund. Adelard of Blandinium wrote a eulogy on Dunstan himself.

⁴ S. Oswald brought the restored rule of S. Benedict from Fleury to Ramsey. Hist. Rams. (Gale), p. 391.

⁵ One of the penitentials ascribed to Egbert (Wilkins, Conc. i. 113-143. Thorpe, Anglo-Saxon Laws, pp. 343-392) is a translation of Halitgar of Cambrai. The laws of Theodulf of Orleans are also translated; in Wilkins, i. 265 sq.

⁶ See above, p. 204.

and concluded a league for mutual intercession with the monks of S. Gall¹.

Decline of conciliar activity.

Some marks of this intercourse are left on the constitutional history of the church. Although the pontifical claims of Odo and Dunstan play so great a part in the popular histories, their secular position somewhat derogated from their ecclesiastical one. Whether purely conciliar action ceased, or whether it be that the assimilation of the national witenagemots to the older ecclesiastical councils renders it difficult to distinguish between lay and spiritual assemblies, the result is the same. There are few if any distinctly ecclesiastical councils of the tenth century in England; and every royal code contains large ecclesiastical regulations. The abundant bodies of canons which exist are clad either in the form of constitutions, such as those of Odo and Edgar², or in the form of private compilations such as that of Elfric³. It would almost seem as if the union between church and state had become so intimate as to supersede one of the most important functions of the former; for the break in the list of councils cannot be attributed to the loss of records; abundance of charters in both Latin and English attest the activity of the church and of the monasteries, and abundant penitential literature shows that the want of canonical legislation was felt. It is perhaps most probable that business of both sorts was transacted in the same assemblies, as was done in the councils of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when the difficulties of collecting the clerical witan more than once or twice a year were still considerable. The fact that the persons who composed the two were the same, or nearly so, contributes to the uncertainty, and possibly occasioned the confusion of which this obscurity is the result.

Compilations of canons.

The eleventh century.

90. The ecclesiastical history of the eleventh century is of an equally varied character. On the one hand there is a great development of English literature. Elfric nobly carries out what

¹ Goldastus, Rer. Alamann. Scr. ii. 152, 153; Memorials of S. Dunstan, p. lxxv.

² See Wilkins, Concilia, i. pp. 212, 225.

³ Ibid. p. 250. Johnson's Canons, i. 388-407. Thorpe, Ancient Laws, pp. 441 seq.

Alfred had begun. More than ever the chroniclers and sermon writers put forth their strength. The society which is unable to withstand the arms of Canute almost immediately humanises and elevates him. The court of Edward the Confessor, although too much divided and leavened with unpatriotic counsels, is an advance in cultivation on that of his father; and England, although she has very much to lose by this foreign admixture, has much also to gain. The school which Harold founded at Waltham¹, the whole revival of the canonical life as a more honest and more practicable system than the monastic, was one result of the increased intercourse with the empire and especially with Lorraine. The introduction of foreign ecclesiastics into English bishoprics was another². For this latter proceeding the church was not ready: English isolation has always resisted it, and the fact of the unpopularity of the new comers, the absolute necessity that fell on them of throwing themselves for support on other agencies than the result of their work and the love of the people, must have counteracted any possible benefit that could have been derived from freer intercourse with the churches of the continent. Amongst the prelates of this era there are very few except S. Wulfstan who are spoken of with honour. Archbishop Ealdred of York, the traveller, pilgrim and ambassador, stands high on the list of Anglo-Saxon statesmen, but it is not until after the Conquest that he shows much of the spirit of the patriot. The practice of holding bishoprics in plurality, which reaches its climax in him³, may perhaps be excused on the same grounds as the nomination of the foreign prelates—the default of native candidates.

Intercourse
with the colleges of Lorraine.

Foreign ecclesiastics
in English sees.

Wulfstan and Ealdred.

In the extreme difficulty of discriminating between the ecclesiastical and civil relations of men and things, to enter now into the special development of church institutions in the tenth and eleventh century would be to traverse again the ground already

Analogy of church and state.

¹ See the Tractatus de S. Cruce, pref. pp. v–xii. Freeman, Norm. Conq. ii. 440 sq. Epistolæ Cantuarienses, pref.

² Freeman (Norm. Conq. ii. 80, 81) regards the Lotharingian prelates as German in speech, and therefore possibly welcome to Godwin and his party.

³ He held, or at least administered, at one time Worcester, Hereford and Sherborne: it is fair to say that he was a good bishop when such were very scarce, and that he kept foreigners out.

Assimilation
of lay and spiritual systems.

Archdeacons.

Suffragan
bishops.

Need of restoration in church and state.

Importance of church history in constitutional
history.

gone over. The devolution of judicial powers on the lords of bookland, the king's thegns, and others having grants of sac and soc, affected the territorial power of the bishops and monasteries in just the same way: it is in fact from the charters of immunity to the churches that we are able to draw the scanty conclusions which can be drawn as to the status of the lay lords. The obligation of 'borh,' by which every man was obliged to have a security for his keeping the peace, was enforced on ecclesiastics also. An unpublished list of the 'festormen' of archbishop Elfric exists on a fly-leaf of the York Gospel Book; every priest had to find himself twelve such bondsmen¹; Elfric has sixty or more. The office of archdeacon, which appears first at the end of the eighth century, has now risen into a place of jurisdiction, although the creation of territorial archdeaconries has not yet been required. The bishops, instead of resigning when age and infirmity incapacitate them, employ deputies to perform their spiritual functions, as the prince-bishops did in the later middle ages. The distinctive character of the Anglo-Saxon church, like that of the state, is being changed to the general pattern of the continental churches. The same cries of simony and immorality against the clergy which are heard in France and Germany are prevalent here, and the means taken to silence them are as weak in England as abroad. The revival of life and energy under Dunstan and Elfric has worn itself out before the days of the Confessor. The exhaustion of the church coincided with that of the state, of which Edward is a fair type, and which the zeal of Siward, of Godwin, and even of Harold could not counteract. The time was come for Lanfranc and Anselm as well as for William of Normandy and Henry of Anjou.

It is scarcely necessary to point out the special importance of this portion of history in its bearing on our constitutional growth. The Church of England is not only the agency by which Christianity is brought to a heathen people, a herald of spiritual blessings and glorious hopes in another life; it is not merely the tamer of cruel natures, the civiliser of the rude, the cultivator of the waste places, the educator, the guide and the protector, whose guardianship is the only safeguard of the woman, the child, and the slave against the tyranny of their lord and master. The church is this in many other countries besides Britain ; but here it is much more. The unity of the church in England was the pattern of the unity of the state : the cohesion of the church was for ages the substitute for the cohesion which the divided nation was unable otherwise to realise. Strong in its own conformation, it was more than a match for the despotic rule of such kings as Offa, and was the guardian of liberties as well as the defence of the oppressed. It was to an extraordinary degree a national church : national in its comprehensiveness as well as in its exclusiveness. Englishmen were in their lay aspect Mercians or West Saxons ; only in their ecclesiastical relations could they feel themselves fellow-countrymen and fellow-subjects. And for a great part of the period under our view, the interference of foreign churches was scarcely if at all felt. There was no Roman legation from the days of Theodore to those of Offa, and there are only scanty vestiges of such interference for the next three centuries : Dunstan boldly refused to obey a papal sentence¹. Until the eve of the Conquest, therefore, the development of the system was free and spontaneous, although its sphere was a small one. The use of the native tongue in prayers and sermons is continuous ; the observance of native festivals also, and the reverence paid to native saints. If the stimulating force of foreign intercourse was wanting, the intensity with which the church threw itself into the interest of the nation more than made up what was lacking. The ecclesiastical and the national spirit thus growing into one another supplied something at least of that strong passive power which the Norman despotism was unable to break. The churches were schools and nurseries of patriots ; depositories of old traditional glories and the refuge of the persecuted. The English clergy supplied the basis of the strength of Anselm when the Norman bishops sided with the king. They trained the English people for the time when the kings should court their support and purchase their adherence by the re-

¹ Laws of the Northumbrian Priests, § 2.

Bearing of the English church history in the life of the nation.

¹ See Adelard's Life of Dunstan, in Memorials of S. Dunstan, p. 67.

storation of liberties that would otherwise have been forgotten. The unity of the church was in the early period the only working unity ; and its liberty, in the evil days that followed, the only form in which the traditions of the ancient freedom lingered. It was again to be the tie between the conquered and the conquerors ; to give to the oppressed a hold on the conscience of the despot ; to win new liberties and revive the old ; to unite Norman and Englishman in the resistance to tyrants, and educate the growing nation for its distant destiny as the teacher and herald of freedom to all the world.

CHAPTER IX.

THE NORMAN CONQUEST.

91. Complex results of the Conquest.—92. State of Normandy.—93. Growth of Feudalism.—94. Feudal ideas of the Conquest.—95. National policy of William.—96. Introduction of Feudal usages.—97. Maintenance of old forms.—98. Results of changes of administrators.—99. Subordinate changes in judicature.—100. In taxation.—101. In ecclesiastical affairs.—102. Transitional character of the period.

91. THE effect of the Norman Conquest on the character and constitution of the English was threefold. The Norman rule invigorated the whole national system ; it stimulated the growth of freedom and the sense of unity, and it supplied, partly from its own stock of jurisprudence, and partly under the pressure of the circumstances in which the conquerors found themselves, a formative power which helped to develop and concentrate the wasted energies of the native race. In the first place it brought the nation at once and permanently within the circle of European interests, and the Crusades, which followed within a few years, and which were recruited largely from the Normans and the English, prevented a relapse into isolation. The adventurous and highly-strung energy of the ruling race communicated itself to the people whom it ruled ; its restless activity and strong political instinct roused the dormant spirit and disciplined even while it oppressed it. For, in the second place, the powers which it called forth were largely exercised in counter-acting its own influence. The Normans so far as they became English added nerve and force to the system with which they identified themselves ; so far as they continued Norman they provoked and stimulated by opposition and oppression the latent Complex results of the Conquest.

Its invigorating effect.

It calls forth strength in opposition.

Formative effect of the Conquest.

energies of the English. The Norman kings fostered, and the Norman nobility forced out the new growth of life. In the third place, however, the importation of new systems of administration, and the development of new expedients, in every department of government, by men who had a genius not only for jurisprudence but for every branch of organisation, furnished a disciplinary and formative machinery in which the new and revived powers might be trained:—a system which through oppression prepared the way for order, and by routine educated men for the dominion of law: law and order which when completed should attest by the pertinacious retention and development of primitive institutions, that the discipline which had called them forth and trained men for them, was a discipline only, not the imposition of a new and adventitious polity. For the Norman polity had very little substantial organisation of its own; and what it brought with it to England was soon worn out or merged in that of the nation with which it united. Only the vigour and vitality which it had called forth was permanent.

The Normans in Normandy.

92. Of the constitutional history of the Normans of Normandy we have very little information¹. A century and a half before the Conquest of England, Rollo had received the province from Charles the Simple: he and his people in becoming Christian had become to a certain extent Frank also. They retained much of the Scandinavian character, but of the Norse customs only those which fell into easy agreement with Frank law; and their native language they entirely forgot. Of Frank law in its early Norman form we have equally scanty evidence. What little is known is learned from later jurisprudence, and that by inference rather than historic evidence. Even the existence of the ordinary language of feudalism in Normandy¹ before the Conquest of England has been questioned, unreasonably indeed, but not without such probability as arises from lack of documentary materials of proof. The little that is clearly known seems to be that the Norman duke or count ruled his people as a personal sovereign, and with the advice of a council of great men²; that under him were a number of barons, who owed their position to the possession of land for which they were under feudal obligations to him, which they took every opportunity of discarding; who had the status of nobility derived from ancient Norse descent or from connexion with the ducal family, although that nobility neither possessed purity of blood, nor was accompanied by any feeling of honour or loyalty; and who therefore were kept faithful partly by a sense of interest and partly by the strong hand of their master³. The population of cultivators lived

¹ See Palgrave, Normandy and England, i. 113. Palgrave enumerates three traditions or legal legends of Rollo: (1) The custom of the clameur de haro, by which whoever sustained or feared to sustain any damage of goods or chattels, life or limb, was entitled to raise the country by the cry Haro. (2) The legend of the Roumare, according to which he tried the obedience of his people by hanging his bracelets on a tree, where they remained unguarded for three years and unmolested. (3) The legend of Long-paon, according to which he hanged a husband and wife who had conspired to cheat him. The first two stories are common to England and other countries; the last is in conformity with Scandinavian jurisprudence. Ibid. i. 696-699.

Obscurity
of their constitutional history.

The nobles.

¹ Sismondi's idea that Rollo introduced full-grown feudality into Normandy (Palgrave, Normandy and England, i. 693) is of course quite untenable. Palgrave remarks that 'it remains to be proved whether any system of Norman tenure had been matured into consistency by fiscal talent until after the seventh duke of Normandy won the Anglo-Saxon crown.' Ibid. i. 694. He regards however Richard Sanspeur, the third duke, as the founder of Norman feudalism. Ibid. ii. 534. Waitz agrees with Palgrave as to the comparatively late growth of it; Göttingische Gelehrte Anzeigen, Nachrichten, Feb. 14, 1866; pp. 95, 96.

² Freeman, Norm. Conq. iii. 289 sq. Palgrave, Normandy, and England, ii. 257, regards William Longsword the son of Rollo as absolute. 'His was the law, his was the state, his was the church.' 'No baronage surrounded his curule chair, no clerk sat at his feet. He spake the law, he gave the law, he made the law, he executed the law.' Ibid. p. 258. 'At no period after the first development of the duchy until it has been united to the crown of France, can we discern any courts or conventions of prelates and nobles equivalent to the Great Councils, States General, or Parliaments of subsequent times.' Ibid. p. 259.

³ Palgrave, Normandy and England, iii. 28, 29. The Norman counts were at the time of the Conquest, in most cases, younger branches of the ducal house or closely connected with it by affinity. The counts of Brionne, Evreux, and Eu were descended from sons of Richard I; Count Odo of Aumâle was the Conqueror's brother-in-law; Count Robert of Mortain his half-brother. The three great patriarchs of the other Norman houses were Yvo of Belesme, ancestor of the Montgomery counts of Ponthieu and Alençon, and earls of Shrewsbury; Bernard the Dane, and Osmund de Centville. Ibid. ii. 535, 536; iii. 148. The Beaumonts, whose county of Meulan, or Mellent, was in the French Vexin, and who were the ancestors of the earls of Warwick and Leicester, were descended from a sister of Gunnoris, the wife of Duke Richard I; and the houses of Montgomery, under this aristocracy, Gallic in extraction, Frank in law and custom, and speaking the language which had been created by their early history. These people were in strict dependence on their Norman lords, although they now and then showed some remembrance of the comparative freedom they had enjoyed under the Frank empire, and retained the local organisation which neither Franks nor Normans were numerous enough to displace¹; and commercial prosperity and a strong communal feeling subsisted in the great towns. Nothing but the personal character of the dukes had prevented the territory thus lightly held from Ducal policy.

The cultivators.

The towns.

dismemberment. The strong hand had gathered all the great fiefs into the hands of kinsmen whose fidelity was secured by the right of the duke to garrison their castles, and whose tyrannies were limited by the right of the duke to enforce his own peace. Their attempts at independence were checked by ruthless bloodshed. The duke himself was by commendation a vassal of the king, not so much as king, for the gift to Rollo had left him free, but as duke of the French: Richard of Normandy had commended himself to Hugh the Great, whose descendants had since become kings². But the hold of the royal hand on Normandy was scarcely perceptible; and its constitutional connexion is with the polity of the Karolingian rather than with that of the third race of kings. What little legal system subsisted was derived from the Frank institutions as they were when Normandy was separated from the body of the Frank dominion.

Relation of the duke to the king of France.

93. Feudalism, the comprehensive idea which includes the whole governmental policy of the French kingdom, was of Wareme and Giffard, from other sisters of the same famous lady; the house of Breteuil from her brother Herfast. See the pedigrees at the end of Du Chesne's Scriptores Hist. Normannorum.

¹ Palgrave, Normandy and England, iii. 41, 42: 'When we reach the era of written evidence all absolute servitude has become obsolete. The very charter which designates the Terre-tenant as a servus guarantees his personal freedom.' Ibid. p. 44.

² On the status of the Norman dukes, and the changes of the relation in which they stood to the Karolings, the German kings of the Saxon line, the dukes of the Franks and the kings, see Palgrave, Normandy and England, ii. 125, 227-234, 347, 533; Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 167, 220, 221, 609; Waitz, Nachrichten (as above), pp. 69-96.

distinctly Frank growth¹. The principle which underlies it may be universal; but the historic development of it with which the constitutional history of Europe is concerned may be traced step by step under Frank influence, from its first appearance on the conquered soil of Roman Gaul to its full development in the jurisprudence of the Middle Ages². In the form which it

Frank
growth of
feudalism.

¹ The word feodum, fief or fee, is derived from the German word for cattle (Gothic faihu; Old High German fihu; Old Saxon fchu; Anglo-Saxon feoh); the secondary meaning being goods, especially money: hence property in general. The letter d is perhaps a mere insertion for sound's sake; but it has been interpreted as a part of a second root, od, also meaning property, in which case the first syllable has a third meaning, that of fee or reward, and the whole word means property given by way of reward for service. But this is improbable; and the connexion of the word with the Greek ἐμφύτευσις, which is suggested by the similarity of feudal and emphyteutic tenure of land, will not stand the test of criticism. The legal emphyteusis is 'a perpetual right in a piece of land that is the property of another.' This word occurs first in the Digest of Justinian, and the emphyteutic possessor seems generally to be a mere lessee: it appears in the Lombard Capitulary of A.D. 819. The word feodum is not found earlier than the close of the ninth century. But neither the etymology of the latter word nor the development of its several meanings can be regarded as certain. See Smith's Dictionary of Antiquities, s. v. Emphyteusis; Robertson, Scotland. ii. 454; Du Cange, &c.

² As feudalism in both tenure and government was, so far as it existed in England, brought full-grown from France, it is not necessary here to trace in detail its growth in its native country. But it is important to note the change in the opinion of scholars on the subject, which has resulted from the recent investigations of German writers. The view accepted in the last century on the authority of Montesquieu, and generally maintained by the French writers, is that the conquests of the Franks were made by independent nobles, who had a powerful comitatus, and that the lands so acquired were divided amongst the comites, each of whom was bound by a special oath of fidelity to his lord, and held his land by the obligation of military service. Eichhorn, accepting this theory, distinguished the divisions of territory made before Clovis, on the principle of free allotment, from those made by that king and his successors, on a feudal principle: the recipients of the latter grants were supposed to be the leudes, and amongst the leudes a narrower class of comites bore the name of antrustions. The Merovingian kingdom was, on this hypothesis, a state built up on vassalage; the bond of unity being the connexion of classes in subordination to one another, not the common and immediate subjection to a sovereign government. This theory has been entirely refuted by Waitz, whose authority has been, in this work, regarded as conclusive as to the ancient German system. It was no irregular unorganised fabric, but a complete governmental system. Its conquests were the work of the nations moving in entire order; the comitatus was not the bond of cohesion; the leudes were not comites: all the people were bound to be faithful to the king; the gift of an estate by the king involved no defined obligation of service; all the nation was alike bound to military service; the only comites were the antrustions, and these were few in number; the basis of the Mero-

Condition
of feudalism at the time
of the Norman
Conquest.

has reached at the Norman Conquest, it may be described as a complete organisation of society through the medium of land tenure, in which from the king down to the lowest landowner all are bound together by obligation of service and defence: the lord to protect his vassal, the vassal to do service to his lord; the defence and service being based on and regulated by the nature and extent of the land held by the one of the other. In those states which have reached the territorial stage of development, the rights of defence and service are supplemented by the right of jurisdiction. The lord judges as well as defends his vassal; the vassal does suit as well as service to his lord. In states in which feudal government has reached its utmost growth, the political, financial, judicial, every branch of public administration is regulated by the same conditions. The central authority is a mere shadow of a name.

Elements of
feudalism.

This institution had grown up from two great sources—the beneficium, and the practice of commendation,—and had been specially fostered on Gallic soil by the existence of a subject population which admitted of any amount of extension in the methods of dependence. The beneficiary system¹ originated partly in gifts of land made by the kings out of their own estates to their kinsmen and servants, with a special undervingian polity was not the relation of lord and vassal, but that of the subject to the sovereign. The arguments of Roth (Geschichte des Beneficialwesens, und Fendalität und Unterthanverband) so far coincide with those of Waitz; and the work of Sohn (Altdeutsche Reichs- und Gerichtsverfassung) completes the overthrow of the old theory by reconstructing in a very remarkable manner the old German system in Salian and Merovingian times. It remains now to account for the growth of the feudal system. This is done by Waitz on the theory of a conjunction and interpenetration of the beneficial system and the vassal relation, both being fostered by the growth of immunities; and this is the view adopted in the text. Roth, however, goes further, connecting the antrustionship with the vassal relation, and making the former a link between the primitive comitatus and later feudalism. The infeudation of benefices and transfer of magisterial jurisdictions to the landowners (the seigniorial system), he traces not to any general movement in society, but to the violent innovation of the early Karoling period, which itself resulted from the great secularisations of the eighth century. Waitz's theory is maintained as against Roth, in the points in which the two writers differ, in the last edition of his invaluable work. See also Richter, Annalen der Deutschen Geschichte, pp. 108-111.

The beneficium.

¹ Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 226-258.

taking to be faithful¹; partly in the surrender by landowners of their estates to churches or powerful men, to be received back again and held by them as tenants for rent or service. By the latter arrangement the weaker man obtained the protection of the stronger, and he who felt himself insecure placed his title under the defence of the church. By the practice of commendation², on the other hand, the inferior put himself under the personal care of a lord, but without altering his title or divesting himself of his right to his estate; he became a vassal³ and did homage. The placing of his hands between those of his lord was the typical act by which the connexion was formed. And the oath of fealty was taken at the same time. The union of the beneficiary tie with that of commendation completed the idea of feudal obligation; the two-fold hold on the land, that of the lord and that of the vassal, was supplemented by the two-fold engagement, that of the lord to defend, and that of the vassal to be faithful. A third ingredient was supplied by the grants of immunity by which in the Frank empire, as in England, the possession of land was united with the right of judicature: the dwellers on a fental property were placed under the tribunal of the lord, and the rights which had belonged to the nation or to its chosen head were devolved upon the receiver of a fief⁴. The rapid spread of the system thus originated, and the assimilation of all other tenures to it, may be regarded as the work of

Commendation.

Twofold nature of vassalage.

Grants of immunity.

¹ Not a promise of definite service but a pledge to continue faithful in the conduct in consideration of which the reward is given. Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 251. Such a condition of course preserved to the giver a hold on or interest in the land, through which he was able to enforce fidelity. See also Roth, Beneficialwesen, p. 385; who points out that even when the possessors of great benefices commended themselves to the kings, they did not in the days of Charles the Bald fall into the class of vassals; 'episcopi, abbates, comites et vassalli dominici . . . beneficia habentes Carolo se commendaverunt, et fidelitatem sacramento firmaverunt.' Ann. Bertin, A.D. 837. But this was a period of transition, and if they did not become vassals in name, they entered into a relation which differed very little from later vassalage.

² Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 258-262.

³ Vassus in the Merovingian period was used, according to Roth, invariably for an unfree person; in the Karolingian period for a freeman commended, or, as he states it, placed in the relation of comitatus, to a lord; Beneficialwesen, p. 367. Waitz, as has been repeatedly mentioned, rejects the idea of connecting the comitatus with commendation.

⁴ Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 634-645; iv. 243-273.

Benefices
hereditary.

the tenth century; but as early as A.D. 877 Charles the Bald recognised the hereditary character of all benefices¹; and from that year the growth of strictly feudal jurisprudence may be held to date.

National
origin of feudalism.

The system testifies to the country and causes of its birth. The beneficium is partly of Roman, partly of German origin: in the Roman system the usufruct, the occupation of land belonging to another person, involved no diminution of status²; in the Germanic system he who tilled land that was not his own was imperfectly free: the reduction of a large Roman population to dependence placed the two classes on a level, and conduced to the wide extension of the institution. Commendation on the other hand may have had a Gallic or Celtic origin³, and an analogy only with the Roman clientship. The German comitatus, which seems to have ultimately merged its existence in one or other of these developments, is of course to be carefully distinguished in its origin from them. The tie of the benefice or of commendation could be formed between any two persons whatever; none but the king could have antrustions. But the comitatus of Anglo-Saxon history preserved, as we have seen, a more distinct existence⁴, and this perhaps was one of the causes that distinguished the later Anglo-Saxon system most definitely from the feudalism of the Frank empire.

Importance of the Anglo-Saxon form of comitatus.

The process by which the machinery of government became feudalised, although rapid, was gradual. The weakness of the Karoling kings⁵ and emperors gave room for the speedy develop-

¹ The practice had been growing up for a long period, and the clause of the Capitulary of Kiersi is rather a recognition of a presumptive right than an authoritative enunciation of a principle. See on it Roth, Beneficialwesen, p. 420; Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 693. The hereditary usage was not yet universal, nor did this recognition make it so; the emperor simply makes provision as to what is to be done by his son during his absence, in case of the death of a count or other holder of a benefice. It is, however, a clear proof of the generality of the usage. See Baluze, ii. 179.

² See Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 225, 234.

³ Ibid. iv. 199. The arguments in favour of this theory rest on Breton usages.

⁴ See above, p. 153.

⁵ The tendency had begun to work during the Merovingian period. It was a regulation of Clothair II, that the count must be a native of the province over which he was placed. Edict. Cloth. II, c. 12; Baluze, i. 16; Waitz,

ment of disruptive tendencies in a territory so extensive and so little consolidated. The duchies and counties of the eighth and ninth centuries were still official magistracies, the holders of which discharged the functions of imperial judges or generals. Such officers were of course men whom the kings could trust, in most cases Franks, courtiers or kinsmen, who at an earlier date would have been comites or antrustions, and who were provided for by feudal benefices. The official magistracy had in itself the tendency to become hereditary, and when the benefice was recognised as heritable, the provincial governorship became so too. But the provincial governor had many opportunities of improving his position, especially if he could throw himself into the manners and aspirations of the people he ruled. By marriage or inheritance he might accumulate in his family not only the old alodial estates which, especially on German soil, still continued to subsist, but the traditions and local loyalties which were connected with the possession of them¹. So in a few years the Frank magistrate could unite in his own person the beneficiary endowment, the imperial deputation, and the headship of the nation over which he presided. And then it was only necessary for the central power to be a little weakened, and the independence of duke or count was limited by his homage and fealty alone, that is by obligations that depended on conscience only for their fulfilment. It is in Germany that the disruptive tendency most distinctly takes the political form; Saxony and Bavaria assert their national independence under

Introduction of feudalism into the machinery of government.

Growth of feudal magistracies into provincial principalities.

D. V. G. ii. 377. The intention was that he should have a substantial stake in the well-being of the province, such that compensation could be exacted from him in case of misgovernment.

¹ Abundant proof of this position will be found in German history. The rise of the successive families of Saxon dukes, and the whole history of Bavaria under the Saxon emperors, furnish illustrations. The Saxon dukes of Bavaria carry out the Bavarian policy in opposition to their near kinsmen on the imperial throne. The growth of the Swabian Welfs into perfect identification with the Saxons whom they governed affords another striking instance. In a less degree, but still to some extent, this was the case in France also; but the Gallic populations had lost before the Karoling period most of their national aspirations; nor did the Frank governors identify themselves at any time with the people. Hence the great difference in social results between French and German feudalism.

Disruptive resolutions.

Swabian and Saxon dukes who have identified the interests of their subjects with their own. In France, where the ancient tribal divisions had been long obsolete, and where the existence of the alod involved little or no feeling of loyalty, the process was simpler still ; the provincial rulers aimed at practical rather than political sovereignty ; the people were too weak to have any aspirations at all : the disruption was due more to the abeyance of central attraction than to any centrifugal force existing in the provinces. But the result was the same ; feudal government, a graduated system of jurisdiction based on land tenure, in which every lord judged, taxed, and commanded the class next below him, in which abject slavery formed the lowest, and irresponsible tyranny the highest grade, in which private war, private coinage, private prisons, took the place of the imperial institutions of government.

Opposition
between the interest of the Conqueror and that of his barons.

94. This was the social system which William the Conqueror and his barons had been accustomed to see at work in France. One part of it, the feudal tenure of land, was perhaps the only description of tenure which they could understand ; the king was the original lord, and every title issued mediately or immediately from him. The other part, the governmental system of feudalism, was the point on which sooner or later the duke and his barons were sure to differ ; already the incompatibility of the system with the existence of the strong central power had been exemplified in Normandy ; the strength of the dukes had been tasked to maintain their hold on the castles and to enforce their own high justice : much more difficult would England be to retain in Norman hands if the new king allowed himself to be fettered by the French system. On the other hand the Norman barons would fain rise a step in the social scale answering to that by which their duke had become a king ; and they aspired to the same independence which they had seen enjoyed by the counts of Southern and Eastern France. Nor was the aspiration on their part altogether unreasonable ; they had joined in the Conquest rather as sharers in the great adventure than as mere vassals of the duke whose birth they despised as much as they feared his strength¹. William, however, was wise and wary as well as strong. Hence whilst by the insensible process of custom, or rather by the mere assumption that feudal tenure of land was the only lawful and reasonable one, the Frankish system of tenure was substituted for the Anglo-Saxon, the organisation of government on the same basis was not equally a matter of course. The Conqueror himself was too strong to suffer that organisation to become formidable in his reign, but neither the brutal force of William Rufus, nor the heavy and equal pressure of the government of Henry I, could extinguish the tendency towards it. It was only after it had under Stephen broken out into anarchy and plunged the whole nation in long misery, when the great houses founded by the barons of the Conquest had suffered forfeiture or extinction, when the Normans had become Englishmen under the legal and constitutional reforms of Henry II, that the royal authority in close alliance with the nation was enabled to put an end to the evil.

Feudal tenure of land received without feudal principles of government.

95. William the Conqueror claimed the crown of England as the chosen heir of Edward the Confessor². It was a claim which

¹ On the descent of the great barons of Normandy see above, p. 249, note 3. Ordericus Vitalis names the chiefs who joined in the deliberation of Lillebonne preparatory to the expedition to England; the Counts Richard of Evreux, Robert of Eu, Robert of Mortain, Ralph de Conches, son of the standard-bearer of Normandy, William Fitz Osbern the steward, William de Warene and Hugh the butler; Hugh de Grantmesnil and Roger de Mowbray, Roger de Beaumont and Roger de Montgomeri, Baldwin and Richard sons of Count Gilbert of Brionne. Lib. iii. c. 11. At the battle of Hastings, besides most of these, he mentions (iv. c. 14) Count Eustace of Boulogne, Aimer Viscount of Thouars, Hugh de Montfort the constable, and Walter Giffard. The curious, but questionable, list of the contributions to the fleet by the allied barons, is briefly this;—William Fitz Osbern, the steward furnished 60 ships; Hugh, afterwards earl of Chester, 60; Hugh de Montfort the constable, 50 ships and 60 knights; Renii, afterwards bishop of Lincoln, a ship with 20 knights; Nicholas, abbot of S. Ouen, 20 ships and 100 knights; Count Robert of Eu, 60 ships; Fulk the lame, 40; Gerald the steward, 40; Count William of Evreux, 80; Roger of Montgomeri, 60; Roger of Beaumont, 60; Bishop Odo, 100; Robert of Mortain, 120; Walter Giffard, 30 and 100 knights. Lyttelton, Hist. of Henry II, vol. i. p. 523. These lists are useful as helps in tracing the gradual extinction of the Conquest families during the struggles of the Norman reigns.

² Freeman, Norm. Conq. ii. 169; Ord. Vit. iii. 11; Chron. de Bello, p. 2. The Durham charters in which the king states that he is 'Rex Anglorum hereditario jure factus' are forgeries. See Greenwell, Feodary of Durham, pp. lxxvii, lxxviii. See also p. lxxxii. The king himself on his deathbed declared that he had won the crown by the grace of God, not by hereditary right. Ord. Vit. vii. 15. See Gneist, Verwaltungsrg., i. 111.

William tries to reign as an English king.

the English did not admit, and of which the Normans saw the fallacy, but which he himself consistently maintained and did his best to justify. In that claim he saw not only the justification of the conquest in the eyes of the Church, but his great safeguard against the jealous and aggressive host by whose aid he had realised it. Accordingly, immediately after the battle of Hastings he proceeded to seek the national recognition. He obtained it from the divided and dismayed witan with no great trouble, and was crowned by the archbishop of York, the most influential and patriotic amongst them, binding himself by the constitutional promises of justice and good laws. Standing before the altar at Westminster, 'in the presence of the clergy and people he promised with an oath that he would defend God's holy churches and their rulers, that he would moreover rule the whole people subject to him with righteousness and royal providence, would enact and hold fast right law, utterly forbid rapine and unrighteous judgments¹. The form of election and acceptance was regularly observed and the legal position of the new king completed before he went forth to finish the conquest.

His coronation engagement.

No general division of lands.

Had it not been for this the Norman host might have fairly claimed a division of the land such as the Danes had made in the ninth century². But to the people who had recognised William it was but just that the chance should be given them of retaining what was their own. Accordingly, when the lands of all those who had fought for Harold were confiscated³, those who were willing to acknowledge William were allowed to re-

¹ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1066, W. Pictav. (ed. Maseres, p. 145). See Freeman, Norm. Conq. iii. 559. No doubt the coronation service used was that which had been employed in the case of Ethelred, and the words of Florence represent the coronation engagement: 'Sanctas Dei ecclesias ac rectores illarum defendere, necnon et cunctum populum sibi subjectum juste et regali providentia regere, rectam legem statuere et tenere, rapinas injustaque judicia penitus interdicere.' See above pp. 147, 148.

² See above p. 72.

³ 'The evidence that we have leads us to believe that the whole of the lands of those men, dead or living, who had fought at Senlac, was at once dealt with as land forfeited to the king.' Freeman, Norm. Conq. iv. 24. The evidence consists of references to these confiscations in the Domesday survey. See too Dialogus de Scaccario, i. c. 10.

deem theirs, either paying money at once or giving hostages for the payment¹. That under this redemption lay the idea of a new title to the lands redeemed may be regarded as questionable. The feudal lawyer might take one view, and the plundered proprietor another. But if charters of confirmation or regrant were generally issued on the occasion to those who were willing to redeem, there can be no doubt that as soon as the feudal law gained general acceptance, these would be regarded as conveying a feudal title. What to the English might be a mere payment of fyrdwite or composition for a recognised offence, might to the Normans seem equivalent to forfeiture and restoration. But however this was, the process of confiscation and redistribution of lands under the new title began from the moment of the coronation. The next few years, occupied in the reduction of Western and Northern England, added largely to the stock of divisible estates. The tyranny of Odo of Bayeux and William Fitz Osbern which provoked attempts at rebellion in A.D. 1067; the stand made by the house of Godwin in Devonshire in A.D. 1068; the attempts of Mercia and Northumbria to shake off the Normans in A.D. 1069 and 1070; the last struggle for independence in A.D. 1071 in which Edwin and Morcar finally fell; the conspiracy of the Norman earls in A.D. 1074 in consequence of which Waltheof perished, all tended to the same result. After each effort the royal hand was laid on more heavily: more and more land changed owners, and with the change of owners the title changed. The complicated and unintelligible irregularities of the Anglo-Saxon tenures were exchanged for the simple and uniform feudal theory. The fifteen hundred tenants-in-chief of Domesday take the place of the countless landowners of king Edward's time: and the loose unsystematic arrangements which had grown up in the confusion of title, tenure and jurisdiction, were replaced by systematic custom. The change was effected without any legislative act, simply by the process of transfer under circumstances in which simplicity and uniformity of lands.

Redemption

Divisible stock of land increased after each struggle against the Conqueror.

Change of tenure followed with change of owner.

¹ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1066: 'And com to Westmynstre. and Ealdred arce-biscop hine to cyngge gehalgode. and menn guldon him gyld. and gislas sealdon. and syththan heora land bohtan.'

Assimilation
of all tenures to the feudal tenure.

were an absolute necessity. It was not the change from alodial to feudal so much as from confusion to order. The actual amount of dispossession was no doubt greatest in the higher ranks; the smaller owners may to a large extent have remained in a mediatised position on their estates; but even Domesday with all its fulness and accuracy cannot be supposed to enumerate all the changes of the twenty eventful years that followed the battle of Hastings. It is enough for our purpose to ascertain that a universal assimilation of title followed the general changes of ownership. The king of Domesday is the supreme landlord; all the land of the nation, the old folkland, has become the king's; and all private land is held mediately or immediately of him; all holders are bound to their lords by homage and fealty, either actually demanded or understood to be demandable, in every case of transfer by inheritance or otherwise.

Results.

96. The result of this process is partly legal and partly constitutional or political. The legal result is the introduction of an elaborate system of customs, tenures, rights, 'duties, profits and jurisdictions. The constitutional result is the creation of several intermediate links between the body of the nation and the king, in the place of or side by side with the duty of allegiance.

Legal changes consequent on the change of tenure.

On the former of these points we have very insufficient data; for we are quite in the dark as to the development of feudal law in Normandy before the invasion, and may be reasonably inclined to refer some at least of the peculiarities of English feudal law to the leaven of the system which it superseded¹. Nor is it easy to reduce the organisation described in Domesday to strict conformity with feudal law as it appears later, especially with the general prevalence of military tenure. The growth of knighthood is a subject on which the greatest obscurity prevails; and the most probable explanation of its existence in England, the theory that it is a translation into Norman forms of the thegnage of the Anglo-Saxon law, can only be stated as probable. Between the picture drawn in Domesday and the state of affairs which the charter of Henry I was designed to remedy, there is a difference which the short interval of time will not account for, and which testifies to the action of some skilful organising hand working with neither justice nor mercy, hardening and sharpening all lines and points to the perfecting of strong government.

¹ See more on this question in Chapter XI.

Development between 1086
and 1100.

It is unnecessary to recapitulate here all the points in which the Anglo-Saxon institutions were already approaching the feudal model; it may be assumed that the actual obligation of military service was much the same in both systems, and that even the amount of land which was bound to furnish a mounted warrior was the same, however the conformity may have been produced¹. The heriot of the English earl or thegn was in close resemblance with the relief of the Norman count or knight. But however close the resemblance, something was now added that made the two identical. The change of the heriot to the relief implies a suspension of ownership, and carries with it the custom of livery of seisin. The heriot was the payment of a debt from the dead man to his lord²; his son succeeded him by alodial right. The relief was paid by the heir before he could obtain his father's lands; between the death of the father and livery of seisin to the son the right of the overlord had entered, the ownership was to a certain extent resumed, and the succession of the heir took somewhat of the character of a new grant. The right of wardship also became in the same way a re-entry by the lord on the profits of the estate of the minor, instead of being as before a protection, by the head of the kin, of the indefeasible rights of the heir, which it was the duty of the whole community to maintain.

Resemblance of the thegn and knight.

Difference of heriot and relief.

There can be no doubt that the military tenure, the most prominent feature of historical feudalism, was itself introduced by the same gradual process which we have assumed in the case of the feudal usages in general. We have no light on the point from any original grant made by the Conqueror to a lay follower; but, judging by the grants made to the churches, we cannot suppose it probable that such gifts were made on any expressed condition, or accepted with a distinct pledge to provide a certain contingent of knights for the king's service. The obligation of national defence

Military tenure gradually introduced.

¹ Above, pp. 117, 155, 191.

² Ibid. pp. 24, 157.

Grants not made conditionally.

was incumbent as of old on all landowners, and the customary service of one fully-armed man for each five hides was probably the rate at which the newly endowed follower of the king would be expected to discharge his duty. The wording of the Domesday survey does not imply that in this respect the new military service differed from the old: the land is marked out not into knights' fees but into hides, and the number of knights to be furnished by a particular feudatory would be ascertained by inquiring the number of hides that he held, without apportioning the particular acres that were to support the particular knight.

Knights' fees gradually introduced.

It would undoubtedly be on the estates of the lay vassals that a more definite usage would first be adopted, and knights bound by feudal obligations to their lords receive a definite estate from them. Our earliest information, however, on this as on most points of tenure is derived from the notices of ecclesiastical practice. Lanfranc, we are told, turned the dreungs, the rent-paying tenants of his archiepiscopal estates, into knights for the defence of the country¹: he enfeoffed a certain number of knights who performed the military service due from the archiepiscopal barony. This had been done before the Domesday survey², and almost necessarily implies that a like measure had been taken by the lay vassals. Lanfranc likewise maintained ten knights to answer for the military service due from the convent of Christ Church, which made over to him, in consideration of the relief, land worth two hundred pounds annually. The value of the knight's fee must already have been fixed at twenty pounds a year. In the reign of William Rufus the abbot of Ramsey obtained a charter which exempted his monastery from the service of ten knights due from it on festivals, substituting

Case in Kent.

Case of Ramsey.

¹ Epp. Cantuar. p. 225. Elton's Tenures of Kent, pp. 68, 69. 'Sed et hæc attestantur scripta vetustissima, quæ lingua Anglorum land-bokes, id est, terrarum libros vocat. Quia vero non erant adhuc tempore regis Willelmi milites in Anglia, sed threnges, præcepit rex ut de eis milites fierent ad terram defendendam. Fecit autem Lanfrancus threngos suos milites; monachi vero id non fecerunt sed de portione sua ducentas libratas terræ dederunt archiepiscopo, ut per milites suos terras eorum defenderet et omnia negotia eorum apud curiam Romanam suis expensis expediret, unde adhuc in tota terra monachorum nullus miles est, sed in terra archiepiscopi.' As late as 1201 the archbishop obtained a charter for the same purpose; Houard, Anc. Loix, ii. 352.

² Domesday, i. fol. 3.

the obligation to furnish three knights to perform service on the north of the Thames¹: a proof that the lands of that house had not yet been divided into knights' fees. In the next reign we may infer from the favour granted by the king to the knights who defend their lands 'per loricas,' that is, by the hauberk, that their demesne lands shall be exempt from pecuniary taxation, that the process of definite military infeudation had largely advanced. But it was not even yet forced on the clerical or monastic estates. When in 1167 the abbot of Milton in Dorset was questioned as to the number of knights' fees for which he had to account, he replied that all the services due from his monastery were discharged out of the demesne; but he added that in the reign of Henry I, during a vacancy in the abbacy, bishop Roger of Salisbury had enfeoffed two knights out of the abbey lands²; he had however subsequently reversed the act and had restored the lands whose tenure had been thus altered to their original condition of rent-paying estate or socage. The very term 'the new feoffment' which was applied to the knights' fees created between the death of Henry I and the year in which the account preserved in the Black Book of the Exchequer was taken, proves that the process was going on for nearly a hundred years³, and

Case of Milton.

Old and new feoffment.

¹ Ramsey Cartulary, fol. 54 b: in the 29th report of the Deputy Keeper of the Records, app. p. 45. The abbot in 1167 replies to the royal inquiry as to the number of knights enfeoffed in the monastic lands: 'Homines faciunt iiii. milites in communi ad servitium domini regis, ita quod tota terra abbatie communicata est cum eis per hidas ad praedictum servitium faciendum.' The lands were not yet cut into knights' fees. Liber Niger Scaccarii, ed. Hearne, i. 257. Similarly the bishop of Durham's service for his demesne land was that of ten knights, but it was not cut up into fees. Ibid. 309.

² Liber Niger Scaccarii, i. 75: 'Contigit tamen aliquando, ecclesia nostra vacante, Rogerum episcopum Saresberiae illam ex mandato regis Henrici avi vestri in custodiam annis quinque suscepisse. Tunc praedictus episcopus de quodam tenemento quod tenuit R. de Monasteriis feodo censuali, scilicet de duabus hidis, unum fefavit militem. Postmodo vero bonae memoriae R. praecessore meo constituto abbate, per justitiam regis Henrici et consilio praefati episcopi R. feoda praedicta ad antiquum statum revocata sunt; et quos episcopus constituit milites facti sunt censuarii.'

³ An objection to this argument may be found in a clause of the so-called Charter of the Conqueror (Ll. Will. iii. § 8), in which the full-grown doctrine of military tenure is expressed thus: 'Omnes comites et barones et milites et servientes, et universi liberi homines totius regni nostri praedicti, habeant et teneant se semper bene in armis et in equis ut decet et oportet; et sint semper prompti et bene parati ad servitium suum integrum

Knights' fees the result of a composition.

Number unknown.

No rule as to the extent of a knight's fee.

that the form in which the knights' fees appear when called on by Henry II for scutage was most probably the result of a series of compositions by which the great vassals relieved their lands from a general burden by carving out particular estates the holders of which performed the services due from the whole ; it was a matter of convenience and not of tyrannical pressure. The statement of Ordericus Vitalis that the Conqueror 'distributed lands to his knights in such fashion that the kingdom of England should have for ever 60,000 knights, and furnish them at the king's command according to the occasion¹' must be regarded as one of the many numerical exaggerations of the early historians. The officers of the Exchequer in the twelfth century were quite unable to fix the number of existing knight's fees.

It cannot even be granted that a definite area of land was necessary to constitute a knight's fee ; for although at a later period and in local computations we may find four or five hides adopted as a basis of calculation, where the extent of the particular knight's fee is given exactly, it affords no ground for such a conclusion. In the Liber Niger we find knights' fees of two hides and a half², of two hides³, of four⁴, five⁵, and six hides⁶. Geoffrey Ridel states that his father held 184 carucates and a virgate, for which the service of fifteen knights was due, but that no knights' fees had been carved out of it, the obligation lying equally on every carucate⁷. The archbishop of York nobis explendum et peragendum cum opus fuerit, secundum quod nobis debent de feodis et tenementis suis de jure facere ; et sicut illis statuimus per commune consilium totius regni nostri praedicti, et illis dedimus et concessimus in feodo jure haereditario.' But this charter is a mere fabrication, and gives no authority whatever to the articles which are not found in the earlier and simpler form. See Hoveden, ii. pref. pp xxxv, xxxvi. If this clause be genuine, or any part of it, it must be understood to refer only to the cases in which the knights' fees had been actually apportioned.

¹ Ord. Vit. iv. 7.

² Lib. Nig. i. 64, 75.

³ Ibid. i. 75.

⁴ Ibid. i. 79.

⁵ Ibid. i. 79, 104, 165.

⁶ Ibid. i. 79 ; where one hide is reckoned as the sixth part of a knight's fee ; and also as a fifth part : the difference being of course accounted for by the quality of the land, or by the tenour of the enfeoffment.

⁷ Ibid. i. 210 : 'Nullus militum de veteri illo fefamento feofatus fuit nominatim per feodum militis ; sed unaquaeque carrucata terrae ad faciendum milites xv. par est alii ad omnia servitia facienda et in exercitiis et in custodiis et ubique.'

had far more knights than his tenure required¹. It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the extent of a knight's fee was determined by rent or valuation rather than acreage, and that the common quantity was really expressed in the twenty librates², the twenty pounds' worth of annual value which until the reign of Edward I was the qualification for knighthood³. It is most probable that no regular account of the knights' fees was ever taken until they became liable to taxation, either in the form of auxilium militum under Henry I, or in that of scutage under his grandson. The facts, however, which are here adduced, preclude the possibility of referring this portion of the feudal innovations to the direct legislation of the Conqueror. It may be regarded as a secondary question whether the knighthood here referred to was completed by the investiture with knightly arms and the honourable accolade. The ceremonial of knighthood was practised by the Normans, whereas the evidence that the English had retained the primitive practice of investing the youthful warrior is insufficient: yet it would be rash to infer that so early as this, if indeed it ever was the case, every possessor of a knight's fee received formal initiation before he assumed his spurs. But every such analogy would make the process of transition easier and prevent the necessity of any general legislative act of change.

The knight's fee was of the annual value of £20.

Questionable relation of knighthood to knight-service.

It has been maintained that a formal and definitive act, forming the initial point of the feudalisation of England, is to be found in a clause of the laws, as they are called, of the Conqueror; which directs that every free man shall affirm by covenant and oath that 'he will be faithful to King William within England and without, will join him in preserving his Feudalism not involved in the oath exacted by William.

¹ Lib. Nig. i. 303: 'Sciatis, domine, quod super dominium archiepiscopus Eboracensis nullum feodum est militis, quoniam tot habemus featos milites per quos acquietavimus omne servitium quod vobis debemus, sicut et praecessores nostri fecerunt, et plures etiam habemus quam vobis debemus. Antecessores enim nostri, non pro necessitate servitii quod deberent, sed quia cognatis et servientibus suis providere volebant, plures quam debent regi feodaverunt.'

² See above, p. 262. In the return of Nigel de Luvetot in the Liber Niger, i. 258, the fractions of the knights' fee are calculated in solidates, or shillings' worths. See also pp. 293, 294.

³ Select Charters, pp. 446, 447. Cf. Gneist, Verwalt. i. 116, 117.

The general oath of allegiance is not feudal.

lands and honour with all fidelity, and defend him against his enemies¹.’ But this injunction is little more than the demand of the oath of allegiance which had been taken to the Anglo-Saxon kings, and is here required not of every feudal dependent of the king, but of every freeman or freeholder whatsoever. In that famous Council of Salisbury of A.D. 1086, which was summoned immediately after the making of the Domesday survey, we learn from the Chronicle that there came to the king ‘all his witan, and all the landholders of substance in England whose vassals soever they were, and they all submitted to him, and became his men and swore oaths of allegiance that they would be faithful to him against all others.’ In this act has been seen the formal acceptance and date of the introduction of feudalism, but it has a very different meaning. The oath described is the oath of allegiance, combined with the act of homage, and obtained from all landowners whoever their feudal lord might be². It

The oath taken at Salisbury was really anti-feudal.

¹ Ll. Will. I, § 2, below, note 2. See Hoveden, ‘ii. pref. pp. xxv. sq. where I have attempted to prove the spuriousness of the document called the charter of William I printed in the Ancient Laws, ed. Thorpe, p. 211. The way in which the regulation of the Conqueror here referred to, has been misunderstood and misused is curious. Lambarde in the Archæologia, p. 170, printed the false charter, in which this genuine article is incorporated, as an appendix to the French version of the Conqueror’s laws; numbering the clauses 51 to 67; from Lambarde the whole thing was transferred by Wilkins into his collection of Anglo-Saxon laws. Blackstone, Commentaries, ii. 49, suggested that ‘perhaps the very law [which introduced feudal tenures] thus made at the Council of Salisbury, is that which is still extant and couched in these remarkable words,’ i.e. the injunction in question; and referred to Wilkins, p. 228. Ellis, in the introduction to Domesday, i. 16, quotes Blackstone, but adds a reference to Wilkins without verifying Blackstone’s citation from his Collection of Laws, substituting for that work the Concilia in which the law does not occur. Many modern writers have followed him in referring the enactment of the article to the Council of Salisbury.

² It is as well to give here the text of both passages. That in the laws runs thus: ‘Statuimus etiam ut omnis liber homo foedere et sacramento affirmet quod infra et extra Angliam Willelmo regi fideles esse volunt, terras et honorem illius omni fidelitate cum eo servare et ante eum contra inimicos defendere.’ Select Charters, p. 80. The homage done at Salisbury is described by Florence thus: ‘Nec multo post mandavit ut archiepiscopi, episcopi, abbates, comites et barones, et vicecomites cum suis militibus die Kalendarum Augustarum sibi occurrerent Saresberie; quo cum venissent, milites eorum sibi fidelitatem contra omnes homines jurare coegit.’ The Chronicle is a little more full, ‘Thar him comon to his witan and ealle tha landsittende men the ahtes wæron ofer eall Engleland, wæron thas mannes men the hi wæron, and ealle hi bugon to him and is a measure of precaution taken against the disintegrating power of feudalism, providing a direct tie between the sovereign and all freeholders which no inferior relation existing between them and the mesne lords would justify them in breaking. But this may be discussed further on. The real importance of the passage as bearing on the date of the introduction of feudal tenure is merely that it shows the system to have already become consolidated; all the landowners of the kingdom had already become, somehow or other, vassals, either of the king or of some tenant under him. The lesson may be learned from the fact of the Domesday survey.

It shows that the feudal theory was already accepted.

97. The introduction of such a system would necessarily have effects far wider than the mere modification of the law of tenure; it might be regarded as a means of consolidating and concentrating the whole machinery of government; legislation, taxation, judicature, and military defence were all capable of being organised on the feudal principle, and might have been so had the moral and political results been in harmony with the legal. But we have seen that its tendency when applied to governmental machinery is disruptive. The great feature of the Conqueror's policy is his defeat of that tendency. Guarding against it he obtained recognition as the king of the nation and, so far as he could understand them and the attitude of the nation allowed, he maintained the usages of the nation. He kept up the popular institutions of the hundred court and the shire court¹. He confirmed the laws which had been in use in King Edward's days with the additions which he himself made for the benefit, as he especially tells us, of the English². We are told, on what seems wæron his menn and him hold athas sworon that hi woldon ongean ealle othre men hin holde beon.' Gneist, Verwalt. i. 116 rightly points out this oath as giving to the English polity a direction very different from that of the continental states.

The Conqueror's policy was to defeat the disruptive tendency of feudal institutions.

¹ Statutes of William, § 8: 'Requiratur hundredus et comitatus sicut antecessores nostri statuerunt.'

² Ibid. § 7: 'Hoc quoque præcipio et volo ut omnes habeant et teneant legem Edwardi regis in terris et in omnibus rebus, adactis iis quæ constitui ad utilitatem populi Anglorum.' This is re-echoed by Henry I in his Charter, § 13, 'Lagan Edwardi regis vobis reddo cum illis emendationibus quibus pater meus eam emendavit consilio baronum suorum.'

Maintenance of national customs.

William's laws a reissue of the earlier codes.

to be the highest legal authority of the next century, that he issued in his fourth year a commission of inquiry into the national customs, and obtained from sworn representatives of each county a declaration of the laws under which they wished to live¹. The compilation that bears his name is very little more than a reissue of the code of Canute. And this proceeding helped greatly to reconcile the English people to his rule. Although the oppressions of his later years were far heavier than the measures taken to secure the immediate success of the Conquest, all the troubles of the kingdom after A.D. 1075, in his sons' reigns as well as in his own, proceeded from the insubordination of the Normans, not from the attempts of the English to dethrone the king. Very early they learned that, if their interest was not the king's, at least their enemies were his enemies; hence they are invariably found on the royal side against the feudatories.

Maintenance of the national militia.

Of the witen-
agemot.

This accounts for the maintenance of the national force of defence, over and above the feudal army. The fyrd of the English, the general armament of the men of the counties and hundreds, was not abolished at the Conquest, but subsisted even through the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I, to be reformed and reconstituted under Henry II; and in each reign it gave proof of its strength and faithfulness. The witenagemot itself retained the ancient form; the bishops and abbots formed a chief part of it, instead of being, as in Normandy, so insignificant an element that their very participation in deliberation has been doubted. The king sat crowned three times in the year in the old royal towns of Westminster, Winchester, and Gloucester², hearing the complaints of his people, and executing such justice as his knowledge of their law and language and his own imperious will allowed. In all this there is no violent innovation, only such gradual essential changes as twenty eventful years of new actors and new principles must bring, however insensibly the people, themselves passing away and being replaced by their children, may be educated to endurance.

¹ 'Willelmus rex quarto anno regni sui, consilio baronum suorum fecit summoneri per universos consulatus Angliae Anglos nobiles et sapientes et sua lege eruditos ut eorum et jura et consuetudines ab ipsis audiret. Electi igitur de singulis totius patriae comitatibus viri duodecim jurejurando confirmaverunt primo ut, quoad possent, recto tramite neque ad dextram neque ad sinistram partem devertentes legum suarum consuetudinem et sancita pateficerent, nil praetermittentes, nil addentes, nil praevariando mutantes.' Hoveden, ii. 218. The authority on which the statement is made seems to be that of the justiciar Ranulf Glanvill. See Hoveden, ii. pref. p. xlvii. According to the tradition preserved in the same document the laws ultimately granted by William were those of Edgar. Ibid. p. 235.

² Chron. Sax. A.D. 1087. W. Malmesb. G. R. iii. § 279.

No violent innovation.

98. It would be wrong to impute to the Conqueror any intention of deceiving the nation by maintaining its official forms whilst introducing new principles and a new race of administrators. What he saw required change he changed with a high hand. But not the less surely did the change of administrators involve a change of custom, both in the church and in the state. The bishops, ealdormen, and sheriffs, of English birth were replaced by Normans: not unreasonably perhaps, considering the necessity of preserving the balance of the state. With the change of officials came a sort of amalgamation or duplication of titles; the ealdorman or earl became the comes or count; the sheriff became the vicecomes¹; the office in each case receiving the name of that which corresponded most closely with it in Normandy itself. With the amalgamation of titles

Changes resulting from change of administrators.

¹ The correspondence of the offices of count and earl is obvious and need not be discussed further, since comes had even before the Conquest been adopted as the Latin word for earl or ealdorman; see above, pp. 112, 156, 158. The identification of the vicecomes with the sheriff requires a little more illustration, for many writers have tried to explain the term as if it were of native growth and have been accordingly puzzled by the fact that the vicecomes is the vicegerent, not of the earl, but of the king. See Madox, Dialogus de Scaccario, pp. 31, 32. Hence also, when it was ascertained that the vicecomes was imported full-grown from Normandy, it was thought probable that the comes whom he represented there was the comes Normannorum, the duke of Normandy. But the term is really one of Frank origin. The vicecomes is the missus comitis of the Karolings, as distinguished from the vicarius or centenarius, who stands to him in the same subaltern relation in which the vicecomes stands to the comes; but he is the judicial representative of the Karolingian comes: the name appears first in Southern France under Lewis the Pious, but never was domesticated in Germany. Sohm, Fr. R. G. Verfg. pp. 508-525. It had been maintained in Normandy by the Normans without any question of verbal correctness, and was in the same loose way transferred to England. The duties of the Norman viscounts very much of course resembled those of the sheriffs both fiscally and judicially, but we know little of their action before the Conquest.

New names
bring in new principles.

came an importation of new principles and possibly new functions; for the Norman count and viscount had not exactly the same customs as the earls and sheriffs. And this ran up into the highest grades of organisation; the king's court of counsellors was composed of his feudal tenants; the ownership of land was now the qualification for the witenagemot instead of wisdom; the earldoms became fiefs instead of magistracies, and even the bishops had to accept the status of barons. There was a very certain danger that the mere change of persons might bring in the whole machinery of hereditary magistracies, and that king and people might be edged out of the administration of justice, taxation, and other functions of supreme or local independence. Against this it was most important to guard; as the Conqueror learned from the events of the first year of his reign, when the severe rule of Odo and William Fitz-Osbern had provoked Herefordshire and Kent into hopeless resistance.

Hereditary
jurisdictions, a thing to be avoided.

It was no part of William's policy to break up the unity of the royal authority by the creation of great hereditary territorial jurisdictions: but the absolute necessity of measures by which the disruptive tendency should be defeated forced itself upon him probably by degrees; and every opportunity that was furnished by the forfeitures of the first ten years of the reign was turned to progressive advantage. His first earls were merely successors of the earls of Edward the Confessor; William Fitz-Osbern held Herefordshire as it had been held by earl Ralph; Ralph Guader, Roger Montgomery, and Hugh of Avranches filled the places of Edwin and Morcar and the brothers of Harold. But the conspiracy of the earls in A.D. 1074 opened William's eyes to the danger of this proceeding, and from that time onward he governed the provinces through sheriffs immediately dependent on himself, avoiding the foreign plan of appointing hereditary counts, as well as the English custom of ruling by vice-regal ealdormen. He was however very sparing in giving earldoms at all, and inclined to confine the title to those who were already counts in Normandy or in France. To this plan there were some marked exceptions, which may be accounted

William
gives very few earl-doms.

for either on the ground that the arrangements had been completed before the need of watchfulness was impressed on the king by the treachery of the Normans, or on that of the exigencies of national defence. In these cases he created, or suffered the continuance of, great palatine jurisdictions; earldoms in which the earls were endowed with the superiority of whole counties, so that all the landowners held feudally of them, in which they received the whole profits of the courts and exercised all the regalia or royal rights, nominated the sheriffs, held their own councils and acted as independent princes except in the owing of homage and fealty to the king. Two of these palatinates, the earldom of Chester and the bishopric of Durham, retained much of their character to our own days¹. A third, the palatinate of bishop Odo in Kent, if it were really a jurisdiction of the same sort, came to an end when Odo forfeited the confidence of his brother and nephew². A fourth, the earldom of Shropshire, which is not commonly counted amongst the palatine jurisdictions, but which possessed under the Montgomery earls all the characteristics of such a dignity, was confiscated after the treason of Robert of Belesme by Henry I³. These had been all founded before the conspiracy of A.D. 1074; they were also, like the later lordships of the marches, a part of the national defence; Chester and

Existence of palatine
earldoms.

Their defensive
character.

¹ The earldom of Chester has, with the principality of Wales, belonged to the eldest son of the sovereign since 1301; the palatinate jurisdiction of Durham was transferred to the crown in 1836 by act of Parliament, 6 Will. IV, c. 19.

² The palatine jurisdiction of Odo rests on the authority of Ordericus Vitalis, who speaks as if he understood what he meant by the term; he mentions the gift of Kent three times, (1) in A.D. 1067, 'totam Cantiam fratri suo commendavit'; at that time the archbishop Stigand was a prisoner, and Odo was acting as cojusticiar; (2) under the year 1087 he speaks of him as viceroy, 'in Anglia praeosuit Cantiae regno'; and (3) in 1088, 'palatinus Cantiae comes erat, et plures sub se comites virosque potentes habebat.' This seems distinct enough, but it may be explained perhaps by supposing the writer to have confused Odo's position as justiciar with his territorial endowment in Kent. The overwhelming character of his power may be inferred from the action of the Placitum apud Pinnendenam, below, p. 277; in the record of which he is called comes Cantiae; Ang. Sac. i. 335; as he is by Osbern, his contemporary: Vita S. Dunstani, p. 144.

³ Mr. Eyton, in his History of Shropshire, claims it as a palatine earldom for Roger Montgomery, vol. i. 22, 70, 242 sq. See too Nicolas's Historic Peerage, ed. Courthope, p. 434, where Selden is quoted as an authority for the same statement; and the Report on the Dignity of a peer, i. 407; and see below, Chapter XI.

Palatine
earldoms.

Shropshire kept the Welsh marches in order, Kent was the frontier exposed to attack from Picardy, and Durham, the patrimony of St. Cuthbert, lay as a sacred boundary between England and Scotland; Northumberland and Cumberland were still a debateable ground between the two kingdoms. Chester was held by its earls as freely by the sword as the king held England by the crown; no lay vassal in the county held of the king, all of the earl. In Shropshire there were only five lay tenants in capite besides Roger Montgomery; in Kent bishop Odo held an enormous proportion of the manors, but the nature of his jurisdiction is not very clear, and its duration is too short to make it of much importance. If William founded any earldoms at all after A.D. 1074, which may be doubted, he did it on a very different scale.

Sheriffdoms occasionally
hereditary.

The hereditary sheriffdoms he did not guard against with equal care. The Norman viscounties were hereditary¹, and there was some risk that the English ones would become so too; and with the worst consequences, for the English counties were much larger than the bailiwicks of the Norman viscount, and the authority of the sheriff, when he was relieved from the company of the ealdorman, and was soon to lose that of the bishop, would have no check except the direct control of the king. If William perceived this, it was too late to prevent it entirely; some of the sheriffdoms became hereditary, and continued to be so long after the abuse had become constitutionally dangerous².

Contiguous territorial accumulations avoided.

The independence of the greater feudatories was still further limited by the principle, which the Conqueror seems to have observed, of avoiding the accumulation in any one hand of a great number of contiguous estates³. The rule is not without some important exceptions, and it may have been suggested by the diversity of occasions on which the fiefs were bestowed, but the result is one which William must have foreseen. An in subordinate baron whose strength lay in twelve different counties would have to rouse the suspicions and perhaps to defy the arms of twelve powerful sheriffs, before he could draw his forces to a head. In his manorial courts, scattered and unconnected, he could set up no central tribunal, nor even force a new custom upon his tenants, nor could he attempt oppression on any extensive scale. By such limitation the people were protected and the central power secured.

¹ See Stapleton, 'Rotuli Scaccarii Normannie,' i. pp. lviii, lix, &c.

² See Chapter XI.

³ See Thorpe's Lappenberg, iii. 201. The estates of Odo lay in seventeen counties, those of Robert of Mortain in twenty; Eustace of Boulogne had fiefs in twelve counties, and Hugh of Avranches in twenty-one, besides his palatine earldom. Gneist, Self-government, i. 66, 67, gives more details, chiefly from Kellam's Domesday illustrated. There are forty-one great vassals, each of whom has estates in more than six counties: of these five have lands in seven, six in eight, two in nine, four in ten, four in eleven, three in twelve, one in thirteen, two in fourteen, one in twenty, and one in twenty-one; all these are laymen. The greatest number of manors is held by Robert of Mortain, 793; Odo has 439; Alan of Brittany 442.

Distribution of great fiefs in distant counties.

Yet the changes of ownership, even thus guarded, wrought other changes. It is not to be supposed that the Norman baron, when he had received his fief, proceeded to carve it out into demesne and tenants' land as if he were making a new settlement in an uninhabited country. He might indeed build his castle and enclose his chase with very little respect to the rights of his weaker neighbours, but he did not attempt any such radical change as the legal theory of the creation of manors seems to presume. The name 'manor' is of Norman origin, but the estate to which it was given existed, in its essential character, long before the Conquest; it received a new name as the shire also did, but neither the one nor the other was created by this change. The local jurisdictions of the thegns who had grants of sac and soc, or who exercised judicial functions amongst their free neighbours, were identical with the manorial jurisdictions of the new owners. It may be conjectured with great probability that in many cases the weaker freemen, who had either willingly or under constraint attended the courts of their great neighbours, were now, under the general infusion of feudal principle, regarded as holding their lands of them as lords; it is not less probable that in a great number of grants the right to suit and service from small landowners passed from the king to the receiver of the fief as a matter of course; but it is certain that even before the Conquest such a proceeding was not uncommon; Edward the Confessor had transferred to St. Augustine's monastery a number of alodiarics

Legal theory of the origin of manors.

Growth of manorial customs.

Manorial
institutions.

Estimate of the amount of change.

The new forms oppressive in result.

Position of the Norman
king.

in Kent¹, and every such measure in the case of a church must have had its parallel in similar grants to laymen. The manorial system brought in a number of new names; and perhaps a duplication of offices. The gerefa of the old thegn, or of the ancient township, was replaced, as president of the courts, by a Norman steward or seneschal; and the bydel of the old system by the bailiff of the new; but the gerefa and bydel still continued to exist in a subordinate capacity as the grave or reeve and the bedell; and when the lord's steward takes his place in the county court, the reeve and four men of the township are there also. The common of the township may be treated as the lord's waste, but the townsmen do not lose their customary share. The changes that take place in the state have their resulting analogies in every village, but no new England is created; new forms displace but do not destroy the old, and old rights remain, although changed in title and forced into symmetry with a new legal and pseudo-historical theory. The changes may not seem at first sight very oppressive, but they opened the way for oppression; the forms they had introduced tended, under the spirit of Norman legality and feudal selfishness, to become hard realities, and in the profound miseries of Stephen's reign the people learned how completely the new theory left them at the mercy of their lords; nor were all the reforms of his successor more stringent or the struggles of the century that followed a whit more impassioned, than were necessary to protect the English yeoman from the men who lived upon his strength.

99. In attempting thus to estimate the real amount of change introduced by the feudalism of the Conquest, many points of further interest have been touched upon, to which it is necessary to recur only so far as to give them their proper place in a more general view of the reformed organisation. The Norman king is still the king of the nation. He has become the supreme landlord; all estates are held of him mediately or immediately, but he still demands the allegiance of all his subjects. The oath which he exacted at Salisbury in A.D. 1086, and which is embodied in the semi-legal form already quoted, was a modification of the oath taken to Edmund¹, and was intended to set the general obligation of obedience to the king in its proper relation to the new tie of homage and fealty by which the tenant was bound to his lord. All men continued to be primarily the king's men, and the public peace to be his peace. Their lords might demand their service to fulfil their own obligations, but the king could call them to the fyrd, summon them to his courts, and tax them without the intervention of their lords; and to the king they could look for protection against all foes. Accordingly the king could rely on the help of the bulk of the free people in all struggles with his feudatories, and the people, finding that their connexion with their lords would be no excuse for unfaithfulness to the king, had a further inducement to adhere to the more permanent institutions.

¹ Kemble, C. D. iv. 239. See above, p. 189.

Direct relations between king and people.

In the department of law the direct changes introduced by the Conquest were not great. Much that is regarded as peculiarly Norman was developed upon English soil, and although originated and systematised by Norman lawyers, contained elements which would have worked in a very different way in Normandy. Even the vestiges of Karolingian practice which appear in the inquests of the Norman reigns are modified by English usage. The great inquest of all, the Domesday survey, may owe its principle to a foreign source; the oath of the reporters may be Norman, but the machinery that furnishes the jurors is native; 'the king's barons inquire by the oath of the sheriff of the shire, and of all the barons and their Frenchmen, and of the whole hundred, the priest, the reeve, and six ceorls of every township².' The institution of the collective Frankpledge, which recent writers incline to treat as a Norman innovation, is so distinctly coloured by English custom that it has been generally regarded as purely indigenous. If it were indeed a precaution taken by the new rulers against the avoidance of justice by the absconding or harbouring of criminals, it fell with ease into the usages and even the legal terms which had been common

Amount of change in jurisprudence uncertain.

Inquests.

Frankpledges.

¹ Above, p. 148.

² Domesday of Ely; Domesd. iii. 497.

Trial by battle.

for other similar purposes since the reign of Athelstan¹. The trial by battle, which on clearer evidence seems to have been brought in by the Normans, is a relic of old Teutonic jurisprudence, the absence of which from the Anglo-Saxon courts is far more curious than its introduction from abroad².

Jurisdiction
of the sheriff unaltered.

The organisation of jurisdiction required and underwent no great change in these respects. The Norman lord who undertook the office of sheriff had, as we have seen, more unrestricted power than the sheriffs of old. He was the king's representative in all matters judicial, military, and financial in his shire, and had many opportunities of tyrannising in each of those departments: but he introduced no new machinery. From him, or from the courts of which he was the presiding officer, appeal lay to the king alone; but the king was often absent from England and did not understand the language of his subjects.

The justiciar
as the king's deputy.

In his absence the administration was entrusted to a justiciar, a regent or lieutenant of the kingdom; and the convenience being once ascertained of having a minister who could in the whole kingdom represent the king, as the sheriff did in the shire, the justiciar became a permanent functionary. This however cannot be certainly affirmed of the reign of the Conqueror who, when present at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, held great courts of justice as well as for other purposes of state; and the legal importance of the office belongs to a later stage. The royal court, containing the tenants in chief of the crown, both lay and clerical, and entering into all the functions of the witenagemot, was the supreme council of the nation, with the advice and consent of which the king legislated, taxed, and judged.

In the one authentic monument of William's jurisprudence, the act which removed the bishops from the secular courts

¹ See above, pp. 87-89.

² Palgrave argues, from the fact that trial by battle is mentioned in a record of a Worcester shiremoot soon after the Conquest, that the custom may possibly have been of earlier introduction; but it is never mentioned in the laws, and as exemption from it was one of the privileges conferred by charter on towns in the next century, there can be no doubt that it was an innovation, and one which was much disliked. See Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. 225.

and recognised their spiritual jurisdictions, he tells us that he acts 'with the common council and counsel of the archbishops, bishops, abbots, and all the princes of the kingdom'.¹ The ancient summary of his laws contained in the Textus Roffensis is entitled, 'What William King of the English with his princes enacted after the conquest of England²;' and the same form is preserved in the tradition of his confirming the ancient laws reported to him by the representatives of the shires. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle enumerates the classes of men who attended his great courts: 'there were with him all the great men over all England, archbishops and bishops, abbots and earls, thegns and knights³.'

The Conqueror legislates with the advice of his council.

The great suit between Lanfranc as archbishop of Canterbury and Odo as earl of Kent, which is perhaps the best reported trial of the reign, was tried in the county court of Kent before the king's representative, Gosfrid bishop of Coutances; whose presence and that of most of the great men of the kingdom seem to have made it a witenagemot. The archbishop pleaded the cause of his church in a session of three days on Pennenden Heath⁴; the aged South-Saxon bishop, Ethelric, was brought by the king's command to declare the ancient customs of the laws;

A trial of the Conqueror's reign.

¹ 'Communi concilio et consilio archiepiscoporum, episcoporum et abbatum et omnium principum regni mei.' Ancient Laws, p. 213; Select Charters, p. 82.

² Select Charters, p. 80.

³ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1087.

⁴ It is printed in Anglia Sacra, i. 334-336, from the Textus Roffensis, and in Wilkins, Concilia, i. 323, 324. The litigation is referred to in Domesday, i. fol. 5. From the same source we have an account of another trial of some interest, between Gundulf bishop of Rochester and Picot sheriff of Cambridgeshire. The suit was brought before the king; he called together the county court of Cambridgeshire, and directed that the right to the disputed land should be decided by their judgment. Bishop Odo presided. The Cambridgeshire men, in fear of the sheriff, decided against Gundulf. Odo thereupon directed that they should choose twelve out of their number to swear to the truth of their report. The twelve swore falsely; and one of them having confessed his perjury to Odo, he ordered the sheriff to send the jurors up to London, and with them twelve of the best men of the county. He also summoned a body of barons. This court of appeal reversed the decision of the shire. The twelve best men tried to deny their complicity with the perjurers, and Odo offered them the ordeal of iron. They failed under the test, and were fined by the rest of the county three hundred pounds, to be paid to the king. Ang. Sac. i. 339; see below, Chap. XI.

Trial at Pennenden.

and with him several other Englishmen skilled in ancient laws and customs. All these good and wise men supported the archbishop's claim, and the decision was agreed on and determined by the whole county. The sentence was laid before the king, and confirmed by him. Here we have probably a good instance of the principle universally adopted; all the lower machinery of the court was retained entire, but the presence of the Norman justiciar and barons gave it an additional authority, a more direct connexion with the king, and the appearance at least of a joint tribunal¹.

Principle of
amalgama-
tion.

The principle of amalgamating the two laws and nationalities by superimposing the better consolidated Norman superstructure on the better consolidated English substructure, runs through the whole policy. The English system was strong in the cohesion of its lower organism, the association of individuals in the township, in the hundred and in the shire; the Norman system was strong in its higher ranges, in the close relation to the crown of the tenants in chief whom the king had enriched. On the other hand, the English system was weak in the higher organisation, and the Normans in England had hardly any subordinate organisation at all. The strongest elements of both were brought together.

The same principle carried out in taxation.

100. The same idea of consolidating the royal power by amalgamating the institutions of the two races was probably followed also in the department of finance; although in this point neither party was likely to discern much immediate benefit to any one but the king. William, whose besetting vice was said by his contemporaries to be avarice, retained the revenues of his predecessors and added new imposts of his own. The ordinary revenue of the English king had been derived solely from the royal estates and the produce of what had been the folkland, with such commuted payments of feormfultum, or provision in kind, as represented either the reserved rents from ancient possessions of the crown, or the quasi-voluntary tribute paid by the nation to its chosen head. The Danegeld,

¹ Exactly the same principle was involved in the institution of regular eyres or circuits of the justices by Henry I or Henry II.

that is, the extraordinary revenue arising from the cultivated land, —originally levied as tribute to the Danes, although it had been continued long after the occasion for it had ceased,—had been abolished by Edward the Confessor¹. The Conqueror not only retained the royal estates, but imposed the Danegeld anew. In A.D. 1084 he demanded a sum of six shillings from every hide of land, three times the old rate². The measure may have been part of the defensive policy which he adopted after discovering the faithlessness of his brother Odo, and which connects itself with the Domesday survey and the Salisbury council two years later; but it became a permanent source of revenue. On the Norman side the supreme landlord was entitled to all the profits of the feudal position, a description of income of which we have no details proper to the reign of the Conqueror, but which becomes prominent immediately after his death. It is needless to observe that the actual burden of the feudal imposts, as well as the older taxation, fell on the English; for the Norman lords had no other way of raising their reliefs, aids, tallages, and the rest, than from the labours of their native dependents. The exaction may have been treated by them as a tyrannical one, but the hardship directly affected the English.

The income thus accumulated was no doubt very great. The royal lands are known from Domesday to have produced in the reign of William the Conqueror nearly £20,000³; and the Danegeld of A.D. 1084, if levied from two-thirds of the hidage of the kingdom, would be about as much more. To this must be added the profits of jurisdictions and the other occasional items which we have no means of estimating. Giraldus Cambrensis⁴ mentions £40,000 as the amount which in his days

¹ Edward imagined that he saw the devil sitting on the bags in the treasury. Hoveden, i. 110. The author of the Dialogus de Scaccario says that William turned the Danegeld from a regular into an occasional tax. Lib. i. c. 11.

² Chron. Sax. A.D. 1083; Flor. Wig. A.D. 1084; Freeman, Norm. Conq. iv. 685.

³ Pearson, Early and Middle Ages, i. 385.

⁴ De Inst. Princ. iii. c. 30: 'Angliæ, regum Anglorum tempore et etiam penultimi Edwardi Westmonasteriensis diebus, annui fiscales redditus, sicut in rotulo Wintoniæ reperitur, ad sexaginta millia marcarum summam implebant.'

Income of the Conqueror.

was regarded as representing the income ascribed, on the evidence of Domesday, to Edward the Confessor. Ordericus Vitalis, a well-informed Norman monk of the next century, boldly states William's revenue at £1061 10s. 1½*d.* a day, besides the profits of the law courts¹. If, as has been cleverly conjectured, this circumstantial statement refers properly to the weekly revenue, we arrive at a sum of between fifty and sixty thousand pounds a year. A comparison with the revenue of Henry I, which in his thirty-first year reached a gross amount of £66,000, may show that this is not improbable². But the numerical statements of the early writers are very untrustworthy, and no approach can yet be made to a precise estimate. It is evident, however, that the same general principle was at work in the collection of revenue as in the courts of justice and in the furnishing of military defence. No class was left untaxed; all men had a distinct relation to the king over and above the relation to their lords; and the strongest points of the two national systems are brought into joint working.

Ecclesiastical policy
of the Conqueror.

101. The ecclesiastical policy of the Conqueror presents marks of coincidence, and also of contrast, with his secular administration. There is the same change of administrators, but not the same fusion or modification of offices. The change of administrators is gradual in the church as in the state, and nearly as complete: the English church was drawn into the general tide of ecclesiastical politics and lost much of its insular character: it gained in symmetry and definiteness of action, and was started on a new career. But the immediate motives of William's measures are somewhat complex. His attack on England was planned and carried out with the approval of Pope

¹ Ord. Vit. iv. 7: 'Ipsi vero regi, ut fertur, mille et sexaginta libras sterlingensium monetarum, solidique triginta et tres oboli, ex justis redditibus Angliæ per singulos dies redduntur; exceptis muneribus regis et reatum redemptionibus, aliisque multiplicibus negotiis quæ regis aerarium quotidie adaugent.'

² Ben. Pet. ii. pref. xcix. The sum, calculated as carefully as I could do it, is £66,593, but it includes debts and old accounts, and cannot be regarded as an approximation to the true revenue. The treasure in Henry's hands at his death was at least £160,000, of which £100,000 fell to Stephen, Will. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. i. § 14; and £60,000 was in Normandy, Ord. Vit. xiii. 19.

Alexander II, and the hard measure dealt out to the English bishops personally was due quite as much to the desire of satisfying the pope, who had his own jealousies and grudges, as to William's belief that the influence of the great ecclesiastics was secretly working against him, or that the support of a strong Norman hierarchy was absolutely necessary for his safety. But William had no intention of following the papal guidance further than was convenient to himself; and in the great adviser whom he chose on his own responsibility he found a very able and conscientious helper. Lanfranc was a statesman as well as a theologian, a lawyer as well as a scholar, and in feeling quite as much an Englishman as a Norman: he was an Italian, too, and, therefore perhaps, not a papalist¹. Hence whilst attempting the reformation of abuses, which either the national easiness and self-complacency, or the evil influence of the Norman clergy had originated, he adopted no violent or rigorous scheme of discipline, provoked no national antipathies, sacrificed neither the state to the church nor the church to the state. His policy was uniformly in agreement with the king's, and his personal influence kept in harmonious working two systems, which contained elements that after his death were to produce a long and bitter quarrel.

Relations to the pope.

Influence of Lanfranc.

William's own ideas of managing the church were probably developed altogether in England itself. The Norman prelates, with whom as duke he had to do, were either sons of the ruling families² or personally insignificant. They had not the position of the English prelates with reference either to the people or to the duke. They were but a small element in his council, and in no close relation with the native population, whilst in William's church policy worked out in England.

¹ Several letters of Lanfranc and Gregory VII are extant, from which a certain amount of coolness may be inferred to have existed between them. Gregory complains and Lanfranc excuses himself. See Freeman, Norm. Conq. iv. 434-437.

² Ordericus names them, lib. iii. c. xi. Odo of Bayeux was the Conqueror's brother; the bishop of Lisieux was brother of the count of Eu, and the bishop of Avranches son of Count Ralph of Bayeux, both cousins of the king; the bishop of Sez belonged to the family of Belesme: Gosfrid of Coutances was a mighty man on both sides the Channel. The archbishop of Rouen and the bishop of Evreux were of less personal importance.

Position of the English
bishops.

England they were the most numerous and coherent body in the witenagemot; and although many of Edward's bishops were foreigners, they had inherited the loyalty and traditional support of the districts over which they presided. The ready submission of the witan in A.D. 1066 saved the bishops for the moment: the Conqueror had no wish to make enemies, and they had no champion to take the place of Harold. But when in A.D. 1070 he had found that the influence of the episcopate was so strong that it must be put into safer hands, and when the legates of Alexander II demanded the humiliation of the ignorant supporters of the antipope Benedict and the enforcement of canonical order, he proceeded to displace most of the native bishops. Then Stigand, who occupied two sees, one of which he had taken in the lifetime of a Norman predecessor, and who had received the pall from a schismatic pope, was deposed and imprisoned. With him fell his brother, the bishop of Elmham, and the faultless bishop of Selsey whom he had consecrated, and who might be regarded as sharing his schismatic attitude¹. The brother bishops of Durham, Ethelwin and Ethelric, had incurred the penalties of treason. York and Lichfield were vacant by death. Dorchester had been filled up by the Norman Remigius since the battle of Hastings². Hereford, Wells, Ransbury, Exeter, and London were already in the hands of foreigners. It was by no act of extraordinary severity that the change was made; but at the end of A.D. 1070 only two sees retained native bishops, Worcester and Rochester³. The way was open for Lanfranc, and his appointment satisfied both king and pope. Henceforth the bishops and most of the abbots were Norman⁴;

Deposition
of English
bishops.

¹ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1070. Remigius, in his profession of obedience to Lanfranc, mentions the mission of legates from the pope with orders that all who had been ordained by Stigand should be deposed or suspended.

² He too had been consecrated by Stigand, but the offence was not so fatal in a Norman as in an Englishman; he declares in his profession that he was ignorant of Stigand's uncanonical status. MS. Cotton, Cleopatra, E. 1.

³ Sward of Rochester is said by William of Mahnesbury to have died a few days after the Conquest. But he lived several years longer, was present at a council at Winchester in 1072, and died probably in 1075.

⁴ The deposition of the abbots was also gradual. See the Chronicle (ed. Earle), pp. 271-275.

but they, like the king, realised their new position as Englishmen by adoption; entering immediately on all the claims of their predecessors and declaring that, so far as their power went, the churches they espoused should suffer no detriment. The Conqueror's bishops were generally good and able men, though not of the English type of character. They were not mere Norman barons, as was the case later on, but scholars and divines chosen under Lanfranc's influence. The abbots were less wisely selected, and had perhaps a more difficult part to play, for the monasteries were still full of English monks, and preserved, and probably concentrated, most of the national aspirations after deliverance which all came to naught.

Character
of the Conqueror's
bishops.

The most important ecclesiastical measure of the reign, the separation of the church jurisdiction from the secular business of the courts of law, is unfortunately, like all other charters of the time, undated. Its contents however show the influence of the ideas which under the genius of Hildebrand were forming the character of the continental churches. From henceforth the bishops and archdeacons are no longer to hold ecclesiastical pleas in the hundred-court, but to have courts of their own; to try causes by canonical not by customary law, and allow no spiritual questions to come before laymen as judges. In case of contumacy the offender may be excommunicated and the king and sheriff will enforce the punishment. In the same way laymen are forbidden to interfere in spiritual causes¹. The reform

Ecclesiasti-
cal courts.

¹ Ancient Laws, ed. Thorpe, p. 213: 'Ut nullus episcopus vel archidiaconus de legibus episcopalibus amplius in hundred placita teneant, nec causam quae ad regimen animarum pertinet ad iudicium secularium hominum adducant, sed quicumque secundum episcopales leges de quacunque causa vel culpa interpellatus fuerit, ad locum quem ad hoc episcopus elegerit vel nominaverit veniat, ibique de causa vel culpa sua respondeat, et, non secundum hundred sed secundum canones et episcopales leges, rectum Deo et episcopo suo faciat. Si vero aliquis per superbiam episcopi ad iustitiam episcopalem venire contempserit vel noluerit, vocetur semel, secundo et tertio; quod si nec sic ad emendationem venerit, excommunicetur et, si opus fuerit, ad hoc vindicandum fortitudo et iustitia regis vel vicecomitis adhibeatur. Ille autem qui vocatus ad iustitiam episcopi venire noluerit, pro unaquaque vocatione legem episcopalem emendabit. Hoc etiam defendo et mea auctoritate interdico, ne ullus vicecomes, aut praepositus seu minister regis, nec aliquis laicus homo de legibus quae ad episcopum pertinent se intronittat, nec aliquis laicus homo alium hominem Consequence of the separation of the spiritual and secular courts.

Growth of the canon law.

is one which might very naturally recommend itself to a man like Lanfranc. The system which it superseded was full of anomalies and disadvantages to both justice and religion. But the change involved far more than appeared at first. The growth of the canon law, in the succeeding century, from a quantity of detached local or occasional rules to a great body of universal authoritative jurisprudence, arranged and digested by scholars who were beginning to reap the advantages of a revived study of the Roman civil law, gave to the clergy generally a far more distinctive and definite civil status than they had ever possessed before, and drew into church courts a mass of business with which the church had previously had only an indirect connexion. The question of investitures, the marriage of the clergy, and the crying prevalence of simony, within a very few years of the Conqueror's death, forced on the minds of statesmen everywhere the necessity of some uniform system of law. The need of a system of law once felt, the recognition of the supremacy of the papal court as a tribunal of appeal followed of course: and with it the great extension of the legatine administration. The clergy thus found themselves in a position external, if they chose to regard it so, to the common law of the land; able to claim exemption from the temporal tribunals, and by appeals to Rome to paralyse the regular jurisdiction of the diocesans. Disorder followed disorder, and the anarchy of Stephen's reign, in which every secular abuse was paralleled or reflected in an ecclesiastical one, prepared the way for the Constitutions of Clarendon, and the struggle that followed with all its results down to the Reformation itself. The same facility of employing the newly developed jurisprudence of the canonists drew into the ecclesiastical courts the matrimonial and testamentary jurisdiction, and that most mischievous, because most abused, system of enforcing moral discipline by spiritual penalties, at the instance of men whose first object was the accumulation of money.

sine justitia episcopi ad judicium adducat; judicium vero in nullo loco portetur, nisi in episcopali sede aut in illo loco quem ad hoc episcopus constituerit.

The foundation of spiritual courts, and the exemption of their proceedings from the common usages of Anglo-Saxon law, had a bearing on the relations of the church to the state in these ways; but it must not be supposed that it was in itself a sign of any disposition in either William or Lanfranc to admit extreme claims on the part of the popes. The results that have been mentioned flowed from a state of things which was now in process of development, and which attained full growth far more rapidly than they could have expected, through circumstances which they could not foresee. Anything like a direct claim on the part of the papacy William repudiated at once. Not only did he distinctly refuse the demand of fealty made by the legate Hubert on behalf of Gregory VII¹, but he seems to have established an understanding with the English church which had the force of a concordat for future times. The arrangement is described by the faithful historian Eadmer as a novelty, but it was a novelty necessitated by the newness of the circumstances in which the king found himself. 'He would not suffer that any one in all his dominions should receive the pontiff of the city of Rome as apostolic pope, except at his command, or should on any condition receive his letters if they had not been first shown to himself.' This principle, which was abused by William Rufus, and which could only work well when the chiefs in church and state were in thorough concert, expresses rather than overcomes the difficulty. But it is a difficulty which has

Attitude of William and Lanfranc towards the papacy.

William's rules of dealing with Rome.

¹ Freeman, Norm. Conq. iv. 432-434, has traced the history of Gregory's correspondence with the Conqueror. Some time about A.D. 1076, the pope sent a legate to William to ask for a more regular payment of Peter's pence and to demand fealty. The king's answer was this: after the greeting 'salutem cum amicitia,' 'Hubertus legatus tuus, religiose pater, ad me veniens ex tua parte me admonuit, quatenus tibi et successoribus tuis fidelitatem facerem, et de pecunia quam antecessores mei ad Romanam ecclesiam mittere solebant melius cogitarem. Unum admisi, alterum non admisi; fidelitatem facere nolui nec volo; quia nec ego promisi nec antecessores meos antecessoribus tuis id fecisse comperio. Pecunia tribus ferme annis, in Galliis me agente, negligenter collecta est; nunc vero Divina misericordia me in regnum meum reverso. quod collectum est per presentem legatum mittetur; et quod reliquum est per legatos Lanfranci archiepiscopi fidelis nostri, cum opportunum fuerit, transmittetur. Orate pro nobis et pro statu re-gni nostri, quia antecessores vestros dileximus et vos prae omnibus sincere diligere et obedienter audire desideramus.' Selden, App. to Eadmer, p. 164; Lanfr. Epp. ed. Giles, No. x.

The Con-
queror's rules of dealing with the Church.

never yet been overcome; and it is probable that the Conqueror's rule went as near to the solution as any state theory has ever done. A second rule was this, 'He did not suffer the primate of his kingdom, the archbishop of Canterbury, if he had called together under his presidency an assembly of bishops, to enact or prohibit anything but what was agreeable to his will and had been first ordained by him.' This was a most necessary limitation of the powers given to the newly established courts, nor did it, in an age in which there was no discord of religious opinion, create any of the scandals which might arise under more modern conditions. The two rules together express the principle of the maxim so well known in later times, 'ejus regio, ejus religio' in that early form in which it recommended itself to the great Charles. A third rule was this; 'he did not allow any of his bishops publicly to implead, excommunicate, or constrain by penalty of ecclesiastical rigour, any of his barons or servants, who was informed against either for adultery or for any capital crime, except by his own command.' Of this also it may be said that it might work well when regulated by himself and Lanfranc, but that otherwise it created rather than solved a difficulty¹. A further usage, which was claimed by Henry I as a precedent, was the prohibition of the exercise of legatine power in England, or even of the legate's landing on the soil of the kingdom without royal licence².

Simplicity of these rules.

Such precautions as these show little more than an incipient misgiving as to the relations of church and state: a misgiving which might well suggest itself either to the king or to the thoughtful mind of the adviser, who saw himself at the head of a church which had been long at uneasy anchorage apart from these ecclesiastical tumults, into the midst of which it was soon to be hurried. There is something Karolingian in their simplicity, and possibly they may have been suggested by the ger-

¹ Eadmer, Hist. Nov. i. (ed. Selden, p. 6); Select Charters, p. 79.

² Eadmer, Hist. Nov. v. p. 118: 'Rex Henriens antiquis Angliæ consuetudinibus præjudicium inferri non sustinens, illum ab ingressu Angliæ detinebat.' See also Flor. Wig. A.D. 1116. In this case the objection to receive the legate arose from the bishops, abbots, and nobles who discussed the question 'communi consilio.' minating Gallicanism of the day. They are, however, of great prospective importance and form the basis of that ancient customary law on which throughout the middle ages the English church relied in her struggles with the papacy.

Their importance.

The removal of the episcopal sees from the villages or decayed towns to the cities¹ is another mark of the reign which is significant of change in the ideas of clerical life, but is not of important consequence. The Norman prelate preferred Bath to Wells and Chester to Lichfield: he felt that he was more at home in the company of the courtier and warrior than in the monastery. But the change went little further: the monastic rigour was tenacious and aggressive: Lanfranc was himself a monk, and allowed the monastic traditions of the early English church even more than their due weight in his reforms². It is now that the secular clerks finally disappear from those cathedrals which remained monastic until the Reformation. The abuses of the rich foundations by married canons, who would perpetuate a hereditary clerical caste, were glaring; and so strong was their interest in both Normandy and England that neither legal nor ecclesiastical discouragement could, for a century and a half, avail to extinguish the evil³. The cathedrals were divided between the two systems in nearly equal proportions.

Removal of episcopal sees.

Question of monasticism in the cathedrals.

¹ In the council of London, A.D. 1075, it was determined to remove the see of Sherborne to Old Sarum; that of Selsey to Chichester; and that of Lichfield to Chester. The see of Dorchester was removed to Lincoln in 1085; that of Elmham, which had been transferred to Thetford about 1078, was moved to Norwich in 1101. The see of Crediton had been transferred to Exeter in 1050. Bishop John of Wells took up his station at Bath in 1088. See Wilkins, Concilia, i. 363.

² See Epistolæ Cantuarienses, pref. pp. xx-xxvi. Lanfranc seems to have been urged by Alexander II himself to reorganise the cathedral of Canterbury on monastic principles; and the same pope forbade bishop Walkelin of Winchester to expel the monks from his church.

³ Epp. Cantuar. pref. xxvi. In the reigns of Edward the Confessor and William, the foreign bishops of Wells, Exeter, and York attempted to reduce their canons to rule by ordering them to have a common refectory and dormitory. They were unable to enforce the command. The institution of Augustinian canons which resulted from the like projects of reform was not adopted in any English cathedral until the see of Carlisle was founded by Henry I, and this continued the only Augustinian cathedral in England until the Reformation. Many of the Scottish cathedrals were, however, made Augustinian in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

Growth of the chapters and convents.

But the reforming prelates showed no wish to throw in their lot with their churches. The bishop's share of the estates was separated from that of the monks, and the exemptions which had been obtained by the favoured non-cathedral monasteries were grasped at by the conventual cathedrals in order to oust the jurisdiction of the bishop in the house and in the property of his chapter. Thus even when the see was transferred to the cities, it was rather the cathedral body than its nominal head that increased in power and pomp. New churches rivalling in beauty and size those of the continent began to be built, and hospitable establishments to be doubled. New orders were instituted in quick succession. The canonical reform failed, but the Augustinian canons grew up out of the failure: every attempt at monastic development took ultimately the form of a new rule, and in England all found a ready and too liberal welcome. In many instances this liberality was exercised at the expense of the parish churches, and an evil precedent was established which outlived in its effects very much of the advantage gained from monastic piety and cultivation. But these results are yet far distant.

New orders of monks.

Transitional
character of the Conqueror's reign.

102. A general view of the reign of the Conqueror suggests the conclusion that, notwithstanding the strength of his personal character, and his maintenance of his right as king of the English and patron of the people both in church and in state;—notwithstanding the clearness of his political designs and the definiteness and solidity of his principles of action, there was very much in the state system which he initiated that still lay in solution. So much depended on the personal relations between himself and Lanfranc in church matters, that after their deaths the whole ecclesiastical fabric narrowly escaped destruction; and in temporal matters also, Lanfranc's influence excepted, the king had no constitutional adviser, no personal friend whose authority contained any element of independence. William is his own minister. His policy, so far as it is his own, owes its stability to his will. His witan are of his own creation,—feudatories powerful in enmity, no source of strength even when they are friends and allies, —with a policy of their own which he is determined to combat.

His people fear him even when and where they trust him : he is under no real constraint, whether of law or conscience, to rule them well. His rule is despotic therefore, in spite of the old national and constitutional forms which he suffers to exist : it is the rule of a wise and wary, a strong and resolute, not a wanton and arbitrary despot ; it avoids the evils of irresponsible tyranny, because he who exercises it has learned to command himself as well as other men. But a change of sovereign can turn the severe and wary rule into savage licence ; and the people, who have grown up and have been educated under a loose, disorganised polity, see no difference between discipline and oppression. The constitutional effects of the Conquest are not worked out in William's reign, but in that of Henry I. The moral training of the nation does not as yet go beyond castigation : the lowest depth of humiliation has yet to be reached, but even that yields necessary lessons of its own. It is useless to ask what the result would have been if the first Norman king had been such a man as William Rufus : but it was most fortunate for the English that in the hour of their great peril, when they had neither ruler, counsel, nor system, they fell under the rule of one who was a law to himself, who saw the coincidence of duty and policy, and preferred the forms of ancient royalty to the more ostentatious position of a feudal conqueror. He was a hard man, austere, exacting, oppressive : his heavy hand made the English themselves comprehend their own national unity through a community of suffering. Yet in the suffering they were able to discern that there might be still worse things to bear : one strong master was better than many weak ones, general oppression than actual anarchy. The king made and kept good peace. The Danegeld and the Forest-law were not too much to pay for the escape from private war and feudal disruption.

General character of his government.

CHAPTER X.

POLITICAL SURVEY OF THE NORMAN PERIOD.

103. Points of contention in the Norman reigns.—104. Title of William Rufus: struggle with the feudatories.—105. Recognition of the rights of the English.—106. Absolute tyranny: in Church:—107. In State.—108. Accession of Henry I.—109. Humiliation of the feudatories.—110. Alliance of king and people.—111. Institution of strong government system.—112. Ecclesiastical policy.—113. Accession of Stephen.—114. His misgovernment.—115. The consequent anarchy.—116. Scheme of reform.

Political history of the Conqueror's reign.

103. THE political history of the Conqueror's reign consists mainly in the three great struggles with the native English, with the rebellious earls, and with the disobedient heir. The foreign wars and the constitutional measures which they involved were in close connexion with one or other of these struggles.

Struggles of the English.

In the first case William was victorious, partly through the still unbroken force of his own power as leader of the Norman host, and partly through the want of concert among his enemies. The family of Godwin, whose strength lay in the support of Welsh and Irish princes, had not a single principle in common with the remnant of the West-Saxon house, whose allies were in Scotland and Denmark. Eadric the Wild might raise Herefordshire, but he was too far away to help the men of Kent. The strong and united Norman force met them separately and crushed them in detail. The terrible vengeance wreaked on the Northumbrian population effectually prevented any further attempt at a rising, and the English found in obedience to one strong ruler a source of unity, strength, and safety, such as they had not possessed since the days of Edgar. They suffered, without power to rebel, until all the old causes of division amongst them were forgotten.

The conspiracy of the earls in A.D. 1074 begins a new page of history, and the speeches put by Ordericus Vitalis in the mouths of the conspirators give a clue to the understanding of the next century. Roger of Breteuil and Ralph Guader, the former being earl of Herefordshire, the latter of Norfolk or East-Anglia, were discontented with the ample provision that the king had made for them, and made a statement of their grievances, which the historian elaborates into a speech¹. William they said was a bastard and had seized the English crown unrighteously; he had oppressed his nobles in Normandy, despoiled the count of Mortain, poisoned the counts of Brittany and of the Vexin; he had refused to reward the followers who had fought his battles, or had given them only barren and desolate lands. The English, although they would gladly have had revenge, are described as contentedly cultivating their lands, and more intent on enjoyment than on battle. The malcontents propose to Waltheof that England should be restored to the state in which it was in King Edward's time; one of the three should be king, the other two should be dukes². Waltheof

Conspiracy of the earls.

Its object and pleas.

¹ Ord. Vit. iv. 14. 'Degener, utpote nothus, est qui rex nuncupatur, et in propatulo divinitus monstratur quod Deo displicet, dum talis herus regno praesidet. . . . Ipse Willelhum Warlengum Moritolii comitem pro uno verbo exhereditavit, et de Neustria penitus eflugavit; Walterium Pontesii comitem Edwardi regis nepotem, cum Biota uxore sua Falesiae hospitavit, et nefaria potione simul ambos una nocte peremit. Conanum quoque strenuissimum consulem veneno infecit. Haec et alia multa erga cognatos et affines suos scelera Willelnus peregit, qui super nos et compares nostros adhuc similia perpetrare non desistit. Nobile regnum Angliae temere invasit, genuinos heredes injuste trucidavit, vel in exilium crudeliter pepulit. Suos quoque adjuutores per quos super omne genus suum sublimatus est, non ut decuisset honoravit, sed multis qui sanguinem suum in ejus satellitio fuderunt ingratus evstitit, et pro frivolis occasionebus ad mortem usque velut hostes puniit. Vulneratis victoribus steriles fundos et hostium depopulatione desolatos donavit, et eisdem postmodum restauratos avaritia cogente abstulit seu minoravit. Ecee major pars exercitus trans pontum moratur, assidueque bellis acriter occupatus detinetur. Angli sua solummodo rura colunt, convivii et potationibus, non proeliis intendunt, summopere tamen pro suorum exitio parentum ultionem videre concupiscunt.'

² Ibid. 'Aequiesce nobis et indesinenter inhaere, et tertiam partem Angliae nobiscum sine dubio poteris habere. Volumus enim ut status regni Albionis redintegretur omnimodis sicut olim fuit tempore Edwardi piissimi regis. Unus ex nobis sit rex et duo sint duces et sic nobis tribus omnes Anglorum subjiciantur honores.'

Objects of the conspiracy of the earls.

declined the project, but fell a victim to the suspicious hatred of William, who spared the lives of the real offenders. The grounds of the discontent thus stated seem to include three points—the title of the king, the condition of the English, and the restrictions imposed upon the Norman vassals: and these are the very points which give interest to the history of the Norman period; for a century, no king succeeds with undisputed title; the Norman baronage is incessantly in arms in order to extend their own power, taking advantage of every quarrel, and ranging themselves with the king or against him on no principle save the desire of strengthening their own position; and the English are found by the king and his ministers to be the only trustworthy element in society, notwithstanding their sufferings and the many attempts made to draw them from their allegiance. The reign of William Rufus exhibits the several elements of disturbance in open working, and throws into light the different interests which had been operating obscurely and confusedly under the sagacious pressure of his father's hand.

Importance of the question of title in its bearings on other points of constitutional interest.

104. The question of personal title, the right to the headship of the races ruled by the Conqueror, is not directly connected with constitutional history. But its bearing on the political development of England is most important, and in its many complexities it touches the main sources of constitutional growth. The duke of the Normans had acquired the realm of England, by the gift of God, as he himself said, and by the acceptance of the English witenagemot, but directly by the arms of the Norman race. The Normans had availed themselves of William's ambition, strength, and supposititious claims as Edward's heir, and had established their hold on England; but William himself they had never loved, they despised his birth, and feared and detested the very strength which sustained them. His position as duke of the Normans had been won through rivers of blood, and by the violent extinction of every element of rivalry. England was the conquest of the race, or of a voluntary association under the head of the race. But William's hold on England could not be shaken without risking the loss of England to the race itself. And yet William had most grudgingly rewarded their aid and reluctantly acknowledged their claims. Should England and Normandy be separated, should the headship of the race continue in the progeny of the bastard, or should advantage be taken of every opportunity of raising either question, to secure more independent power to the feudatories and reduce their king-duke to the position of the king-duke of the French? On whatever plea the struggle arose, the main object of the Norman nobles was the securing of feudal power, and the unavoidable result of such a consummation would be the entire enslaving of the English. Hence it was that none of the great houses maintained a consistent policy; they none of them sincerely believed in the grounds put forth as pretexts of quarrel; but fought first on one side and then on the other, and purchased promises from either side by alternate offers of support. And the necessary result of this was their own destruction. In such a struggle royalty must win in the end, and whichever of the competitors for it ultimately succeeds will take care to make his position safe against such uncertain friends and such certain foes.

The great vassals take advantage of every question of royal title.

The conspiracy of A.D. 1074 is the first epoch of the struggle; the last of the English earls perished in consequence, and the first of the Norman earls suffered forfeiture. The long series of humiliations which they brought upon themselves began. They had asserted the right of the race and the deserts of the confederacy. The rebellion of Robert followed in A.D. 1078; he claimed the Norman duchy by his father's gift, and was supported by four of the greatest barons of the new aristocracy, Robert of Belesme, William of Breteuil, Roger of Bienfaite, and Robert Mowbray, the heirs of William's oldest and most trusted ministers¹. That rebellion was quelled, and without much bloodshed or confiscation, though the king did not feel himself secure without imprisoning and dispossessing his brother Odo of Rebellion of Robert.

He is supported by the younger men.

¹ Robert of Belesme was son of Roger Montgomery, earl of Shrewsbury; William of Breteuil, son of William Fitz-Osbern; Roger of Bienfaite, son of Richard and grandson of Gilbert of Brionne, the Conqueror's guardian; Robert Mowbray was nephew and heir of Bishop Gosfrid of Coutances: all trusted ministers of William, three of whom had actually been justiciars, or royal lieutenants. Ord. Vit. v. 10.

William's
retr. spect on his deathbed.

Bayeux : and the war that was kindled by it opened the way for the aggression of the French king which William was engaged in repelling at the time of his death. His confession on his death-bed, if actually made as related by Ordericus, is one of the most singular monuments of history. He looked back for fifty-six years on Normandy, and recounted what he suffered at the hand of his enemies and how he had repaid them. He looked forward also, and augured of the future ; but he did not attempt to do violence to destiny. Robert must have Normandy ; William he wished, but dared not command, should have England ; Henry he was sure would have all in the end. His experience suggested much misgiving, but furnished no means of directing the future. He saw the struggle that must come as soon as his death opened the question ¹.

Robert's claim on England
defeated.

The claim of Robert to the whole of his father's dominions was taken up by the restless barons at once : far the larger part adhered to him, especially his father's brothers Odo of Bayeux and Robert of Mortain ; also Gosfrid of Coutances, Robert Mowbray and Roger Montgomery : indeed, all the princes of the Conquest except the earl of Chester and William of Warenne ². William overcame the opposition, but was not yet strong enough to punish it. The only great forfeiture was Odo's earldom of Kent. Seven years later an attempt was made to get rid altogether of the Conqueror's heirs, and to assert for Count Stephen of Aumâle, the grandson of duke Robert the Second ³, the headship of the race ⁴.

Stephen of Aumâle set up against William
Rufus.

¹ Ord. Vit. vii. 15, 16.

² Ordericus mentions, as taking part in the first rising on Robert's behalf, Bishop Odo, Eustace of Boulogne, Robert of Belesme, and his father Roger Montgomery (secretly), Hugh of Grantmesnil, and Bernard of Neufmarché ; lib. viii. c. 2. Florence adds Gosfrid of Coutances, Robert of Mortain, and Robert Mowbray, the last of whom is placed by Ordericus on the side of William Rufus, and the bishop of Durham. On the king's side were Hugh of Chester, William of Warenne, and Robert Fitz-Hamon ; but the mainstay of the party was Lanfranc.

³ Odo of Aumâle was married to a sister of the Conqueror, who is said distinctly by Ordericus to have been daughter of duke Robert and Harlotta (lib. iv. c. 7). The Continuator of William of Jumièges (ed. Camden, p. 687) calls her the uterine sister of the Conqueror ; it is impossible that the Normans should have accepted the idea of electing an entire stranger to the ducal house.

⁴ The heads of this revolt were, according to Florence, Robert Mowbray

This also failed, and was followed by considerable but still cautious forfeitures; the great earl Robert Mowbray of Northumberland lost his liberty and estates; Roger de Lacy was deprived of his hundred and sixteen manors, the earl of Shrewsbury paid an enormous fine, count William of Eu was mutilated. A great gap was already made in the phalanx of the feudatories; the death of William stayed but did not avert the destruction of the rest.

105. But far more important in principle than the demolition of the single feudatories is the relation created and strengthened between the king and the native English. The Conqueror's last wish for the disposal of England was confided to Lanfranc, as the head of the witenagemot of the kingdom: and Lanfranc proceeded to secure the fulfilment of it in such a constitutional way as lay open to him, when the majority of the baronage were inclining to duke Robert. William was ready to make any promise to secure his crown. He swore to Lanfranc that if he were made king he would preserve justice and equity and mercy throughout the realm, would defend against all men the peace, liberty, and security of the churches, and would in all things and through all things comply with his precepts and counsels¹. On this understanding Lanfranc crowned him and received the formal enunciation of the engagement in the coronation oaths. The outbreak of war immediately after forced from him another acknowledgment of his duty. He found Lanfranc his ablest adviser, Wulfstan his most energetic supporter; he called the English together, declared to them the treason of the Normans, and begged their aid. If they would assist him and be faithful in this need, he would grant them a better law of their own choosing; he forbade on the instant all unjust taxation, and in the time of rebellion.

The people are thrown on the side of the crown.

Promise of William Rufus: at his coronation;

earl of Northumberland, and William count of Eu. Orderic adds Roger de Lacy and earl Hugh of Shrewsbury. Ord. Vit. viii. 23.

¹ 'Verens ne dilatio consecrationis suae inferret ei dispendium cupiti honoris, coepit, tam per se quam per omnes quos poterat, fide sacramentoque Lanfranco promittere justitiam, æquitatem et misericordiam se per totum regnum, si rex foret, in omni negotio servaturum; pacem, libertatem, securitatem ecclesiarum contra omnes defensurum; necnon praeceptis atque consiliis ejus per omnia et in omnibus obtemperaturum.' Eadmer, Hist. Nov. i. p. 14.

Promises of William
Rufus:

during his illness.

surrendered his hold on their forests¹. The English too willingly believed him, and throwing themselves with energy into the struggle, brought it to a successful issue. The king forgot his promises, and, when reminded of them by Lanfranc, answered in wrath, 'Who is there who can fulfil all that he promises?' Lanfranc's death removed his best counsellor, and he began to act with unrestrained and wanton tyranny. A third time, in A.D. 1093, when he either believed himself to be dying or wished to purchase a reprieve by repentance, he made a formal declaration, pledging his faith and making the bishops the sureties between himself and his God, sending them to make the promises for him before the altar. A written proclamation was made and sealed, all prisoners were to be released, all debts pardoned, and all offences forgiven and forgotten. To all the people moreover were promised good and holy laws, the inviolable observance of right, and a severe examination into wrongs such as should frighten all men from evil-doing¹. The king recovered, but behaved worse than ever².

¹ Of this second formal engagement to govern well we have four accounts. (1) Florence says: 'Congregato vero quantum ad praesens poterat Normannorum, sed tamen maxime Anglorum, equestri et pedestri licet mediocri exercitu, statuens leges, promittens fautoribus omnia bona . . . tendere disposuit Roveceastram.' (2) Simeon of Durham: 'Hoc audito rex fecit convocare Anglos et ostendit eis traditionem Normannorum et rogavit ut sibi auxilio essent, eo tenore ut, si in hac necessitate sibi fideles existerent, meliorem legem quam vellent exigere eis concederet, et omnem injustum scottum interdixit et concessit omnibus silvas suas et venationem. Sed quicquid promisit parvo tempore custodivit. Angli tamen fideliter eum juvabant.' (3) William of Malmesbury, G. R. iv. § 306: 'Videns Normannos pene omnes in una rabie conspiratos, Anglos probos et fortes viros qui adhuc residui erant, invitatoriis scriptis accersit; quibus super injuriis suis querimoniam faciens, bonasque leges et tributorum levamen liberasque venationes pollicens, fidelitati suae obligavit . . . Anglos suos appellat; jubet ut compatriotas advocent ad obsidionem venire, nisi si qui velint sub nomine Nothing, quod nequam sonat, remanere. Angli qui nihil miserius putarent quam hujusce vocabuli dedecore aduri, catervatim ad regem confluent et invincibilem exercitum faciunt.' (4) Ordericus, viii. 2: 'Lanfrancum itaque archiepiscopum cum suffraganeis praesulibus, comites, Anglosque naturales convocavit, et conatus adversariorum ac velle suum expugnandi eos indicavit. At illi regem, ut perturbatores pacis comprimeret adhortati sunt, seseque promptissimos ad adjuvandum polliciti sunt. Anglorum vero triginta millia tunc ad servitium regis sponte sua convenerunt, regemque ut perfidos proditores absque respectu puniret adnuenerunt, dicentes "Viriliter age ut regis filius et legitime ad regnum assumptus, securus in hoc regno dominare omnibus. Nonne vides quot tecum sumus, tibi que gratanter paremus? Passim per totam Albionem impera omnesque rebelles dejice regali justitia. Usque ad mortem pro te certabimus, nec unquam tibi alium praeponemus. Stultum nimis et profanum noto regi praeferre hostem extraneum. Detestabilis gens est quae principi suo infida est. Phalanx morti sit vicina quae domini sui gaudet ruina. Solerter Anglorum rimare historias, inveniesque semper fidos principibus suis Angligenas."'

The acknowledgments of his duty were however not without their value. The charter, if it ever existed, was lost, and the benefits it promised were withheld. The quarrel with the Church followed, and the wretched king cast away even the outward observance of morality and religion. But he had testified to the nation his own duty and their right. He had revealed to them their moral and material strength at the same time. Fear of man and dread of God's present judgment forced him to the promise which was a confession of justice, and placed means in their hands which would set their rights on a firmer basis than the conscience of a tyrant. If the reign of William Rufus had no other importance, it taught a lesson of profoundly valuable consequence to his successor.

Value of these acknowledgments of duty.

106. It is not easy at first sight to determine exactly the particular measures by which, in spite of his professions of good government and the support which he purchased by them, William Rufus earned the detestation of all classes of his subjects. The historians describe him as a strong, fierce, and arrogant man, of abandoned habits, cruel, profane, and avaricious;

Special acts of tyranny of William Rufus.

¹ Florence says: 'Cum se putaret cito moriturum, ut ei sui barones suggesserunt, vitam suam corrigere, ecclesias non amplius vendere nec ad census ponere, sed illas regia tueri potestate, irrectas leges destruere ac rectas statuere Deo promisit.' Eadmer, Hist. Nov. i. p. 16: 'Adquiescit ipse, et corde compunctus cuncta quae viri sententia tulit se facturum necnon totam vitam suam in mansuetudine et justitia amplius servaturum pollicetur. Spondet in hoc fidem suam, et vades inter se et Deum facit episcopos suos, mittens qui hoc votum suum Deo super altare sua vice promittant. Scribitur edictum regioque sigillo firmatur, quatenus captivi quicumque sunt in omni dominatione sua relaxentur, omnia debita irrevocabiliter remittantur, omnes offensiones ante haec perpetratae indulta remissione perpetuae oblivioni tradantur. Promittuntur insuper omni populo bonae et sanctae leges, inviolabilis observatio juris, injuriarum gravis et quae terreat caeteros examinatio.'

² 'Willelmus in principio infirmus laboriosiusque imperaret, et ad conciliandos sibi animos subditorum modestior mitiorque appareret. At postquam, perdomitis hostibus et fratre mollius agente, roboratum est regnum ejus, exaltatum est illico cor ejus, apparuitque succedentibus prosperis qualis apud se latuisset dum premeretur adversis.' Will. Newb. i. 2.

but their general declamatory tone hides rather than reveals the constitutional grievances, except where they touched the Church. We may however, by comparing the remedial measures of Henry I with what is known of the law and custom of the Conqueror's reign, form some idea of the nature of the tyranny of William Rufus. Ranulf Flambard, an able and unprincipled clerk, who had been long acquainted with England¹, and was restrained by no sympathies with either the Norman nobles, the native population, or the clergy, was after the death of Lanfranc taken by the king into his confidence. Whether or not it is fair to ascribe to Ranulf the suggestion of the tyrannical policy which marks the reign, it is to him without doubt that the systematic organisation of the exactions is to be attributed. He possessed, as the king's justiciar, the management of all the fiscal and judicial business of the kingdom, and seems to have exercised the functions of his office with indefatigable zeal. William, on the other hand, although an able soldier and not deficient in political craft, has left no traces of administrative power such as mark the rule of his father and brother.

Ranulf's policy seems to have been to tighten as much as possible the hold which the feudal law gave to the king on all feudatories temporal and spiritual, taking the fullest advantage of every opportunity, and delaying by unscrupulous chicanery the determination of every dispute. In ecclesiastical matters this plan was systematically pursued. The analogy of lay fiefs was applied to the churches with as much minuteness as was possible. The feudal relation had been recognised in the Conqueror's reign, the great question of investitures being set aside by the mutual good understanding of king and primate; but the obligation was liberally construed on both sides. Lanfranc did his duty as a great noble, and William contented himself with the constitutional claims to which the earlier system had regarded the archbishop as liable. No advantage was taken of the vacancies of sees or abbeys to draw the

Administration of Ra-nulf Flambard.

In ecclesiastical matters.

¹ See Chap. XI, pp. 347, 348, below.

revenues of the Church into the royal treasury, or by prolonging Prolongation of vacancies. the vacancy to increase the accumulations on which the king might lay his hand; on the contrary, we are distinctly informed that the revenues of the vacant churches were collected and preserved in safe custody for the new prelate, and that the elections were not unduly postponed¹. The elections were themselves scarcely canonical, but all difficulties were avoided by Lanfranc, who suggested the best men to the king for that formal nomination which had taken the place of election.

Ranulf Flambard saw no other difference between an ecclesiastical and a lay fief than the superior facilities which the Churches treated as lay fecs. first gave for extortion; the dead bishop left no heir who could importunately insist on receiving seisin of his inheritance; and it was in his master's power to determine how soon or at what price an heir should be created and admitted. The vacancies of the churches were prolonged indefinitely, in spite of canon and custom; their property was taken into the king's hands and administered by his officers just as the barony of a ward of the crown might be; and all proceeds were claimed for the king. Not only so; the lands were let out on farm², a large fine paid down at once, and a small rent promised for the future: the king secured the fine, the bishop might or might not recover the rent. Further, the longer the vacancy lasted the less chance there was of redress being enforced when it was at last filled up; the king could even grant away the lands of the Church as hereditary fiefs to his knights, and refuse to admit a new bishop until he had promised to ratify his gifts. Lastly, he might demand of the new bishop such a payment on entry as gave to the whole transaction a simoniacal complexion, on the analogy of the relief payable by the heir of a lay fief¹. All these claims were contrary to the terms on which the endowments of the Church had been granted; but they were in accord to a certain extent with the feudal spirit now introduced into the country, and the very fact that they were made shows how strongly that spirit had made itself felt. The Church was open to these claims because she furnished no opportunity for reliefs, wardships, marriage, escheat, or forfeiture².

¹ W. Malmesb. iv. § 314: 'Tempore patris post decessum episcopi vel abbatis omnes redditus integre custodiebantur, substituendo pastori resignandi, eligebanturque personae religionis merito laudabiles.' See also Ord. Vit. viii. 8, who distinctly charges Ranulf Flambard with introducing the evil custom.

² 'Ad censum primitus abbatias, dehinc episcopatus, quorum patres e vita discesserant noviter, accepit a rege et inde singulis annis summam pecunie non modicam persolvit illi.' Flor. Wig. A.D. 1100.

Treatment
of feudal vassals by William
Rufus.

107. From the treatment of the churches conversely the treatment of the feudal landowners may be inferred: and the charter of Henry I confirms the inference; although it is not quite so clear as in the former case that all the evil customs owed their origin to the reign of William Rufus. On the death of a vassal the heir was not admitted until he paid such relief as the king would accept³; the amount demanded was sometimes so great as to equal the value of the property; the estate might therefore be altogether resumed, or it might be retained in the king's hands as long as he pleased: and this shameless exercise of power was aggravated by the practice of disregarding the testamentary disposition of the vassal, so as to leave his family pauperised⁴. The right of marriage, that is, of consenting to the marriage of the daughters of vassals, was interpreted to mean the right to exact a sum of money for consent⁵: if the marriage in question were that of an heiress or widow, the king disposed of it without any reference to the will of the

¹ Henry's promises in his charter prove the existence of all these exactions under his brother: 'Sanctam Dei ecclesiam imprimis liberam facio, ita quod nec vendam, nec ad firmam ponam, nec mortuo archiepiscopo sive episcopo sive abbate aliquid accipiam de dominico ecclesie vel de hominibus ejus donec successor in eam ingreditur.'

² 'He desired to be the heir of every one, churchman or layman.' Chron. Sax. A.D. 1100.

³ Art. 2 of Henry's charter: 'Si quis . . . mortuus fuerit, heres suus non redimet terram suam sicut faciebat tempore fratris mei.' See Ord. Vit. viii. 8.

⁴ See Henry's charter, art. 7: 'Si quis baronum vel hominum meorum infirmabitur, sicut ipse dabit vel dare disponet pecuniam suam, ita datam esse concedo. Quod si ipse praeventus armis vel infirmitate, pecuniam suam non dederit vel dare disposuerit, uxor sua sive liberi aut parentes, et legitimi homines ejus eam pro anima ejus dividant, sicut eis melius visum fuerit.'

⁵ See art. 3 of Henry's charter.

bride or her relations. The right of wardship was asserted unrestrictedly. The amercements for offences were arbitrary : a vassal might be accused of crime and find himself liable to forfeiture, or to give such security as made him constantly amenable to forfeiture¹. In all these points the royal claims were unrelentingly pressed. Indefiniteness of the royal claims.

Not less heavy was the king's hand on the body of the people. On them in the first instance fell the burden of the imposts laid on their feudal masters. It was from them, by similar exactions of reliefs, wardship, marriage, and forfeitures, that the vassals raised money to redeem their own rights : every wrong that the king inflicted on his vassals they might inflict on theirs. But the king too had a direct hold on them ; he demanded the old tribute, the hateful Danegeld : he had the power to insist on their military service, and did so : on one occasion Ranulf brought down a great force of the fyrd to Hastings, and there took from them the money that the shires had furnished them with, the ten shillings for maintenance, and sent them penniless home². He took advantage of the simple machinery of justice to tax them further. Ranulf was not only the 'exactor' of all the business of the kingdom, but the 'placitator' also. 'He drove and commanded all his gemots over all England³.' His management broke up for a time the old arrangements of the hundred and shire-moots, making them mere engines of extortion, so that men rather acquiesced in wrong than sought redress at such a price. It is probable further that the assemblies which met on these occasions were turned to profit, being forced or persuaded to give sums towards the king's necessities. The subordinates of the court followed the example of their chief ; no man was safe against them ; the poor man was not protected by his poverty, nor the rich

¹ See art. 8 of Henry's charter.

² 'Quibus ut mare transirent Heastingae congregatis, pecuniam quae data fuerat eis ad victum Rannulfus Passeflambardus praecepto regis abstulit, scilicet unicuique decem solidos, et eos domum repedare mandavit, pecuniam vero regi transmisit.' Flor. Wig. A.D. 1094.

³ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1099. On the justiciarship in the hands of Ranulf, see further, Chap. XI, below.

Story of the new survey.

by his abundance¹. The very recent Domesday taxation was, we are told, superseded by a new valuation; the old English hide was cut down to the acreage of the Norman carucate²: and thus estates were curtailed and taxation increased at the same time. Whether the charge is definitely true may be questioned, for the testimony of Ordericus is not confirmed by distinct statements of the English annalists; but it is not improbable; and the burden was but one of many. The forest law or lawlessness now comes into marked prominence. William the Conqueror had afforested and desolated large territories for the chase. His son made the practice burdensome to baron and villein alike; a vexation to the one, destruction and extermination to the other. Unrestrained by religion, by principle, or by policy, with no family interests to limit his greed, extravagance, or hatred of his kind, a foul incarnation of selfishness in its most abhorrent form, the enemy of God and man, William Rufus gave to England and Christendom a pattern of absolutism. It is only to be ascribed to the weakness and disunion of those whom he wronged that he burdened the throne and nation for twelve long years of misery.

Forest oppressions.

Death of William
Rufus.

108. The great question whether England should or should

¹ On the enormities of the king's followers, who made his progresses through the country resemble the march of a devastating army, see W. Malmesb. G.R. iv. §§ 314, 319; Eadmer, iv. p. 94; Ord. Vit. viii. 4.

² Ord. Vit. viii. 8. 'Hic juvenem fraudulentis stimulationibus inquietavit regem, incitans ut totius Angliæ reviseret descriptionem, Angliæque telluris comprobans iteraret partitionem, subditisque recideret tam advenis quam indigenis quicquid inveniretur ultra certam dimensionem. Annuente rege omnes carrucas, quas Angli hidas vocant, funiculo mensus est et descripsit: postpositisque mensuris quas liberales Angli jussu Edwardi regis largiter distribuerant, immunit, et regales fiscos accumulans colonis arva retruncavit. Ruris itaque olim diutius nacti diminutione et insoliti vectigalis gravi exaggeratione, supplices regiæ fidelitati plebes indecenter oppressit, ablatis rebus attenuavit, et in nimiam egestatem de ingenti copia redegit.' Palgrave, Normandy and England, gives an elaborate amplification of this story, explaining that whereas the productive value of the land was the basis of the earlier system of rating, Ranulf introduced a simple computation of acreage. (Vol. iv. pp. 59-63.) The words of Ordericus will scarcely bear this. Possibly he may refer to a substitution of the short hundred for the long in the reckoning of the hide of land: but it is more probable that the whole story is a misapprehension, and is to be referred to the Domesday Survey, in which Ranulf seems most likely to have taken a part. See p. 348, below.

not be ruled by the head of the Norman race was decided by the promptness of Henry in his own favour. Robert continued indeed to represent to the mind of the feudatories the principle of the Conquest; by the treaty arranged at Caen in A.D. 1091 he was entitled, as far as William's power of disposition went, to the succession: he had received the homage of his brother and of the great barons of the kingdom, and he had few personal enemies. But he was far away from England at the critical moment; his right to the crown had been disregarded by his father in his settlement of his estates; he had grievously mismanaged the government of Normandy, and if he had few enemies he had still fewer friends who would imperil themselves for a prince who might be prompt only to avenge them. Henry was on the spot. The opportunity that a seeming accident supplied he had energy to seize and courage and counsel to improve. The very suddenness of William's death precluded the possibility of preparation on either side. This he turned to profit. The kingdom was taken by surprise, and when the world knew that William was dead, it knew that Henry had succeeded him.

Succession
of Henry I.

The accession of Henry was transacted with as much deference to national precedent as was possible consistently with his purpose. Among the few barons who were in attendance on William on the day of his death were the two Beaumonts, the earl of Warwick and the count of Meulan, Robert Fitz-Hamon and William of Breteuil¹. The last of these made a bold claim on behalf of Robert, but was overruled by the others²; the form of election was hastily gone through by the barons on the spot; and the seizure of the royal hoard in the castle of Winchester placed in the hands of Henry the means of securing his advantage³. His first act was to bestow the vacant see of Winchester

Formality of his election.

¹ Ordericus mentions Robert of Meulan and William of Breteuil; lib. x. c. 14. William of Malmesbury mentions the exertions of Henry of Warwick on Henry's behalf; G. R. v. § 393.

² Ord. Vit. x. 14.

³ William 'was slain on a Thursday and buried the next morning; and after he was buried, the witan who were then near at hand chose his brother Henry as king, and he forthwith gave the bishopric of Winchester to William Giffard, and then went to London.' Chron. Sax. A.D. 1100.

Election and coronation of Henry I, A.D. 1100.

on William Giffard the chancellor, so providing himself with a strong supporter in the episcopal body. He then hastened to London, where a few prelates and other nobles were found, who after some discussion determined to accept him as king. The seizure of the royal treasure on Thursday, August 2, was followed by the coronation on the Sunday, August 5. On that day a comprehensive charter of liberties was published, and Anselm was recalled. Shortly after Ranulf Flambard was imprisoned, and before the end of the year the marriage of the king with the daughter of Malcolm and Margaret completed the consolidation of the title by which he intended to reign.

His marriage.

The election was however no mere form. Even in the handful of barons who were present there were divisions and questionings, which were allayed, as we are told, by the arguments of the earl of Warwick¹. The oaths taken by Ethelred were also required of Henry: the form of his coronation has been preserved, and it contains the threefold promise of peace, justice, and equity². In the letter written by the newly-crowned king to Anselm to recall him to England and to account for the rite of coronation being performed in his absence, Henry states that he has been chosen by the clergy and people of England, and repeats to the archbishop the engagement that his brother had made with Lanfranc: 'Myself and the people of the whole realm of England I commit to your counsel and that of those who ought with you to counsel me.'³ The undertaking to govern

His coronation oath.

His letter to Anselm.

¹ 'In regem electus est, aliquantis tamen ante controversiis inter proceres agitatatis atque sopitis, annitente maxime comite Warwicensi Henrico.' W. Malnesb. G. R. v. § 393.

² Taylor's Glory of Regality, pp. 245, 330; Maskell, Mon. Rit. iii. 5, 6. The oath is as follows: 'In Christi Nomine promitto haec tria populo Christiano mihi subdito. In primis, me praecepturum et operam pro viribus impensurum ut ecclesia Dei et omnis populus Christianus veram pacem nostro arbitrio in omni tempore servet; aliud ut rapacitates et omnes iniquitates omnibus gradibus interdiciam; tertium ut in omnibus judiciis aequitatem et misericordiam praecipiam, ut mihi et vobis indulgeat suam misericordiam clemens et misericors Deus.' See above, p. 147.

³ It is printed among Anselm's letters; lib. iii. Ep. 41: 'Ego nutu Dei a clero et a populo Angliae electus, et, quamvis invitus propter absentiam tui, rex jam consecratus, requiro te sicut patrem cum omni populo Angliae, quatenus mihi filio tuo et eidem populo ejus tibi animarum cura commissa est quam citius poteris venias ad consulendum. Meipsum quidem ac totius

well was made not only with the archbishop as the first constitutional adviser of the crown, but with the whole nation : it was embodied in a charter addressed to all the faithful, and attested by the signatures of the witan, the paucity of whose names may perhaps indicate the small number of powerful men who had as yet adhered to him,—the bishops of London and Rochester, the elect of Winchester, the earls of Warwick and Northampton, and four barons¹. The form of the charter forcibly declares the ground which he was taking : ‘ Know ye that by the mercy of God and the common counsel of the barons of the whole reahn of England I have been crowned king of the same realm².’ The abuses of the late reign are specified and forbidden for the future. The Church is made free from all the unjust exactions ; and the kingdom from the evil customs : to the English people are restored the laws of King Edward with the Conqueror’s amendments ; the feudal innovations, inordinate and arbitrary reliefs and amercements, the abuse of the rights of wardship and marriage, the despotic interference with testamentary disposition, all of which had been common in the last reign, are renounced ; and, as a special boon to tenants by knight-service, their demesne lands are freed from all demands except service in the field. To the whole nation is promised peace and good coinage : the debts due to William Rufus, and the murder-fines incurred before the day of coronation, are forgiven. But the forests, as they were in the Conqueror’s time, are retained by the king with the common consent of his barons³. Perhaps the most significant articles of the whole document are those by which he provides that the benefit of the feudal concessions shall not be engrossed by the tenants in chief : ‘ in like manner shall the men of my barons relieve their lands at the hand of

Charter of Henry I.

Privileges of the Church,

of the vassals,

and of the nation.

regni Angliæ populum tuo eorumque consilio qui tecum mihi consulere debent committo.

¹ The four barons are Walter Giffard, Robert de Montfort, Roger Bigot, and Henry de Port. The letter to Anselm furnishes the additional names of Gerard bishop of Hereford, William Warelwast, Robert Fitz-Hamon, and Haimo dapifer.

² Ancient Laws, ed. Thorpe, p. 215 ; Select Charters, p. 96.

³ Art. 10. ‘ Forestas communi consensu baronum meorum in manu mea retinui, sicut pater meus eas habuit.’

Henry I provides for the extension of his reforms to the nation at large.

their lords by a just and lawful relief; 'in like manner I enjoin that my barons restrain themselves in dealing with the sons and daughters and wives of their men'.¹ The rights of the classes that had taken the oath of fealty to the Conqueror at Salisbury are thus guarded, and Henry whilst attempting, by granting special boons to each order in the state, to secure the good-will of all, definitely commits himself to the duties of a national king. He was the native king, born on English soil, son of the king, not merely, like Robert and William, of the duke of the Normans. The return of Anselm, the punishment of Flambard, and the royal marriage² were earnestness of what was to result from the government so claimed and so inaugurated.

Struggle with Duke Robert.

109. But these measures had scarcely been completed when duke Robert returned from the Holy Land; the echoes of the investiture controversy in the empire were already sounding in the distance, and the great feudatories in Normandy as well as in England were preparing for a trial of strength. The quarrel with Robert broke out early in A.D. 1101. Henry threw himself on the support of the English³, Robert availed himself of the discontent of the feudatories and invaded England. But when the armies stood face to face the brothers saw that the fruits of victory must fall to those whose strength would be the destruction of the victor, and that the time was not come for a struggle which would make either of them supreme. The count of Meulan proposed peace, and peace was made. Robert recognised Henry as king and released him from his fealty. Henry undertook to pay Robert a heavy pension, and restored to him the Côtentin, the Norman district which he had purchased of him in his great necessity. In A.D. 1104 the quarrel was renewed. Robert had again proved himself to be neither wise enough nor strong enough to govern the Normans, and Henry appeared in Normandy as a deliverer. But again the struggle was settled without bloodshed. Robert transferred to his brother the homage of the count of Evreux and Henry was satisfied¹. The next year, finding his Norman estates imperilled by the irrepressible allies of Robert, he again crossed the sea and added Caen and Bayeux to his possessions², leaving Robert on his return destitute alike of funds and supporters. In A.D. 1106 Robert made an attempt to avert his final fall, and visited England; but it was in vain, Henry followed him home, and the battle of Tenchebrai in the summer of the same year made him supreme in Normandy as in England³. The point at issue from the beginning had not been the English crown, but the power of enforcing obedience on those Norman barons without whose submission neither country could be at peace. From A.D. 1106 to 1118 the struggle lay between them and Henry. In the latter year the young heir of Normandy, with the aid of the king of France and the counts of Flanders and Anjou, made a bold stroke for his rights, which was defeated by the policy and good-fortune of his uncle⁴. Again in A.D. 1127 his name was made the watchword of a renewed struggle⁵; but his early death set Henry at rest, and for the remainder of his reign he ruled without fear of a rival. In England his position had been determined since the year 1103: but the battle which was fought out on Norman

¹ Art. 2. 'Similiter et homines baronum meorum justa et legitima relevatione relevabunt terras suas de dominis suis.' Art. 4. 'Et praecepto quod barones mei similiter se continent erga filios et filias vel uxores hominum suorum.'

² The historians of the time do not dwell much on the political importance of the marriage, although it kept England and Scotland in peace for nearly two centuries; and to a certain extent tended to restore the nationality of the royal house. That the latter point was not overlooked at the time seems clear from William of Malmesbury's story that the Norman barons spoke in derision of the king and queen as Godric and Godgift. G. R. v. § 394.

³ 'Licet principibus deficientibus partes ejus solidae manebant, quas Anselmi archiepiscopi cum episcopis suis simul et omnium Anglorum tutabatur favor. Quapropter ipse provincialium fidei gratus et saluti providus, plerumque cunctos circumiens, docebat quomodo militum ferociam eludentes elyptos objectarent et ictus remitterent; quo effectus ut ultroneis votis pugnam deprecarent, in nullo Normannis metuentes.' W. Malmesh. G. R. v. § 395. 'Venerabilis Anselmus archiepiscopus et omnes episcopi et abbates cum sacro clero, et omnes Angli indissolubiliter regi suo adhaerebant, et pro ejus salute regnique statu Regem Sabaoth incessanter orabant. . . . Omnes quoque Angli alterius principis jura nescientes in sui regis fidelitate perstiterunt pro qua certamen inire satis optaverunt.'—Ord. Vit. x. 18. See too the speech ascribed to Henry in 1106, before the campaign of Tenchebrai, in M. Paris, p. 62.

The struggle averted.

It is renewed in 1104.

Final overthrow of Robert.

Claims of William the son of Robert.

¹ Ord. Vit. xi. 10.

² Flor. Wig. A.D. 1105; Ord. Vit. xi. 17.

³ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1106.

⁴ Hen. Hunt. (ed. Savile), fol. 218; Ord. Vit. xii. 1.

⁵ Ord. Vit. xii. 45.

soil concerned the kingdom scarcely less closely than the duchy, and every step was marked by an advance in the consolidation of the royal power, by the humiliation of some great vassal, or the resumption of some great estate.

Humiliation of the baron-age.

The process was begun immediately after Robert's departure in A.D. 1101. Robert Malet and Robert de Lacy forfeited their great estates in Yorkshire and Suffolk¹. Ivo of Grantmesnil, who has the evil reputation of being the first to introduce the horrors of private warfare into England, was suffered to go on pilgrimage, having divested himself of all his fiefs in favour of the count of Meulan². Robert of Belesme, earl of Shrewsbury and Arundel and count of Ponthieu and Alençon, was summoned to answer an indictment of forty-five articles in the king's court³. He was the son of Roger of Montgomery, the Conqueror's friend, and had been in arms on the side of duke Robert in the last two reigns: he was an utterly selfish tyrant of the worst feudal stamp, cruel, faithless, and oppressive. He determined to resist, fortified his castles of Shrewsbury, Bridgnorth, and Arundel, and was only reduced by the king himself, who brought the whole force of the nation against him. His life was spared, but his English domains were confiscated⁴, and he retired to Normandy, where he lived to do more mischief still. His downfall was regarded by the English with great delight: the cry was, 'Rejoice King Henry and thank the Lord God, for you became a free king on the day when you conquered and banished Robert of Belesme⁵.' He had not however yet accomplished his destiny. Having helped to provoke the invasion of A.D. 1104, and tried to make a separate peace in A.D. 1105, he escaped capture at Tenchebrai and submitted.

Resistance of Robert of Belesme.

His estates confiscated.

Joy of the English.

¹ Ord. Vit. xi. 1. Ilbert de Lacy, the father of Robert, had 164 manors in the Domesday Survey; Robert Malet had 221 in Suffolk; Dugd. Baron. p. 111.

² Ord. Vit. xi. 2. This fact recorded of Ivo is of considerable importance. 'Ivonem quoque, quia guerram in Anglia cooperat et vicinorum rura suorum incendio combusserat, quod in illa regione crimen est inusitatum, nec sine gravi ultione sit expiatum.'

³ Ord. Vit. xi. 3; Flor. Wig. A.D. 1101, 1102.

⁴ Ord. Vit. xi. 3.

⁵ Ord. Vit. xi. 3: 'Gaude rex Henrice, Dominoque Deo gratias age, quia tu libere coepisti regnare ex quo Rodbertum de Belisino vicisti et de finibus regni tui expulisti.'

But in A.D. 1112 he rebelled, was arrested, and remained captive until his death¹. Among the forfeitures of A.D. 1102 was also William of Warenne, earl of Surrey, who however was afterwards restored²; Arnulf of Montgomery and Roger of Poitou shared the fate of their brother in A.D. 1103 and lost their English fiefs³; and thus fell the greatest and most thoroughly representative of the Conquest families.

Forfeitures of minor vassals.

From A.D. 1103 onwards the battle of English liberty was fought in Normandy. The penalty for rebellion there took the form of confiscation of the English fiefs belonging to the rebels, and each rising left the king richer and stronger, the feudatories more and more depressed. Of the great families which were endowed on both sides of the channel, the earls of Chester alone were unswerving in their faith to the king; some even of the Beaumonts, after the death of Count Robert of Meulan, fell away; although the earls of Leicester and Warwick remained faithful⁴. But Henry's cautious statesmanship led him to make an important distinction between the Norman and English fiefs. In the latter case he enforced entire forfeiture, whether the rebellion had taken place on Norman or on English soil. In the former he contented himself with garrisoning the castles of the delinquents, so as, without rendering them desperate, to deprive them of the means of being dangerous. In accordance with this policy, he abstained from confiscating the Norman estates of Robert of Belesme, and allowed his son William Talvas to possess them after his father's death⁵. An exception of the feudat-ories in Normandy.

Humiliation

Difference of Henry's policy in England and Normandy.

¹ Hen. Hunt. fol. 217.

² Ord. Vit. x. 18; xi. 2.

³ Ord. Vit. xi. 3. Roger of Poitou had 398 manors in the Domesday Survey. He had great part of Lancashire, and was first of the long line of lords of Lancaster. Both the brothers are called earls by Ordericus, lib. v. c. 14. Arnulf's fief was the castle of Pembroke and its dependencies.

⁴ Earl Robert, who died in 1118, left twin sons, Robert earl of Leicester, and Waleran count of Meulan. The latter took up arms against Henry in 1123, and was imprisoned. Henry earl of Warwick, brother of Robert I, died in 1123; his son Roger was now earl.

⁵ Ord. Vit. xii. 15. This was after the peace of A.D. 1119. Henry retained the castles in his own hands. This, as I have remarked more than once, was one of the great features of the royal policy in Normandy. Abbot Suger says: 'Fere omnes turres et quaecunque fortissima castra Normanniæ, quae pars est Galliae, aut eversum iri fecit, aut suos intrudens et de proprio aerario procurans, aut si dirutae essent propriae voluntati subjugavit.' V. Ludovici Grossi, § 15.

Henry's rigour with his own kinsmen.

to the rule however was made in the cases in which the rebels were members or connexions of the ducal house; the count of Mortain and Eustace of Breteuil forfeited all their estates¹; but in general Henry seems to have thought that it was safer to keep a material hold on the traitors, than by driving them to extremities to throw them into the hands of the king of France as suzerain, or array them on the side of his brother and nephew. In England, where his title was not really endangered, he could act differently, and employ the great territories which he accumulated in the endowment of a new and more faithful race of vassals. The seizure and retention of the Norman castles is thus the supplement to the measure of reducing the power of the feudatories which in England was carried out by confiscation.

Landmarks of the reign
of Henry I.

The great crises of Henry's reign, after the battle of Tenchebrai, are the rebellion which followed the death of the count of Evreux in A.D. 1118², the loss of the heir in the terrible shipwreck of A.D. 1120, and the revolt of Count Waleran of Meulan in A.D. 1123³. It was not until a few years before his death that he saw himself free from a competitor in the duchy of Normandy, and his last years were embittered by the uncertainty of the succession. By compelling the barons and bishops to swear fealty to Matilda and her infant son¹, and by throwing more and more administrative power into the hands of those servants on whose fidelity he most confidently relied, he probably did all that could be done to avert the evils that he could not but foresee. He had however himself set an example which his success had made too tempting for the faith of the generation that followed him.

¹ Ord. Vit. xi. 21. Eustace of Breteuil received a pension in lieu of his fief (Ibid. xii. 22), and Breteuil was given to Ralph his cousin, son of Ralph Guader (see above, p. 291), whose daughter married earl Robert II of Leicester. This instance shows the extreme reluctance of the king to extinguish a great fief in Normandy. Breteuil had belonged to William Fitz-Osbern the justiciar; his two sons divided his inheritance: Roger had Herefordshire, which he lost in 1074; William had Breteuil, but died without lawful issue. Henry I adjudged the fief to Eustace, a natural son, whom he married to his own daughter Juliana. But the Guaders, offspring of the fatal marriage of 1074, still claimed in the female line, and ultimately obtained Breteuil.

² The leaders in 1118 were Hugh de Gournai, Stephen of Aumâle, Eustace of Breteuil, Richer de l'Aigle, Robert of Neufbourg son of Earl Henry of Warwick, and Henry count of Eu. Ord. Vit. xii. 1. The faithful were Richard earl of Chester, and his cousin and successor Ranulf, Ralph de Conches, William of Warenne, William of Roumare, William of Tankerville, Walter Giffard, and Nigel and William of Albini. Ibid. xii. 14.

³ The leaders of this revolt were, besides Waleran, who atoned for it by a captivity of five years, William of Roumare, who had claims on the county of Lincoln, Hugh de Montfort, who was imprisoned for the rest of Henry's life, Hugh of Neufchâtel, William Louvel, Baudri de Brai, and Pain of Gisors. Ord. Vit. xii. 34.

His precautions for the succession.

110. A double result attended the policy which the love of power, aided by circumstances, thus forced upon Henry. He found himself, as he had from the first day of his reign foreseen, compelled to seek the support of the native English; and the necessities of government called forth in him the exercise of great administrative sagacity. Of the former point the contemporary historians, especially Ordericus Vitalis, afford abundant illustration. Not only was Henry during the greatest part of his reign in the closest alliance with the clergy, but the English people, who saw in the clergy their truest friends and champions, uniformly supported him. In the dangers of Robert's invasion in A.D. 1101, when the count of Meulan, alone among the great men, kept faith, Anselm with the clergy and people adhered firmly to the king; 'repudiating the claims of the other prince, they were constant in their fidelity to their own king, and therefore they were desirous enough to enter the struggle².' Their joy at the conclusion of peace is contrasted with the disgust and dismay of the feudatories. In the struggle with Robert of Belesme, when the barons were anxious to intercede for their champion³, the scale was turned in favour of strong measures by the voice of the native troops; and the congratulations which the chronicler puts in the mouth of the people show that in

Henry gains the support of the English.

Adhesion of the clergy.

¹ See Chap. XI, pp. 349, 341 below.

² See above, p. 306, note 3.

³ 'Consules autem et primores regni una convenerunt . . . dicebant enim, "Si rex magnificum comitem violenter subegerit nimisque pertinacia, ut conatur, eum exhereditaverit, omnes nos ut imbelles ancillas amodo conculcabit. . . . Pacem igitur inter eos obnixè seramus ut hero comparique nostro legitime proficiamus, et sic utrumque perturbationes sedando debitorem nobis faciamus. . . . Tunc in quodam proximo colle tria millia regensium militum stabant et optimatum molimina satis intelligentes ad regem vociferando clamabant, "Domine rex Henrice noli proditoribus istis credere.'" Ord. Vit. xi. 3.

Sympathy of the people, repaid by the king.

some quarters at least the real bearing of the contest was duly appreciated¹. The nation had accepted Henry as they had accepted the Conqueror and the great Canute before him. And Henry showed himself to a certain extent grateful. He restored the working of the local courts², the hundred, and the shire, as they had been in King Edward's time. He granted to the towns such privileges as in the awakening of municipal life they were capable of using³. He maintained good peace by severe and even-handed justice; and by strengthening the hands of Anselm and the reforming prelates who succeeded him, he did, after the arrangement of the question of investiture, win to his side the most stable element of national life.

Policy of Henry in creating a strong administrative body in connexion with the crown.

111. In the second place, his circumstances called forth the display of greater constructive power than had been shown even by his father. Henry was fully awake to the impossibility of governing England with feudal machinery, even clogged and fettered by the checks which the Conqueror had imposed. The faithless and selfish policy of the barons gave him the best excuse for superseding them, gathering the reins of administrative power into his own hands or those of his devoted servants, and forming a strong ministerial body. In this purpose he was seconded by the very admirable instrument that his sagacity selected or his good-fortune threw in his way. Bishop Roger of Salisbury, in the office of Justiciar, acted throughout the reign as the great constructor of judicial and financial organisation. This famous man, whom Henry had first met as a poor priest in Normandy and taken into his service as steward and chaplain, brought to the work of government an amount of laborious and minute attention which to a great extent supplied the want of legal organisation. The regular routine which he instituted was perhaps as great a step towards a safe constitutional system as was possible under so despotic a sovereign: and its elaborate machinery was in itself a check on wanton tyranny. In subordination to Roger, Henry raised up a set of novi homines, many of whom were, in nobility of blood, below the ideal standard of the ruling race. Among them Ordericus enumerates the Clintons, the Bassets, and the Trussebuts, who, although not among the tenants-in-chief of Domesday, were of good Norman descent and founders of great English families¹. They were endowed and elevated in position with the distinct purpose of forming a counterpoise to the older vassals; and they were made useful in the work of administration. This class of men furnished the sheriffs of the counties, the barons of the exchequer, and the justices of the Curia regis. The nobles of the Conquest naturally regarded them as upstarts, and this scornful estimate of them is reflected in the writings of the historians. They were in fact, for the most part, too poor as yet to make themselves friends among the monks and clergy, as their rivals did, by founding churches and monasteries; and being the agents of the strict measures of the king, they incurred the unpopularity that always awaits economic or judicial reform. In some cases, it may well be, they showed too great zeal in carrying out the policy of their master, and in others they took the opportunity of turning their office to their own advantage rather than that of the State. But notwithstanding this, they were so far an improvement on the feudal administrators that they were not too strong to be brought to justice.

¹ See above, p. 308.

² Select Charters, p. 99. See below, Chap. XI.

³ Ibid. pp. 104-108. See below, Chap. XI.

Rise of new administrative families.

who are regarded as upstarts.

The English, although faithful and submissive to Henry, were ¹ Ord. Vit. xi. c. 2: 'Alios e contra favorabiliter illi obsequentes de ignobili stirpe illustravit, de pulvere, ut ita dicam, extulit, dataque multiplici facultate super consules et illustres oppidanos exaltavit; inde Goisfredus de Clintona, Radulfus Basset et Hugo de Bocalanda, Guillegrif et Rainerius de Bada, Willelmus Trossebot et Haimon de Falesia, Guigan Algazo, et Rolbertus de Bostare.' Of these, Geoffrey de Clinton and Ralph Basset were two of Henry's principal justices; the latter founded a great legal family: Hugh de Boeland also founded a baronial house. Willegrif had held land in Shropshire and Staffordshire before the Domesday Survey (vol. i. 249, 254); he was no doubt an Englishman, as Hugh of Boeland was probably. The author of the Gesta Stephani describes their attitude in the next reign, pp. 14, 15: 'Exceptis quibusdam regis Henrici primis et conjunctoribus amicis, quos ex plebeio genere, inter aulanos juvenculos ad ministrandum assuetos, in tantum postea singulari sibi dilectione astrinxit, ut eos honoribus ditatos largissimis, prædiisque honoratos amplissimis, et omnium palatinorum archiministros efficeret, et omnium curialium causarum susceptores præscriberet.' He mentions as instances only Miles of Hereford and Pain Fitz-John.

Causes of the misery prevalent in the reign of Henry I.

not disposed to endure his strong government without murmuring. The amount of taxation which he imposed was not so burdensome by its weight as by its regular and inevitable incidence. The exactions and the misery that they caused are a frequent subject of lamentation with the native writers. In A.D. 1103 the Peterborough chronicler complains, 'This was a year of much distress from the manifold taxes;' in A.D. 1104, 'It is not easy to describe the misery of the land which it suffered at this time from manifold oppressions and taxations;' in A.D. 1105, 'The manifold taxes never ceased;' in A.D. 1110, 'This was a year of much distress from the taxes which the king raised for his daughter's dowry;' in A.D. 1118, 'England paid dearly for the Norman war by the manifold taxes;' in A.D. 1124, 'He who had any property was bereaved of it by heavy taxes and assessments, and he who had none starved with hunger¹.' Allowing for the generally querulous tone of the writer, it must be granted that there was much truth in the representation: an extraordinary series of bad harvests and stormy seasons and the general depreciation of the coinage, caused by the dishonesty of the moneyers², increased no doubt the distress. But it must not be forgotten that it was by these exactions that England was saved from the ravages of war, and that the money so raised was devoted to the humiliation of the common enemies of king and people. The amount of taxation, where exact details are recorded, was not greater than could have been easily borne in a period of prosperity, after good harvests and in time of peace. The same chronicler is obliged to say of the king, that 'he was a good man and great was the awe of him; no man durst ill treat another in his time; he made peace for men and deer³.' Much the same impression

¹ Chron. Sax. under the several years mentioned. In 1125, which Henry of Huntingdon describes as the dearest he could remember, the horse-load of wheat cost six shillings (fol. 219). The Chronicle says that between Christmas and Candlemas one acre's seed of wheat or barley sold for six shillings, and one of oats for four. In 1131 there was a cattle plague.

² Chron. Sax. A.D. 1124. Hence the very severe measures taken against the coiners in 1125.

³ Ibid. A.D. 1135.

is made by the more favourable account of Ordericus. 'He governed with a strong hand the duchy of Normandy and the kingdom of England, and to the end of his life always studied peace: enjoying constant good-fortune, he never fell away from his first strength and sternness of justice. The foremost counts and lords of towns and audacious tyrants he craftily overpowered; the peaceful, the religious, the mean people he at all times kindly cherished and protected. From the eighth year of his reign, in which he acquired firm hold on power on both sides of the sea, he always sought peace for the nations under him, and rigidly punished with austere measures the transgressors of his laws.' His personal vices were not directly injurious to the welfare of his people. 'Strong in energetic industry, he increased in a manifold degree his temporal gains, and heaped up for himself vast treasures of things which men covet.' 'After a careful examination of the histories of the ancients, I boldly assert that none of the kings in the English realm was, as touching the grandeur of this world, richer or more powerful than Henry¹.' He was the 'Lion of Righteousness' of Merlin's prophecies². 'Inflexible in the rigour of justice,' says William of Malmesbury, 'he kept his native people in quiet, and his barons according to their deserts³.' Men thought diversely about him, Henry of Huntingdon tells us, and after he was dead said what they thought. Some spoke of splendour, wisdom, prudence, eloquence, wealth, victories; some of cruelty, avarice, and lust; but in the evil times that came after, the very acts of tyranny or of royal wilfulness seemed, in comparison with the much worse state of things present, most excellent⁴. He was, it is evident, a strong ruler, with a clear view of his own interests, methodical, sagacious, and far-sighted: his selfish aims dictated the policy that gave peace and order to his people; destroying his enemies, he destroyed theirs; and by enforcing order he paved the way for law. Such a king neither expects nor deserves love; but he is

Estimate of Henry's policy made by Ordericus Vitalis:

and other historians.

General
estimate of Henry.

¹ Ord. Vit. xi. 23.

² Ibid. xii. 47. Suger, V. Ludovici Gr., § 15; Joh. Salisb. Polycr. vi. 18.

³ W. Malmesb. G. R. v. § 411.

⁴ H. Hunt. ed. Savile, fol. 221.

regarded with a mixed feeling of confidence and awe, and the result of his rule is better than that of many who are called benefactors.

Ecclesiastical policy of Henry I.

112. The ecclesiastical policy of Henry was the same as that of his father; but the circumstances of the times were different, and the relations of the king with both the English Church and the Pope were more complicated¹. The policy of Anselm was in contrast with that of Lanfranc, and the tendency of ecclesiastical progress had become too strong to be directed by political management. The points at issue between the king and the Church had become part of the great European quarrel. The exact importance of those points cannot be discussed here, and the constitutional results of the dispute on investitures have their proper place in the history of the national council. The political consequences of the struggle however were to draw the clergy and people more closely together, and to force on the king the conviction that, absolute as he would be, there were regions of life and thought in which he must allow the existence of liberty. In no respect does Henry's ability show itself more strongly than in this. At the beginning of his reign, although the support of the prelates was absolutely necessary to him, and he was willing to win it by renouncing the evil customs of his brother, he refused to surrender one of the rights that his father had exercised, or that were in question among his fellow-rulers on the continent. Anselm again left England, but no interruption took place in the ecclesiastical working: the clergy stood by the king in his struggle with the feudatories and rejoiced in his victories. When the early troubles were over, and Henry was able to apply himself to the independent treatment of the question, his thoughtful mind at once struck out the fit line of compromise, and anticipated by fourteen years the principle on which the Concordat of Worms was framed between pope and emperor. His love of order led him to admit the canonical rights of the chapters of the churches, the synodical powers of the clergy, and even the occasional exercise by the popes of a supreme appellate and legatine jurisdiction. He saw however distinctly the point at which his own authority must limit this liberty. The bishops might be elected by the chapters, but the election must be held in his court; the clergy might be trusted without compulsion to choose his candidates. The councils might be held when the archbishop chose, but the king's consent must be obtained before the assembly could meet or exercise any legislative power. Papal jurisdiction was not excluded, but no legate might visit England without royal licence. In the exercise of this control he showed no self-willed caprice, as William Rufus had done : the freedom was never withheld simply to show that it was in his power to withhold it, but only when he was engaged in foreign war which might be complicated by ecclesiastical interference, or when the exertion of sovereign authority was needed to reconcile conflicting interests at home. Henry knew how to yield with a fairly good grace, or for an adequate purpose. He allowed Ranulf Flambard to make his peace, and found him a useful tool. He allowed himself to be over-reached by Archbishop Thurstan and Pope Calixtus II ; but he saw the merits of the archbishop through the disingenuous policy which he had persuaded himself to employ, and after a while placed him in possession of the rights of his see. That in some such cases his favour was purchased by a direct payment is scarcely to be wondered at. The practices that were regarded as simoniacal in the Church, the sale of offices and legal sentences, were not yet regarded as immoral in the secular service of the State. Under an absolute king, whose will is law, that which he chooses to sell passes for justice. Beneath a thin veil of names and fictions, the great ministerial offices and the royal interference by writ in private quarrels were alike matters of purchase. In the Church as well as in the State, if simony, as defined by the canon law, could be avoided, money might pass for money's worth. But setting this aside, Henry felt his own strength to be sufficiently great to spare him the pangs of jealousy. Once firmly seated on his throne, he indulged in no severities greater than his own security demanded,

His dispute with Anselm.

¹ The unfavourable picture drawn in the Gesta Stephani, pp. 16, 17, should be compared with Eadmer, who is more just to the king.

The extent of his concessions.

Simoniacal practices.

Henry's treatment of the Church illustrates his treatment of the people.

and, savage as he was by nature, put so far forth a curb on his own instincts. In the same way he showed no jealousy of the clergy. Certain of his mastery, he found his interest in using them rather than tormenting them. And this sheds some light on his treatment of the people: he cared too little for them to pretend to love them; he feared them too little to take pains to propitiate them; but he saw that for himself it was best that they should be orderly governed, and with a strong hand he maintained the order that he may almost be said to have created¹. How slender the basis must be on which the absolute monarch rears his selfish designs; how little the strongest will can direct the future course of events; how intrinsically treacherous is the most perfect system and order that results from external will rather than from permanent organisation under an internal law, may be learned definitely from the history of the next reign.

Accession
of Stephen.

113. The example which Henry had set in his seizure and retention of the crown was followed in every point by his successor. Stephen of Blois, the son of the Countess Adela and grandson of the Conqueror, had obtained the county of Mortain by the gift of his uncle², and that of Boulogne by marriage. His wife, the niece of Godfrey of Bouillon, was a grand-daughter of Malcolm and Margaret, and descended from the line of Cerdic in exactly the same degree as the Empress Matilda. His position as count of Mortain gave him, although he was not the eldest member of his family, the first place among the barons of Normandy; and in this capacity he had thrice pledged his oath to secure the succession of Matilda and her infant heir¹.

¹ Abbot Suger (V. Ludovici Gr., § 15), commenting on the prophecy of Merlin: 'Aurum ex lilio et urtica extorquebitur, et argentum ex unguis mugientium manabit.'—'In diebus ejus aurum ex lilio, quod est ex religiosis boni odoris, et ex urtica, quod est ex saecularibus pungentibus, ab eo extorquebatur; hoc intendens ut, sicut omnibus proficiebat, ab omnibus ei serviretur. Tutius est enim unum ut omnes defendat ab omnibus habere, quam non habendo per unum omnes deperire. Argentum ex unguis mugientium manabat, cum ruris securitas horreorum plenitudinem, horreorum plenitudo argenti copiam plenis scriniis ministrabat.' The last sentence contains the key to much of his administrative policy.

² On the forfeiture of Robert of Belesme Henry I gave Alençon to Theobald of Blois, who gave it to Stephen in exchange for his French heritage. Ord. Vit. xii. 4. Stephen received Mortain instead, when William Talvas recovered his father's estates in A.D. 1119.

The death of Henry I, like that of William Rufus, took both Normandy and England by surprise; and if on neither side of the channel any respect was paid to the engagements made for the succession, it must be remembered that these engagements had been to all intents and purposes forced upon the barons. The very fact of their repetition had betrayed that they were not on either side regarded as trustworthy. As soon as the king was dead the Norman barons treated the succession as an open question; and Stephen took the decision as respected England into his own hands. Henry died in the night following December 1, A.D. 1135: Stephen immediately on receiving the news crossed over to England. The men of Kent, remembering the mischief that had constantly come to them from Boulogne, refused to receive him². He hastened to London, and was there hailed by the citizens as a deliverer from the danger of a foreign yoke: Geoffrey of Anjou and his wife were disliked, the former as a stranger, and the latter as an imperious self-willed woman³; the citizens of the first city in the realm might claim to exercise a prerogative voice in the election of the king, and they chose Stephen⁴. Encouraged by this success, he passed on to Winchester, where also he was welcomed by the citizens; here he obtained with little delay the royal treasure, having, by the aid of his brother the bishop, overcome the scruples of the justiciar, Bishop Roger of Salisbury⁵. Thus strengthened, he returned to London for formal election and coronation⁶. It was not without deep misgivings that Archbishop William disregarded his oath; but the exigency was urgent. The suspension of law and peace

The succession treated as an open question.

Stephen obtains London and Winchester.

¹ Below, Chap. XI, p. 341.

² Gervase, c. 1340: 'A Cantuarinis exclusus.'

³ Cont. Flor. Wig.: 'Volente igitur Gaufrido comite cum uxore sua quæ heres erat in regnum succedere, primores terræ juramenti sui male recordantes regem eum suscipere noluerunt, dicentes "Alienigena non regnabit super nos."'

⁴ 'Id quoque sui esse juris sui que specialiter privilegii, ut si rex ipsorum quoquo modo obiret, alius suo provisu in regno substituendus e vestigio succederet.' Gesta Stephani, p. 3.

⁵ W. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. i. § 11.

⁶ Gervase, c. 1340.

Election and coronation
of Stephen.

owing to the interregnum was becoming dangerous; the news from Normandy brought no prospect of a speedy solution of the difficulty from that quarter. Hugh Bigod, Henry's steward, was ready to swear that the king had released the vassals from their oath and disinherited Matilda¹. All men were acting as if she had no claim to be considered. Stephen pressed his advantage: the three prelates undertook to act on behalf of the Church, and the citizens of London filled up the gaps in the ranks of the nobles²: he was crowned on S. Stephen's Day. The hurry of the ceremony gave no time to impose new constitutional conditions, nor were the members of the national council who were present likely to demand more than Henry had seen good to grant. A brief charter was issued by which the new king confirmed the laws and liberties that his uncle had given and the good customs of King Edward's time, and enjoined the observance of them on all, a command which meant little under the weak hand that signed it³.

His first charter.

He is accepted in Normandy.

The news of Stephen's boldness and success determined for the time the minds of the Normans who had been talking of electing his elder brother Theobald as their duke⁴: Geoffrey and Matilda were occupied by a revolt in Anjou, and even Earl Robert of Gloucester, the natural son of Henry I, seems to have concluded that it was the moment for politic submission⁵.

¹ Gervase, c. 1340: 'Quidam ex potentissimis Angliæ, jurans et dicens se præsentem affuisse ubi rex Henricus idem juramentum in bona fide sponte relaxasset.' Ralph de Diceto, c. 505: 'Hugo Bigod senescallus regis coram archiepiscopo Cantuariensi sacramento probavit, quod dum rex Henricus ageret in extremis, ortis quibusdam inimicitiiis inter ipsum et imperatricem, ipsam exheredavit, et Stephanum Boloniæ comitem heredem instituit.'

² 'Tribus episcopis præsentibus, archiepiscopo, Wintoniensi, Salesbiriensi, nullis abbatibus, paucissimis optimatibus.' Will. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. i. § 12. Gervase, c. 1340, says, 'A cunctis fere in regem electus est.'

³ 'Sciatis me concessisse et præsentem carta mea confirmasse omnibus baronibus et hominibus meis de Angliâ omnes libertates et bonas leges quas Henricus rex Anglorum avunculus meus eis dedit et concessit, et omnes bonas leges et bonas consuetudines eis concedo quas habuerunt temporis regis Edwardi.' Statutes of the Realm, i. 4; Select Charters, p. 113.

⁴ Ord. Vit. xiii. 20.

⁵ 'Post Pascha Robertus comes Glocestreæ . . . venit in Angliam . . . homagium regi fecit sub conditione quadam scilicet quamdiu ille dignitatem suam integre custodiret et sibi pacta servaret.' Will. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. i. § 14. The author of the Gesta Stephani says that Robert

Only the old king of Scots took up arms on behalf of his niece ; and he was pacified by the surrender of Carlisle, although he declined to do homage, in consideration of his oath to the empress¹. It would seem that the necessity of binding Stephen by further conditions had occurred to the barons who had assembled at the funeral of the late king. This ceremony had been delayed until nearly a fortnight after the coronation, and it is probable that it furnished an opportunity of obtaining some vague promises from Stephen. He undertook, we are told, to allow the canonical election of bishops and not to prolong vacancies ; to give up the abuses of the forest jurisdiction which Henry had aggravated, and to abolish the Dane-geld². Whether these promises were embodied in a charter is uncertain : if they were, the charter is lost ; it is however more probable that the story is a popular version of the document which was actually issued by the king, at Oxford, later in the year 1136, after he had been joined by the earl of Gloucester and other chief members of Henry's household. This charter, which is the second of our great charters of liberties, is attested by a large number of witnesses³ ; eleven English and three Norman bishops ; the Chancellor Roger ;

Stephen's
promises of good government.

His second
charter.

had been urged to take the crown himself, but he refused 'dicens æquius esse filio sororis suae, cui justius competebat, regnum cedere, quam praesumptive sibi usurpare.' p. 8. Notwithstanding he did homage to Stephen.

¹ Hen. Hunt. fol. 221, 222.

² Hen. Hunt. ed. Savile, fol. 221 : 'Primo vovit quod defunctis episcopis nunquam retineret ecclesias in manu sua sed statim electioni canonice consentiens episcopis eas investiret. Secundo vovit quod nullius clerici vel laici sylvas in manu sua retineret, sicut rex Henricus fecerat, qui singulis annis implacitaverat eos, si vel venationem cepissent in silvis propriis vel si eas ad necessitates suas extirparent vel diminuerent . . . Tertio vovit quod Danegeldum, id est, duos solidos ad hidam quos antecessores sui accipere solebant singulis annis in aeternum condonaret.' These promises were made at Oxford, during the Christmas season, before the news of the Scottish invasion. The charter, mentioned immediately, was also issued at Oxford ; but, as it is attested by the earl of Gloucester, who landed soon after Easter, it must be dated some time in the spring.

³ Statutes of the Realm, i. 3 ; Select Charters, pp. 114, 115. The earls are Gloucester, Surrey, Chester, and Warwick, of whom Gloucester was uniformly, and Chester generally, on the side of the empress. Her most faithful adherents, Miles of Hereford and Brian of Wallingford, were also among the witnesses : probably the retreat of the king of Scots had made her cause for the time hopeless.

Stephen's
second
charter.

four earls; four great constables; four royal stewards; two grand butlers, and seven other vassals, two of whom were of the rank of count. The privileges conceded by it are chiefly ecclesiastical. Simony is forbidden; the property, dignities, and customs of the churches are confirmed as they were in the days of the Conqueror, and the jurisdiction over ecclesiastics is left in the hands of the bishops: all interference in the testamentary dispositions of the clergy and in the administration of vacant churches is disclaimed. The forests made in the last reign are surrendered¹. The promise of peace and justice made at the coronation is renewed, and amplified by an undertaking to extirpate all exactions, injustice and chicanery, whether introduced by the sheriffs or by others; and to maintain good laws and ancient and righteous customs in reference to judicial procedure generally². As in the charter of Henry I, each of the three estates has its own clause of conciliation; the forest jurisdiction being surrendered probably to gain the support of the lay nobles. But Stephen kept none of these promises.

Want of confidence in Stephen.

He was a brave man, merciful and generous, and had had considerable military experience; but he was gifted with neither a strong will nor a clear head, and from the beginning of his reign neither felt nor inspired confidence. The conditional adhesion of Robert of Gloucester, who carefully defined the fealty that he promised as dependent on the king's treatment of him³, was not a circumstance likely to reassure Stephen. Much however might have been done by an honest perseverance in the promises of the charter. Unfortunately for the king, a false report of his death early in the summer produced a general rising. Hugh Bigod, who had so lately acted as his tool, seized

Early revolt against him.

¹ 'Forestas quas Willelmus avus meus et Willelmus avunculus meus instituerunt et habuerunt, mihi reservo. Ceteras omnes quas rex Henricus superaddidit ecclesiis et regno quietas reddo et concedo.'

² 'Omnes exactiones et injustitias et mescheningas, sive per vicecomites vel per alios quoslibet male inductas, funditus extirpo.' The miskenning, variatio loquelae, is explained of the arbitrary fines exacted for altering the terms of indictment, or shifting the ground of an action after it was brought into court.

³ Above, p. 320, note 5.

the castle of Norwich, and Baldwin of Redvers fortified Exeter. Stephen, with great promptness, marched against the two strongholds in succession and took them. Hugh Bigod and his party were pardoned, but Baldwin was deprived of his estates in the Isle of Wight and banished. The success of the king led him to forget his engagements, and by holding a forest assize at Brampton he showed how little weight he allowed to the promise which in popular estimation was of the most importance¹. The next year, 1137, was marked by victories in Normandy, and was the crowning period of his prosperity². In A.D. 1138 all the elements of danger broke out at once into a blaze.

114. The feudal instinct, notwithstanding the repressive policy of Henry I, was as strong as ever in the great vassals. Unwarned by the fate that had overtaken their fellows, and uninstructed by the good peace that Henry had made, they watched with eager eyes for the moment when the disputed title to the throne should give them an opportunity of striking a blow for themselves. Matilda's party were gathering resolution and collecting resources, whilst Stephen was spending his treasures and wasting his opportunities. Matters would have been bad enough if his policy had been a negative one; but the very measures which he took for strengthening himself were so ill chosen as to be fatal. Notwithstanding the fact that it was by an outcry against the foreigners that he had been able to exclude Matilda from the succession, and although he must have known the intolerant dislike felt both by the Norman barons and by the English for foreigners, whether as favourites or as mercenaries, he surrounded himself with an army of hired Flemings³. In order, next, to secure more firmly the faith of such barons as had adhered to him, he allowed them to fortify their houses and build castles, where they exercised without early success.

Stephen's

Gathering clouds.

Stephen's imprudence.

His mercenaries.

Building of castles.

¹ Hen. Hunt. fol. 222; Gesta Stephani, pp. 20-30.

² Hen. Hunt. fol. 222: 'Hi ergo duo anni Stephano regi prosperrimi fuerunt; tertius vero, de quo dicemus, mediocris et intercisus; duo vero ultimi exitiales et prærupti.'

³ W. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. ii. § 34. Ord. Vit. xiii. 30: 'In illis præcipue fisis est. Unde proceres Normannorum nimis indignati sunt, suumque regi famulatum callide subtraxerunt.'

limitation all the tyrannical privileges which the feudal example of France suggested¹. He went further still. Not satisfied with putting this weapon into the hand of his enemies, he provoked their pride and jealousy by conferring the title of earl upon some of those whom he trusted most implicitly, irrespective of the means which they might have of supporting the new dignity. Their poverty was relieved by pensions drawn from the Exchequer, which was already so much impoverished as scarcely to be sufficient for the expenses of administration². Accordingly when, early in A.D. 1138, the king of Scots again invaded the north, the party which Robert of Gloucester had been organising in the south and west of England threw off the mask and broke into rebellion³. Stephen, leaving Yorkshire to be defended by the barons and commons, who under the exhortations of Archbishop Thurstan mustered as in the days of old and successfully repelled the invasion, himself led his forces against the rebels in Somersetshire, where although he was unable to take Bristol, the stronghold of Earl Robert, he achieved some considerable success⁴. His fortunes might yet have triumphed, but for his own incredible imprudence.

His creation of earls.

War of A.D.
1138.

Attitude of the bishops.

Up to this time Stephen had contrived to keep on his side the clergy and the great officers of state. The bishops were greatly influenced by Henry of Winchester, who early in A.D. 1139 obtained the commission of legate from Rome⁵, an office which made him more than a match for the newly-elected archbishop,

¹ W. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. i. § 18.

² Ibid. § 34: 'Denique multos etiam comites qui ante non fuerant instituit, applicitis possessionibus et redditibus quae proprio jure regi competeabant.'

³ Henry of Huntingdon, fol. 222, gives a list of the insurgents and their castles. Talbot fortified Hereford; Robert of Gloucester, Bristol and Sled (Leeds); William Lovel, Castle Cary; Paganellus, Ludlow; William de Mohun, Dunster; Robert of Lincoln, Wareham; Eustace Fitz-John, Malton; William Fitz-Alan, Shrewsbury. Ordericus Vitalis (xiii. 37) adds Walkelin Manniot, who commanded at Dover; William Peverell, who had four castles, Burne, Ellesmere, Whittington, and Overton; and William Fitz-John who fortified Harptree. The Beauchamps at Bedford had been brought to surrender early in 1138. See also Gesta Stephani, pp. 30-43 sq.

⁴ Gesta Stephani, p. 41 sq.

⁵ The date of Henry's legatine commission, which is often mis-stated, is given by William of Malmesbury; Hist. Nov. ii. § 22. It was March 1, 1139. Theobald had been consecrated on the 8th of January.

Theobald of Canterbury. Henry of Winchester was a thorough churchman, and, in spite of his close relationship to Stephen, never condescended to act as his tool. The administrative machinery of the kingdom was still under the control of Roger bishop of Salisbury: he yet bore the title of justiciar¹; his son, also named Roger, was chancellor of the king; one nephew, Nigel bishop of Ely, was treasurer²; another nephew, Alexander, was bishop of Lincoln. As the whole of the judicial and financial business of the kingdom depended on the Exchequer, which had been for thirty years in the hands of this able family, it was little less than infatuation to break with them. Bishop Roger had been mainly instrumental in placing Stephen on the throne. He had, perhaps, for the sake of retaining power, done outrage to the sense of obligation under which gratitude to the late king should have laid him; probably also he was influenced not a little by the common idea of statesmen that their first duty is to see that the government be carried on; without him, he knew and the event proved, the whole mechanism of the State would come to a standstill. But he did not shut his eyes to the uncertainty of his position; he saw the vassals on every side building castles and collecting trains of followers; and, either with the thought of defending himself in the struggle which he foresaw, or perhaps with the intention of holding the balance of the State firm until the contest was decided, he and his nephews built and fortified several strong castles in their dioceses³. Having great revenues at their disposal, they expended them freely; their newly-built fortresses were the noblest works of the kind north of the Alps; and the train with which they appeared at court was numerous and magnificent. It is not clear whether

Roger of Salisbury and his nephews.

Their
castles.

¹ 'Justiciarius fuit totius Angliæ et secundus a rege.' Hen. Hunt. fol. 218. 'Cui totius Albionis tutela jam dudum ab avunculo suo, et postinodum ab ipso, commissa fuerat.' Ord. Vit. xiii. 24.

² Nigel had been the means of revealing to the king the existence of a formidable conspiracy, as late as 1137. Ord. Vit. xiii. 32. One of his clerks, named Ranulf, had contrived a plot for murdering all the Normans. R. Diceto, c. 508.

³ Newark and Sleaford were fortified by Alexander; Salisbury, Devizes, Sherborne, and Malmesbury by Roger. Devizes, according to Henry of Huntingdon, was as splendid as the most splendid castle in Europe; fol. 223.

Arrest of Bishop
Roger.

Stephen's course was prompted by a doubt of Roger's fidelity, by the petty jealousy of his partisans among the barons¹, or by personal dislike of a too powerful subject. In June however, at Oxford, he arrested the bishops of Salisbury and Lincoln, and the chancellor with them, and compelled them to surrender their castles. The shortsightedness of this policy was immediately apparent; the whole body of the clergy took umbrage at the injury done to the bishops. A council was called at Winchester, in which the strongest remonstrance was made, and Stephen was entreated not to render the breach incurable between the clergy and the royal party. The king as usual made promises which he either could not or would not keep².

Arrival of the empress.

Immediately afterwards the empress landed; and war broke out again. At the end of the year the bishop of Salisbury died; the bishop of Ely was banished; and the bishop of Winchester, as soon as Stephen fell into difficulties, declared himself on the side of the empress, and procured her election to the throne³. The arrest of Bishop Roger was perhaps the most important constitutional event that had taken place since the Conquest; the whole administration of the country ceased to work, and the whole power of the clergy was arrayed in opposition to the king. It was also the signal for the civil war, which lasted with more or less activity for fourteen years.

Civil war.

¹ William of Malmesbury (Hist. Nov. ii. § 19) mentions the jealousy of the barons; Ordericus (xiii. 40) the suspicions of the bishop's fidelity. The count of Meulan is described in the Gesta Stephani, p. 47, as the chief accuser.

² William of Malmesbury (Hist. Nov. ii. § 28) says, 'Malorum praeventus consilio, nullam bonarum promissionum exhibuit efficaciam.' Henry of Huntingdon, 'Rex consilio pravorum tot et tantorum tam verendam prosternationem despiciens, nihil eos impetrare permisit.' fol. 223. The Gesta Stephani, p. 51, record a penance done by the king for his attack on the bishops.

³ The arrest of the bishops took place June 24, 1139; the council at Winchester August 29 to Sept. 1. Earl Robert landed Sept. 30; and the empress with him. Stephen sent the bishop of Winchester and Count Wal-ran of Meulan to escort her. Bishop Roger died Dec. 11. The bishop of Ely was displaced from his see at the beginning of 1140, as soon probably as the king knew of Bishop Roger's death. Hen. Hunt. fol. 223. The bishop of Winchester, after in vain attempting to mediate, took the empress's side as soon as Stephen had fallen into her hands, after the battle of Lincoln in 1141. Ord. Vit. xiii. 43. He is represented in the Gesta Stephani, p. 57, as conniving at the empress's designs from the moment of her landing. The election of the empress as 'domina Angliæ' took place April 8, 1141.

115. During this time the king was alternately a prisoner and a conqueror, but was never able to restore the administrative machinery; the empress had her turns of good and evil fortune, but was never able to make good her title to the crown. The barons were in earnest only for their own interests; most of them caring little for either candidate; fighting on each side and purchasing new titles or privileges from both by momentary support; supplies were raised from the unfortunate people and clergy. The bishops protested and mediated, but found themselves powerless from the fact that there was no collective interest upon which they could work. The result was that feudal anarchy which had sometimes prevailed abroad, but never before in England. Stephen held his court at London at Whitsuntide, A.D. 1140, but only one bishop, and he a foreigner, attended¹. Henceforth not even the appearance of ancient state was maintained; the solemn courts and coronation days were given up; the treasure was all spent; the king debased the coinage²; there was no peace in the realm. 'It is written,' says William of Newburgh³, 'of one period in the history of the ancient people, "In those days there was no king in Israel, but every one did that which was right in his own eyes." But it was worse in England in King Stephen's days. For because then the king was powerless, and the law weak by reason of the king's powerlessness, some indeed did what was right in their own eyes, but many did what by natural reason they knew to be wrong, all the more readily, now that the fear of the law and of the king was taken away. At first it seemed that the realm was rent in two, some inclining to the king, some to the empress. Not that either king or empress exercised any real control over their party, but that every one for the time devoted himself to the pursuit of war. Neither of them could exert command or enforce discipline; both of them allowed to their supporters every sort of licence for fear of losing them. The parties fought for a long anarchy

Feudal
during the struggle.

Miseries of the country.

¹ The bishop of Seez. Will. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. ii. § 37. The royal pomp had already come to an end; 'Ubi autem ad Natale, vel ad Pascha fuerit, dicere non attinet.' Hen. Hunt. fol. 223. Joh. Salisb. Polycr. vi. 18.

² Will. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. ii. § 34.

³ Will. Newb. i. 22.

Continued
anarchy.

Feudal
usurpations.

The new castles.

The unlawful taxes.

time with alternate fortune. As time went on, wearied of the uncertainty of their luck, they somewhat relaxed in energy; but even this made it all the worse for England; for when the two competitors were tired of strife and willing to rest, the provincial quarrels of the nobles continued to rage. In every province, under the impulse of the party struggle, numbers of castles had sprung up. There were in England as many kings, tyrants rather, as there were lords of castles; each had the power of striking his own coin, and of exercising like a king sovereign jurisdiction over his dependents. And as every one sought for himself such pre-eminence, that some would endure no superior, some not even an equal, they fought amongst themselves with deadly hatred, they spoiled the fairest regions with fire and rapine, and in the country which had been once most fertile they destroyed almost all the provision of bread.' The lamentations of the Peterborough chronicler are as loud and as distinct: 'All became forsworn and broke their allegiance; for every rich man built his castles and defended them against the king, and they filled the land with castles. They greatly oppressed the wretched people by making them work at these castles, and when the castles were finished they filled them with devils and evil men. Then they took those whom they suspected to have any goods, by night and by day, seizing both men and women, and they put them in prison for their gold and silver, and tortured them with pains unspeakable. . . . Many thousands they exhausted with hunger. . . . And this state of things lasted the nineteen years that Stephen was king, and ever grew worse and worse. They were continually levying an exaction from the towns, which they called tenserie, and when the miserable inhabitants had no more to give, then plundered they and burned all the towns, so that thou mightest well walk a whole day's journey nor ever shouldest thou find a man seated in a town or its lands tilled¹. John of Salisbury compares England during this reign to Jerusalem when besieged by Titus².

The struggle, unlike most of those civil wars which have

¹ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1137 (ed. Giles).

² Joh. Salisb. Polycr. vi. 18. Cf. Ord. Vit. xiii. 32, 41; Hen. Hunt. fol. 223; Gilbert Foliot, ep. 79, S. T. C. v. 94.

devastated England, is redeemed by scarcely any examples of Selfish policy of the great nobles. loyalty or personal heroism. Even the fidelity of Robert of Gloucester to the interests of his sister was an after-thought, and resulted in no small degree from his distrust of Stephen. The patriotic resistance offered by the men of Yorkshire to the Scottish invasion was an act of self-defence against hereditary enemies, rather than a hearty fulfilment of a national duty. Among the great earls there is not one whose course can be certainly affirmed to have been thoroughly consistent. The earl of Chester, although, whenever he prevailed on himself to act, he took part against Stephen, fought rather on his own account than on Matilda's; Geoffrey de Mandeville accepted the title of earl of Essex from both parties and pillaged both sides; the earl of Leicester, a mighty man in Normandy as in England, made his alliances and asserted his neutrality as he pleased. His brother, the count of Meulan, whose advice had led Stephen to attack the bishops, condescended to avail himself of the same policy¹. The action of the clergy is scarcely more justifiable. Aiming at the position of an arbitrator, Henry of Winchester found himself arguing on each side alternately instead of judging: and his position was such as to prevent Archbishop Theobald, who seems to have held consistently, though not energetically, to the empress, from exercising any authority over his brethren. The decided success of one or other of the competitors for the crown might have justified the clergy in either adhesion or resistance; but this was wanting²; no one cared enough for either Stephen or Matilda to declare the indefeasible right of either crowned king or legitimate succession. The citizens of London, although from inclination they probably would have supported Stephen, were obliged to receive the empress and offer for a short time a politic submission³.

The clergy aim at arbitration.

Attitude of London.

The difficulties of the case seemed to admit of no decision save that of military success; and this neither party was strong enough to achieve. Stephen, by destroying the government

¹ Ord. Vit. xii. 44.

² Gesta Stephani, pp. 98, 99.

³ W. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. iii. § 28; Gesta Stephani, pp. 76, 77; Hen. Hunt. fol. 225.

Weakness of machinery, had deprived himself of the power of raising a national force ; and the mercenaries whom his heroic wife collected on the continent alienated the people whom it was his policy to conciliate. The party of the empress, on the other hand, was mainly supported by the counties in which the personal influence of her brother was strong, and by the adventurers whom she could win to her side by promises. In vain did she go through the process of election as lady of England, hold her courts, and issue her charters in royal form : she had not learned wisdom or conciliation, and threw away her opportunities as lavishly as did her rival.

This wearisome story of tergiversation and selfish intrigues, although it scarcely concerns constitutional history directly, has a most important bearing indirectly upon it, as showing the evils from which the nation escaped. It was the period at which for once the feudal principle got its own way in England ; it proved the wisdom of the Conqueror and his sons in repressing that principle, and it forced on the nation and its rulers those reforms by which in the succeeding reign the recurrence of such a result was made impossible.

Matilda elected sovereign April 8, 1141.

Incidental importance of the period.

The storm of party warfare, as William of Newburgh stated, subsided gradually. The changes in the popedom put an end to the legation of Bishop Henry¹ ; the death of Earl Robert removed the main stay of the strength of the empress², and the second generation of combatants came into the first ranks with somewhat freer hands. The exhaustion of both sides gave a breathing time, although it was incompetent to restore the national strength or unity. The clergy recovered their influence first, and compelled the king to guarantee as far as he could their personal safety : a series of ecclesiastical disputes followed,

The storm subsides.

¹ The legation of Henry of Winchester was granted by Innocent II, who died in 1143. Celestine II, who succeeded him, was hostile to Stephen, and Lucius II, who followed in 1144, although friendly to the bishop, did not renew his commission. Eugenius III, who acted under the advice of S. Bernard and was generally opposed to Stephen, gave the legation to Archbishop Theobald in or before the year 1150.

² Earl Robert died in 1147; Ann. Theokesb: Miles of Hereford at Christmas, 1143; J. Hexham: Geoffrey de Mandeville in 1144; H. Hunt. fol. 224.

which diverted the attention of the bishops from general politics, and threw the king and his brother again more heartily together¹. In A.D. 1147 the preaching of the Crusade withdrew from England many of the adventurous spirits who had been disciplined for rapine by the late events². In A.D. 1149 Henry of Anjou, the son of the empress, to whom in his grandfather's time the oath of fealty had been taken in England and in Normandy, was knighted by the king of Scots³, and a gathering of the barons of Western England, in which the supporters of the empress were chiefly found, threatened a renewal of hostilities. But several years elapsed before Henry saw his opportunity. Having by his father's death gained a firm standing-ground in France, he added, by his politic marriage, the county of Poitou and the duchy of Guienne to Anjou and Normandy⁴. An attempt made by Stephen, with the aid of Lewis VII, to seize the latter territory, was the first note of the renewed struggle. In A.D. 1152⁵ Stephen proposed to the assembled bishops that his son Eustace should be associated with him in the kingdom. The prelates, under the influence of Theobald, refused, and suffered forfeiture, which however, with his usual irresolution, Stephen soon after recalled. In the following year Henry came to England and raised a native army⁶; and the horrors of active warfare were repeated: not however on so large a scale as before, for Stephen was conscious of his weakness, and Henry was now, as ever, economical of human life. A decisive battle accordingly was avoided; and when on one occasion the two rivals stood face to face, the great nobles intervened and compelled them to make a truce. Henry of Huntingdon, in describing the attitude of Close of the struggle.

Rise of Henry II.

The bishops refuse to accept Eustace as king.

Henry takes the command against him.

¹ Hen. Hunt. fol. 225.

² See R. de Monte (Bouquet, xiii. 291); Osborn, De expugnatione Lyxbonensi, in the Memorials of Richard I, vol. i. pp. cxliv. sq.

³ Hen. Hunt. fol. 226; J. Hexham (ed. Raine), p. 159.

⁴ Geoffrey of Anjou gave up Normandy to Henry, and Lewis received his homage for it in the summer of 1151; Geoffrey died soon after. The divorce of Lewis and Eleanor took place in March 1152, and the marriage of Henry in May following. R. de Monte (Bouquet, xiii. 292).

⁵ Hen. Hunt. fol. 226; Gervase, c. 1371.

⁶ He crossed over to England within the octave of the Epiphany, 1153. R. de Monte. 'Ne tamen hoc [his success against Stephen at Crowmarsh] alienigenae aseribant viribus suis, nostro præcipue milite nitebatur.' Joh. Salisb. Polycr. vi. 18.

Mediation of the barons.

the baronage on this occasion, shows how clearly he understood the real objects of that body. 'Then arose the barons, or rather the betrayers, of England, treating of concord, although they loved nothing better than discord: but they would not join battle, for they desired to exalt neither of the two, lest if the one were overcome, the other should be free to govern them: they knew that so long as one was in awe of the other he could exercise no royal authority upon them¹.' The death however of Eustace reduced Stephen's stake in the struggle². The archbishop and bishop Henry, moved at last by the distress of the country, and strengthened by the support of the pope, made a resolute effort for conciliation, and after some preliminary meetings a peace was made at Wallingford and completed at Westminster³, in which the national claims for good government were strongly insisted upon, and an elaborate plan of reform was drawn up. The result was stated in the form of a treaty to settle the succession. Each of the parties had something to surrender and each something to secure. Henry gave up the present possession of the throne in consideration of the right of succession; Stephen, who had other children besides Eustace, gave up their title to the crown to secure to them the continental estates which he had possessed before his unlucky promotion. He adopted Henry as his heir of the kingdom of England, and Henry did homage and swore fealty: and the nobles on both sides followed, doing homage and swearing fealty to both princes. The rights of Stephen's son William were guaranteed, and a large augmentation of property promised

Peace of Wallingford and Westminster.

Succession secured to Henry.

¹ H. Hunt. fol. 227; Gervase, 1373.

² Eustace died in August, 1153. Gervase, c. 1374; R de Monte.

³ Negotiations began at Wallingford before the death of Eustace (H. Hunt. fol. 227, Gervase, 1374), in consequence of the attitude of the barons; R. de Monte gives Nov. 6 as the date of the agreement; towards the end of November the king and Henry met at Winchester; Stephen adopted Henry as his son, and both proceeded to London, where the Westminster treaty was promulgated, before Christmas. On the 13th of January, 1154, Henry, at Oxford, received the fealty of the barons: there was a conference at Dunstable soon after on the question of destroying the castles. Thence they went into Kent, where Henry, discovering a plot against his life, left Stephen, and returned by way of London to Normandy, during Lent. H. Hunt. fol. 228; Gervase, cc. 1373-1375.

him: all the kinsmen of the royal family and the clergy were also bound to the agreement. Two significant clauses complete the act. 'In the business of the kingdom,' the king says, 'I will work by the counsel of the duke; but in the whole realm of England, as well in the duke's part as my own, I will exercise royal justice¹.'

116. The scheme of reform, which was drawn up at Wallingford², has not been preserved in the form of a document, but may be extracted from the somewhat rhetorical accounts of the contemporary historians. The statement made by Roger Hoveden³, that Henry, in order to enforce the necessary measures, undertook the office of justiciar, is perhaps an exaggeration, although he distinctly claimed that they should be carried out as a part of the pacification⁴: and, when he himself became king, he seems to have looked on them as furnishing him with a programme of the restoration of order. They are stated as follows. (1) The royal rights, which had everywhere been usurped by the barons, are to be resumed by the king. (2) The estates which had been seized by intruders are to return to the lawful owners who had enjoyed them in King Henry's days. (3) The adulterine or unlicensed castles⁵, by whom-of reform.

The scheme

¹ Foedera, i. 18: from the Red Book of the Exchequer. See also Will. Newb. lib. i. cap. 30.

² Matt. Paris (ed. Wats), p. 86.

³ 'Rex vero constituit ducem justitiarium Angliæ sub ipso et omnia regni negotia per eum terminabantur,' Hoveden, i. 212. This is one of the additions made by Hoveden to the earlier materials which he was using; it has no contemporaneous authority, and is extremely unlikely to be true. Even if it were true, Henry stayed in England too short a time after the pacification to exercise any direct authority. John of Hexham however says that it was one part of the agreement 'quod Henricus dux negotia regni diserneret'; ed. Raine, p. 170.

⁴ Hen. Hunt. fol. 228. This was at Dunstable early in 1154: 'Displecebat enim duci, quod castella post mortem Henrici regis in pessimos usus circumquaque constructa non diruerentur, sicut confirmatum et sancitum fuerat inter eos in concordia firmissimo foedere. . . . Quibusdam tamen suorum castellis regis clementia vel versutia parcens, pacti communionem debilitare videbatur. Dux igitur super hoc regem angarians, repulsam quidem passus est.' Ibid.

⁵ Robert de Monte gives 375 as the number; Bouquet, xiii. 296. On this point John of Hexham furnishes further contemporary evidence: 'Continuo exiit edictum ab eis per omnes provincias violentias comprimi, direptiones interdicti, milites conductitios et sagittarios exterarum nationum a regno ejici, munitionesque quas quisque in sua possessione post mortem

The scheme of reform arranged between Stephen and Henry.

soever erected during the present reign, to the number of eleven hundred and fifteen are to be destroyed. (4) The king is to re-stock the desolate country, employ the husbandmen, and as far as possible restore agriculture and replace the flocks and herds in the impoverished pastures. (5) The clergy are to have their peace, and not to be unduly taxed. (6) The jurisdiction of the sheriffs is to be revived, and men are to be placed in the office who will not make it a means of gratifying private friendship or hatred, but will exercise due severity and will give every man his own : thieves and robbers are to be hanged. (7) The armed forces are to be disbanded and provided for : 'the knights are to turn their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks ;' the Flemings are to be relegated to their workshops, there to labour for their lords, instead of exacting labour as lords from the English. The general security is to be maintained, commerce to be encouraged, and a uniform coinage to be struck ¹. This very comprehensive project throws great light on Henrici regis construxerat dirui. Justitia ergo et pax ubique in regno revocata est.' Ed. Raine, p. 171.

¹ The following is the statement of Ralph de Diceto, cc. 527, 528 : 'Ducem siquidem Normannorum rex in filium arrogavit ; ei et in eum jus suum transtulit et potestatem, sibi quoad vixerit regiae dignitatis solam imaginem reservavit. Et si propheticum illud attenderis, jam se induit genitore, jam ducem arrogavit in filium. In participem regni, et postmodum successorem, universi ducem recipient. In rege ducem, in duce regem singuli venerabuntur. Et ut regem Stephanum nunc regem intelligas, antiqua regni privilegia restaurare proponit. Regalia passim a proceribus usurpata recipiet, munitiones suis fundatae temporibus diruentur, quarum numerus usque ad undecies centum quindecim excrevit. Ut autem ad minora recurras, praediis assignabit colonos, insularios aedificiis, nemoribus saltuarios, feris ditabit indagines, ovibus decorabit montana, pascua replebit armentis. Clerus nunc demum dominabitur, pacis tranquillitatem habebit. Defensivae locorum, seu vicecomites, locis statuentur statutis : non in votum exercendae cupiditatis abibunt, non quenquam ex odio persequentur. Non gratificabuntur amicis, non indulgentiis crimina sublevabunt, suum cuique reservabunt ex integro. Metu pocnarum nonnullos afficient, praemiorum exhortatione plurimos excitabunt : fures terrebuntur in furca ; praedones sententia capitali plectentur ; milites caligati gladios suos in usum vomeris ligonisque convertent. A castris ad aratra, a tentoriis ad ergasteria Flandrensium plurimi revocabuntur, et quas nostratibus operas indixerunt, dominis suis ex necessitate persolvent. Quid multis ? Ab excubiis fatigati a communi laetitia respirabunt : innocens et quieti rusticitas otio relevabitur ; negotiatores commerciorum vicissitudo locupletabit. Forma publica percussa eadem in regno celebris erit ubique moneta.' The prophecy of Merlin referred to is 'Nocebit possidenti ex impiis pietas, the past as well as on the future, and it is extremely unfortunate that the exact means by which it was to be carried into execution are not recorded. It seems to have been too much for Stephen, whose spirit was now broken; and Henry, in a meeting at Dunstable before he left England, had to urge the king strongly to do his duty. The last year of the reign was accordingly devoted to the undoing of the work that seventeen years of war and anarchy had done. Stephen had very incompletely performed his task when he died in October 1154, leaving the throne, for the first time since the Conquest without a competitor, to the great sovereign who succeeded him.

Stephen begins the reforms.

He dies.

The reign of Stephen is one of the most important in our whole history, as exemplifying the working of causes and principles which had no other opportunity of exhibiting their real tendencies. It was a period of unprecedented general misery, and a most potent lesson for later times and foreign countries. The moral and social results of it are indeed more distinctly traceable under Henry II, but there can be little doubt that even before the king's death it had had the effect of creating a feeling of national unity among Normans and English, as well as an intense longing for peace. The comparative rarity of notices touching the social life of the period, in the historical memorials of the reign, render it difficult to form any minute conclusions on the material growth of the nation. But that it was a period of great social change there can be no question, when we compare the reign that followed it with the three reigns that preceded it. Some part of the result is of course owing to the equal government and lasting peace of the reign of Henry I: but it would be to disregard the consistent lessons of all history, if we were to suppose that the terrible discipline of anarchy, prolonged for nearly twenty years, during which, donec sese genitore induerit.' Geoff. Mon. vii. 3. The terms of the agreement are thus given by Robert de Monte: 'Quod dux post mortem regis, si enim superviveret, pacifice et absque contradictione regnum haberet; juratum est etiam quod possessiones quae direptae erant ab invasoribus ad antiquos et legitimos possessores revocarentur, quorum fuerant tempore Henrici optimi regis. De castellis etiam quae post mortem praedicti regis facta fuerant, ut everterentur, quorum multitudo ad CCLXXV. summam excreverat.' Bouquet, xiii. 296.

Constitutional importance of Stephen's reign.

Advance of liberty.

the pressure of the legal government being removed, opportunity was given for every sort of development and combination, had no effect in opening the eyes of men in general to the sources of their strength and the causes of their weakness. Although the annalists tell mainly of the feudal usurpations and oppressions, there are not wanting indications that in the town populations, where feudal rule was exercised under more restriction and with less impunity, an important advance towards liberty resulted from the abeyance of government; or at least that the municipal unity was able so far to hold its own as to prevent disintegration in one of the rising elements of society. But this is an inference from later events rather than a distinctly recorded fact of the reign.

Close of the period.

The Norman period closes with the accession of Henry II, whose statesmanlike activity, whose power of combining and adapting that which was useful in the old systems of government with that which was desirable and necessary under the new, gives to the policy which he initiated in England almost the character of a new creation.

CHAPTER XI.

ADMINISTRATION DURING THE NORMAN PERIOD.

117. New character of the constitution.—118. The king.—119. The royal household.—120. The justiciar.—121. The chancellor.—122. The great officers.—123. The national council.—124. Earls, barons, and knights.—125. Legislative, judicial, and other business of the courts.—126. The Exchequer.—127. The Curia Regis.—128. The popular courts.—129. The Manor and Honour.—130. Royal demesne and forests.—131. The boroughs.—132. The labourer.—133. The army.—134. Innovation or development.

117. THE reigns of the Conqueror and his three successors, besides the political interest which they possess as the period of the trial and failure of feudality, have another distinct mark in English history, partly it is true resulting from the former. The Norman period, as we may call it, was the epoch of the growth of a new administrative system, having the source of its strength in the royal power. The constitution of this system distinguishes it from that of earlier and later times. In the earlier history, constitutional life seems to show itself first in the lower ranges of society, and to rise by slow degrees and unequal impulses towards the higher; in the later history, the equilibrium of the governmental system is maintained by regulating the balance between popular liberty and administrative pressure. The foundation of the administrative system marks the period that intervenes: and this foundation was the work of these four reigns. In attempting a sketch of the machinery which was created or developed for making good the hold of the king upon the nation, we must adopt a different arrangement from that under which the Anglo-Saxon polity was examined in a former chapter; and beginning with the person and office of the king, descend gradually to the consideration of the powers of the individual subject and the lowest form of collective organisation. For, under the new system, it is from the person, the household, the court, and the council, of the king that all constitutional power radiates; and in very many respects both the machinery and the terminology of government bear, down to the present day, marks of their origin in the domestic service of the palace.

New character of the constitution in Norman times.

Plan of the chapter.

Character of royalty in the Norman period.

118. The Norman idea of royalty was very comprehensive; it practically combined all the powers of the national sovereignty, as they had been exercised by Edgar and Canute, with those of the feudal theory of monarchy, which was exemplified at the time in France and the Empire; and it discarded the limitations which had been placed on either system, in England by the constitutional action of the witan, and on the Continent by the usurpations or extorted immunities of the feudatories. The king is accordingly both the chosen head of the nation and the lord paramount of the whole of the land: he is the source of justice and the ultimate resource in appeal for such equity as he is pleased to dispense; the supreme judge of his own necessities and of the method to be taken to supply them. He is in fact despotic, for there is no force that can constitutionally control him, or force him to observe the conditions to which, for his own security, or for the regular despatch of business, he may have been pleased to pledge himself. If the descendants of the Conqueror had succeeded one another by the ordinary rule of inheritance, there can be no doubt but that the forms as well as the reality of ancient liberty would have perished. Owing to the necessity however under which each of them lay, of making for himself a title in default of hereditary right, the ancient framework was not set aside; and perfunctory as to a great extent the forms of election and coronation were, they did not lose such real importance as they had possessed earlier, but furnished an important acknowledgment of the rights of the nation, as well as a recognition of the duties of the king.

Important result of the irregularity in succession.

The crown then continues to be elective: the form of coronation is duly performed: the oath of good government is taken, and the promises of the oath are exemplified in the form of charters. Of these charters only those of Henry I and Stephen are preserved; the document called the charter of William the Conqueror being a fabrication of the thirteenth or fourteenth century, composed of several fragments of his legislation thrown together in the traditional form. The recognition of the king by the people was effected by the formal acceptance at the coronation of the person whom the national council had elected, by the acts of homage and fealty performed by the tenants-in-chief, and by the general oath of allegiance imposed upon the whole people, and taken by every freeman once at least in his life. The theory that by a reversal of these processes, that by renunciation of homage, by absolution from the oath of allegiance, and by a declaration that the rights conferred by consecration had been forfeited, the person so chosen could be set aside, was, owing to the existence of competition for the throne, kept prominently before the eyes of the people; and in the speech of Henry of Winchester, proposing the election of the Empress Matilda, it is explicitly stated¹. The captivity of Stephen is alleged as a sentence of the judgment of God, not less convincing than the legal result of trial by battle: on this, as the summary decision of the Almighty, the vacancy of the throne is made to depend, but the neglect of the solemn promises of good government is forcibly dwelt upon as the justification of that decision. The oath of allegiance taken to Stephen is not mentioned, because the previous oath taken to Matilda in her father's reign is specially insisted on. This declaration, although like the charters themselves it was meant to serve a temporary purpose, stands on record as an important statement of principle: it was met by Stephen's friends not by counter allegations, but by intercessions: neither his misconduct nor the legality of his punishment is formally denied. Yet against this significant circumstance must be set the fact that no attempt was made to crown the empress; the legate himself simply proposes that she should be elected lady of England and Normandy. It is Election and charters.

Right of deposition.

Argument for the election of Matilda.

¹ Will. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. iii. § 44.

Matilda never crowned queen.

just possible that the consecration which she had once received as empress¹ might be regarded as superseding the necessity of a new ceremony of the kind; but it is far more likely that, so long as Stephen was alive and not formally degraded, the right conferred on him by coronation was regarded as so far infeasible that no one else could be allowed to share it.

Right of inheritance.

But whilst the elective principle was maintained in its fulness where it was necessary or possible to maintain it, it is quite certain that the right of inheritance, and inheritance by primogeniture, was recognised as co-ordinate. The dying orders of the Conqueror were so worded as neither to deny the elective right of the English nation, nor to annul the inchoate claims of his eldest son, even when he intended to evade both². The arrangement made by William Rufus and Duke Robert at Caen in A.D. 1091, that each should be heir to the other in case of his dying childless³, proves that something more was involved than the ancient principle of the eligibility of all the members of the royal house; that a power of disposing of the crown was supposed to reside in its wearer, and that the inheritance of England was not materially distinguished from that of Normandy. True, the recognition of the duke of Normandy by his barons was in a manner analogous to that of the king of England by his witan; but in Normandy the right of hereditary succession was established by the precedents of many generations⁴. The measures taken by Henry I for securing the crown to his own children, whilst they prove the acceptance of the hereditary principle, prove also the importance of strengthening it by the recognition of the elective theory. He did not go so far as his contemporaries in France and the Set aside by the Conqueror.

Measures taken by Henry I to regulate the succession.

¹ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1114.

² 'Neminem Angliceregni constituo heredem, sed aeterno Conditori Cujus sum et in Cujus manu sunt omnia illud commendo: non enim tantum decus hereditario jure possedi.' Ord. Vit. vii. 15.

³ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1091.

⁴ William of Jumièges particularly mentions the process by which the Norman dukes before their death procured the acceptance of their successors: lib. ii. c. 22; iv. 20. 'Meum est mihi illum subrogare, vestrum est illi fidem servare,' are the words addressed by Rollo to his lords on his death-bed.

Empire, and actually obtain the formal election and coronation of his heir; but in A.D. 1116, in a great council at Salisbury, homage was done and oaths of fealty taken to his son William¹; in A.D. 1126, at London, the whole council of the kingdom swore that if the king should die without a male heir the empress should be maintained in possession of the realm of England²; a similar oath, in A.D. 1131, was taken at Northampton³; and after the birth of Henry II, which occurred in A.D. 1133, we are expressly told by Roger of Hoveden that the prelates, earls, and barons of the whole of the king's dominions swore fealty to the empress and her little son whom he appointed to be king after him⁴. In like manner, in A.D. 1152, Stephen demanded the recognition of Eustace as his heir, and even went so far, no doubt under pressure applied by Lewis VII, as to insist that he should be anointed and crowned⁵. He was indeed defeated, as we have seen, by the resolution of the bishops, but Constance, the wife of Eustace, is said in after days to have borne the title of queen⁶; and the importance which was attached to the adoption of Henry II by Stephen, under the treaty of Wallingford, shows that the rule commonly adopted in the descent of fiefs was becoming the accepted theory of succession in the case of the crown also.

Oaths three times taken to the empress.

Stephen fails to secure the crown for Eustace.

The importance attaching to the position of the queen is not a novelty of the Norman period; the history of Eadburga, the treacherous wife of Brihtric⁷, had given it a peculiar interest

The queen.

¹ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1116.

² Cont. Flor. Wig. A.D. 1126; Will. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. i. § 2.

³ Will. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. i. § 6: 'Priscam fidem apud eos qui dederant novavit, ab his qui non dederant accepit.'

⁴ Hoveden, i. 187: 'Fecit archiepiscopus et comites et barones totius suae dominationis jurare fidelitates Matildi imperatrici filiae suae, et Henrico filio ejus adhuc minimo, et constituit eum regem post se.'

⁵ Hen. Hunt. fol. 227; Gerv. cc. 1373-1375. See above, p. 331.

⁶ Art de Vérifier les Dates, ix. 385. The only evidence that I can find for the statement is contained in two letters, one of the viscount of Beziers, the other of the common council of Toulouse, in which she is so spoken of. Bouquet, xvi. 69, 71.

⁷ According to Asser, who cites Alfred as his authority, the West-Saxons, after the misconduct of Eadburga, refused to allow to the king's wife the name or position of queen: and Ethelwulf's second marriage, together with the coronation and queenly title of his wife Judith, was one ground of his being set aside by Ethelbald in 856. Asser, M. H. B. 471. However this may have been in Wessex, Ethelswitha the wife of Burhred was of queens.

Coronation

Their property, court, and authority.

Position of the heir.

many centuries earlier : and Judith the wife of Ethelwulf had received a very solemn consecration from the archbishop of Rheims. The queens of William the Conqueror, Henry I, and Stephen play a considerable part in the history of their husbands' reigns. The wives of the first two of these kings received special coronation apart from their husbands¹; they held considerable estates which they administered through their own officers, and which were frequently composed of escheated honours; they had their own chancellors²; they acted occasionally as regents or guardians of the kingdom in the absence of the king, and with authority which, if it did not supersede that of the justiciar, had at least an honorary precedence³. The payment of queen's gold, that is of a mark of gold to the queen out of every hundred marks of silver paid, in the way of fine or other feudal incident, to the king, even if it is not recognisable in Domesday, is probably as old as the reign of Henry I⁴. The acknowledged importance of her position, the real power and influence with which she was trusted, is in somewhat marked contrast with the treatment of the king's heir. Whether it was to avoid the jealousy of the barons, or to limit the ambition of the presumptive successor, neither William the Conqueror nor Henry I crowned queen of Mercia (C. D. cccxcix). Eadgifu the wife of Edward the Elder subscribes charters only as mater regis. Elfhrytha the wicked wife of Edgar subscribes charters as queen. Emma the wife of Ethelred was also queen, and the rite of crowning the queen appears in the rituals from this time. Possibly some tradition of the old prejudice may have led Lewis VII to insist so strongly on the coronation of his daughter when married to the heir of the English crown. See Robertson, Essays, pp. 166-171; Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 565; iii. 48; iv. 179.

¹ The wife of the Conqueror was crowned by the archbishop of York, at Whitsuntide 1068. Flor. Wig. The coronation of Matilda the wife of Henry I, by Anselm, Nov. 11, 1100, and that of Adeliza his second wife, Jan. 29, 1121, by Archbishop Ralph, are also specially noticed. Matilda, Stephen's queen, was crowned at Canterbury with her husband; Gerv. c. 1588.

² Bernard bishop of S. David's was chancellor to Matilda the first wife of Henry I, and Godfrey of Bath to his second. Flor. Wig. A.D. 1115; Cont. Flor. Wig. A.D. 1123.

³ Matilda the wife of Henry I, acting with the 'common counsel' of the nobles in the king's absence, sent Archbishop Ralph to Rome in 1116. Eadmer, p. 118; Flor. Wig. A.D. 1116. Charters issued by her are in Elmham, p. 354; Mon. Angl. i. 242; and Hist. Abend. ii. 98; cf. p. 104. Stephen's queen negotiated and commanded during his captivity, and so far maintained the party of her husband that it fell to pieces on her death.

⁴ Madox, Exchequer, p. 240; Eyton's Shropshire, xii. 156. It is probably the Gersumna reginac of Domesday, i. 154, 238. See Ellis, Intr. i. 172-175.

seems to have given to his son a separate establishment by way of appanage¹. The daughters also were as a rule dowered with treasure, not with land. The illegitimate sons of Henry I were however largely endowed, one of them receiving an extensive and important earldom²: and the kinsmen of the king in the second degree were favoured in the same way³. But the rebellion of Robert against the Conqueror, and the youth of the etheling William, may perhaps explain more naturally the apparent over-caution of the father in each case.

The king's
sons.

119. The great officers of the household form the first circle round the throne, and furnish the king with the first elements of a ministry of state. There is from the very first some difficulty in drawing the line that separates their duties as servants of the court from their functions as administrators; a difficulty which is not to be ascribed merely to the deficiency of early records, but appears partly to be the result of a growing policy. It may also have arisen partly from the combination of two or more distinct systems.

Great officers of the household.

The four indispensable servants of the primitive household are enumerated in the Salian law, as the major, infertor, scantio, and *mariscalcus*⁴. The first of these answers to the praefectus or heah-gerefa of the Anglo-Saxons, the second to the dapifer or discthegn; the scantio to the pincerna or cup-bearer; the mariscalcus to the horsthegn or *strator*⁵. In this early arrange-

The four necessary servants.

¹ William the son of Henry I did however issue writs, apparently as his father's representative: two of which are given by Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. clxxix; others are in Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 76, and in Elmhams's Chronicle, pp. 353, 354.

² Robert earl of Gloucester had the earldom conferred by his father, but the lordship of Gloucester, on which the title was based, was the inheritance of his wife, the daughter of Robert Fitz-Hamon. Reginald earl of Cornwall got his earldom in the struggles of Stephen's reign; according to the Gesta Stephani, by marriage (pp. 65, 66); according to William of Malmesbury, by the gift of his brother the earl of Gloucester; Hist. Nov. ii. § 34.

³ Of this Stephen is himself the most important instance.

⁴ Lex Salica (Herold's Text), xi. 6. The Capitula Remedii mention the camerarius, buticularius, senescalcus, judex publicus, and conestabulus. The Alemannic law enumerates, 'seniscalcus, mariscalcus, cocus, and pistor.' The 'seniscalcus' is said to mean the senior servant. Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 401; iii. 420.

⁵ The praefectus or praepositus of the king's household, his steward or

Officers of the Karolingian court.

ment may be traced the germ of later differences, for the praefectus and the strator, the master of the household and the master of the horse, must have forced their way into public duties much earlier than the caterer and the butler. The Karolingian court had a slightly different rule: the four chief officers are the marshal, the steward, the butler, and the chamberlain¹; the major of the old law disappearing, and his functions devolving, as we know from later history, partly on the dapifer, seneschal or steward, and partly on the chamberlain or accountant. The latter distribution of dignity was permanent, and was observed, with some modifications, down to the latest days of the Empire, in the electoral body, where the Count Palatine was high steward, the duke of Saxony marshal, the king of Bohemia cup-bearer, and the margrave of Brandenburg chamberlain. A similar system had been borrowed by the Norman dukes from their titular masters: Normandy had its steward or seneschal,—for whom even the name of *comes palatinus*² is claimed,—its cup-bearer, its constable, and its chamberlain; and these had become, it would be difficult to say how early, hereditary grand serjeanties. At the time of the Conquest William Fitz-Osbern was, as his father had been, dapifer and comes palatii. The chamberlainship was hereditary in the house of Tankerville; the lords of Hommet were hereditary constables. The royal household in England reproduced the ducal household of Normandy, and under the same conditions; for although the exact dates for the foundation

In the Empire.

In Normandy.

In the court of the Norman kings.

gerefa, occurs occasionally in Bede: Redfrith is praefectus to Egbert king of Kent (H. E. iv. 1): he is apparently the eyninges-gerefa of the laws; Schmid, Gesetze, p. 599. The disethegn or dapifer is mentioned in the Cod. Dipl. dcxxv, deceviii, &c. Oslac the pinerna of Ethelwulf was also his father-in-law; and several others who bore the same title are mentioned. The strator or staller was a more important person: Alfred the strator of Edward the Confessor is mentioned by Flor. Wig. A.D. 1052; and Osgod Clapa the staller, ibid. A.D. 1047. Kemble, Saxons, ii. 108-111.

¹ G. L. von Maurer, Hofverfassung, i. 189. The dispensator of Harold is mentioned by Flor. Wig. A.D. 1040; Kemble identifies him with the camerarius or cubicularius, who occasionally appears in the charters; Saxons, ii. 107. Robert the dispensator of the Conqueror is mentioned by Ord. Vit. viii. 8, and in Domesday; Ellis, Intr. i. 478.

² Stapleton (Rotuli Saecarii Normanniae, vol. i. p. xvii) gives an extract from a cartulary of Trinity, Rouen, of A.D. 1068, which speaks of William Fitz-Osbern, 'dapiferi, qui comes erat palatii.' of the offices cannot be given, nor even a satisfactory list of their early holders, it would seem certain that, before the end of the reign of Henry II, the high stewardship had become hereditary in the house of Leicester, the office of constable in the descendants of Miles of Hereford, that of chamberlain in the family of Vere, and the butlership in that of Albini¹. But whilst these offices were becoming hereditary, the duties which had originally belonged to them were falling into the hands of another class of ministers, whose titles cause a sort of duplication of official nomenclature which is somewhat puzzling, and which even to the present day occasionally causes confusion². The justiciar, the treasurer, and the marshal take their places besides the high steward, the chamberlain, and the constable. Not that the history of these offices is in exact conformity: the constable, as

The place of hereditary officers supplied by new officials.

The offices have different histories.

¹ It is however to be noticed that each of these names appears to have been given to several persons at once; there are certainly several dapiferi and pincernae at the same time. These were honorary distinctions probably, although they may in some instances have been grand serjeanties. The dignity that emerges ultimately may be the chief of each order; the high steward, the great butler, the lord high chamberlain. In later times, when these offices had long become hereditary, and substitutes for their holders were required, they were instituted with special reference to the household; the lord steward of the household and the lord chamberlain are still court officials. Something of the same kind may have taken place in the reign of Henry I, when the ministerial offices were founded.

² The Liber Niger Seaccarii contains a document of the age of Henry II, called 'Constitutio domus regis de procuracionibus,' which gives the daily allowances of the several inmates of the palace: it is difficult to understand, and domestic servants and great officers of state are mingled in amusing disorder. The following are perhaps the most important particulars for our present purpose: (1) the chancellor has associated with him a Magister Scriptorii; (2) the dapifer, who has the same allowance as the chancellor, is mentioned in connexion with a magister dispensator panis, a clericus expensae panis, and a company of bakers; (3) the larder has its staff of officials, cooks and kitchen-servants; (4) the buttery, under the magister pincernu, whose allowance is the same as that of the steward and chancellor, has under him a magister dispensator butleriae, with several subordinates, and four 'escantiones;'; (5) the master chamberlain, the treasurer, the constable, and the master marshal have the same allowances as the steward and chancellor; (6) under the master marshal John (the ancestor of the earls marshal of later times) are four marshals, who again have servants of their own. This will account for the numbers of officers who bear the same names. It exhibits further the retention of the primitive names in the now overgrown establishment of the palace. Probably all the heads of departments were important men. Roger the Larderer was made a bishop by Henry I, a fact which does not show that the king bestowed a bishopric on a mere servant, but that a person who was qualified to be a bishop did not scruple to undertake the office of larderer.

long as he exists at all, retains no small share of his ancient powers; the high steward, on the other hand, sees every one of his really important functions transferred to the justiciar; the office of marshal becomes hereditary, those of justiciar and treasurer continue to be filled by nomination or even by purchase; and only those offices which escape the dangers of hereditary transmission continue to have a real constitutional importance.

Growth of the justiciar-
ship.

120. The chief minister of the Norman kings is the person to whom the historians and later constitutional writers give the name of justiciarius, with or without the prefix summus or *capitalis*¹. The growth of his functions was gradual, and even the history of the title is obscure; for it is often bestowed on officers who, although they discharged the functions which at a later period were attached to it, are not so styled by contemporaries or in formal documents. The office appears first as the lieutenancy of the kingdom or vice-royalty exercised during the king's absence from England. In this capacity William Fitz-Osbern, the steward of Normandy, and Odo of Bayeux, acted during the Conqueror's visit to the Continent in 1067; they were left, according to William of Poitiers, the former to govern the north of England, and the latter to hold rule in Kent, in the king's stead, 'vice sua'; Florence of Worcester describes them as 'custodes Angliæ,' and Ordericus Vitalis gives to their office the name of 'præfectura'². It would seem most probable that William Fitz-Osbern, at least, was left in his character of steward, and that the Norman seneschalship was thus the origin of the English justiciarship. In 1074, when the king was again in Normandy, William of Warenne and Richard of Bienfaite were left in charge of England; to these Ordericus³, who lived a generation later, gives the title 'præcipui Angliæ justitiarum'; but there is no reason to suppose that the name as yet was definitely attached to a particular post. On another occasion the office seems to

Holders of the office.

¹ It is observable that in the ordinance referred to in the last note there is no provision for the justiciar. He was not in that capacity a member of the household, although the chancellor was.

² Will. Pict. ed. Maseres, p. 151; Ord. Vit. iv. 1; Flor. Wig. A.D. 1067.

³ Ord. Vit. iv. 14.

have been committed to Lanfranc¹, Gosfrid of Coutances, and Robert of Mortain. In all these cases, although the function discharged was one which belonged to the later justiciar, and they are accordingly stages in the development of that office, it would seem safer to give to the persons employed the more general name of lieutenant or vicegerent. There is no evidence to show that they held any such position during the king's presence in England, or that they exercised even in his absence supreme judicial functions to the exclusion of other great officers of the court. In the placitum held at Pennenden in 1075 Gosfrid acted as president of the court, and in similar trials touching the rights of Ely and Rochester Odo of Bayeux appeared in the same position².

Question as to the title borne.

Under William Rufus the functions of the confidential minister were largely extended; the office became a permanent one, and included the direction of the whole judicial and financial arrangements of the kingdom. It is probable that the king, who had no great aptitude for any other business than that of war, was inclined at first to throw the cares of government on his uncle Odo and the bishop of Durham, William of S. Carileph; to these prelates later writers give the title of justiciar³. But their treason opened the king's eyes to the imprudence of trusting so great authority to such powerful and ambitious personages. Ranulf Flambard, who succeeded to the place of chief adviser⁴, seems to have earned his master's confidence by his ingenious and un-

Holders of the office under William Rufus.

¹ Dugdale, Orig. Jurid. 20, quoted in Foss's Judges, i. 11; Liber Eliensis, ed. Stewart, i. pp. 256-260. The author of the life of Lanfranc, Milo Crispin, a contemporary of Anselm, seems to imply the same thing: 'Quando gloriosus rex Willelmus morabatur in Normannia, Lanfrancus erat princeps et custos Angliæ, subjectis sibi omnibus principibus, et jurantibus in his quæ ad defensionem et dispositionem vel pacem pertinebant regni, secundum leges patriæ.' cap. 15.

² At Pennenden, in 1075 (above, p. 277), Gosfrid of Coutances must have been acting as justiciar; he is described in the Textus Roffensis as 'qui in loco regis fuit et justitiam illam tenuit.' Ang. Sac. i. 335. For the Rochester and Ely cases see Ang. Sac. i. 339; Liber Eliensis (ed. Stewart), i. 252.

³ 'Odo episcopus Bajocensis, justitiarius et princeps totius Angliæ.' Hen. Hunt. fol. 212. 'Willelmo Dunelmensi episcopo commendata erat rerum publicarum administratio.' W. Malmesb. G. R. iv. § 306.

⁴ 'Summus regiarum procurator opum et justitiarius factus est.' Ord. Vit. x. 18. 'Regiæ voluntatis maximus exsecutor.' Eadmer, i. p. 20.

Career of Ranulf
Flambard.

scrupulous devices for increasing the royal revenue, and he may be looked on as the first consolidator of the functions of the office. It is impossible not to suspect that he had a share in the work of the Domesday Survey¹. He was a native of the diocese of Bayeux, in which Caen, the seat of the Norman treasury, was situated, and had been brought up among the inferior officials of the ducal court². He had held, in the days of Edward the Confessor, a small estate in Hampshire³, possibly acquired in the service of the Norman bishop William of London. He was afterwards attached to the household of Bishop Maurice, whom he left to become chaplain to the king, an office which he had held for some years before he came into prominent importance⁴. As the annals of the Conqueror's reign furnish the names of no great lawyers or financiers, as Ranulf was employed at court during the later years of it, and as his subsequent career proves him to have possessed great ability, if not a systematic policy of administration, it is not unnatural to suppose that he rendered himself useful in the compilation of the great rate-book of the kingdom. And such a supposition almost answers the objection taken to the statement of Ordericus, that he made a new survey in the reign of William Rufus, of which there is no other evidence. The chronicler may have heard that he was employed in the registration of the revenue, and may have attributed it to him as a measure adopted during his term of high office.

Titles given him.

However this may have been, and by whatever name the post was distinguished, it became in Flambard's hands all important. He is called by Florence of Worcester 'negotiorum totius regni exactor,' and 'placitator et totius regni exactor⁵:' expressions which recall the ancient identity of the gerefa with the *exactor*⁶, and suggest that one part of the royal policy was to entrust the functions which had belonged to the prefectus or high steward

¹ Above, p. 302.

² Ord. Vit. vii. 8: he had been under Robert the dispensator (above, p. 344), who had given him the name of Flambard.

³ Domesday, i. 21; Ellis, Intr. i. 420.

⁴ Monachus Dunelmensis, Ang. Sac. i. 706. He is spoken of as a clerk in the Domesday Book, i. 154, 157. Ellis, Intr. i. 420.

⁵ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1099, 1100.

⁶ Above, p. 82.

to a clerk or creature of the court. Robert Bloett, bishop of Lincoln, is called by Henry of Huntingdon 'justitiarius totius Angliæ': he may have succeeded Ranulf, but of his administration nothing is known. The next holder of the office is Bishop Roger of Salisbury. He had a history somewhat like that of Ranulf Flambard. He also was a poor priest of the neighbourhood of Caen. He had attracted Henry's notice, long before he came to the throne, by his expeditious way of celebrating divine service, had been enlisted by him as a sort of chaplain steward, and by his economy and honesty had justified the confidence reposed in him². After Henry's accession he was at first employed as chancellor, and after the reconciliation of the king with Anselm was consecrated to the see of Salisbury, being the first prelate canonically elected since the dispute about investiture had arisen. He seems to have risen at the same time to the place of justiciar³. Under his guidance, whether as chancellor or as justiciar, the whole administrative system was remodelled; the jurisdiction of the Curia regis and Exchequer was carefully organised, and the peace of the country maintained in that theoretical perfection which earned for him the title of the Sword of Righteousness⁴. He is the first justiciar who is called 'secundus a rege.' He retained the title of justiciar until his arrest by Stephen. His personal history need not be further pursued. Roger of Salisbury certainly bore the title of justiciar⁵; whether he acted as the king's lieutenant during his absence is uncertain, and even yet it must

Carcer of Bishop
Roger of Salisbury.

His administrative skill.

¹ Henry had been brought up in the bishop's court, and can scarcely have been mistaken as to his right to bear the title. He calls him distinctly 'Justitiarius totius Angliæ.' Anglia Sacra, ii. 695.

² Will. Newb. i. 6; W. Malmesb. G. R. v. § 408.

³ 'Rogerius vir magnus in saecularibus, nunc vero regis justitiarius.' Hen. Hunt. de Cont. Munli; Ang. Sac. ii. 700. 'Rogerus autem justitiarius fuit totius Angliæ et secundus a rege.' Hen. Hunt Hist. lib. vii. fol. 219. He is called justiciar also by William of Malmebury, G. R. v. § 408. 'Secundus post regem in omnibus negotiis habebatur . . . curae palatinae regniq[ue] negotiis cunctis specialius est praepositus;' Gesta Stephani, p. 46. 'Secundus enim a rege in regno praeminabat universis iudicibus et principibus;' John of Hexham, p. 125. See also Ordericus Vit. xiii. 40.

⁴ In his epitaph, Archaeologia, ii. 190.

⁵ Henry uses the term capitalis justitiarius in a charter, Foed. i. 12: 'Nisi coram me vel capitali justitiario meo;' but this may not refer to Roger.

Uncertainty
of the application of the title of justiciar.

be questioned whether the name possessed a precise official significance¹. Several other ministers receive the same name even during the time at which he was certainly in office: even the title of capitalis justitiarius is given to officers of the Curia regis who were acting in subordination to him². We have, however, been tracing the development of the office rather than the history of the title. The latter, not improbably, gained definiteness of application as the functions of the office developed. The 'magister justitiarius' of the Norman kingdom of Sicily, who possibly took his name from the Norman chief minister of England, appears soon after the middle of the twelfth century³. The title of justiza of Aragon, a minister not unlike the later chief justices of England, is first found in the twelfth century⁴. The seneschal of Normandy receives the name of justiciar under Henry II. It is only in the same reign that the office in England acquires the exclusive right to the definite name of summus or capitalis justitiarius, or justitiarius totius Angliæ.

Possible reasons for this development.

For the office, the development of which is thus only obscurely traceable, it is easier to find analogies in foreign systems than to produce a consecutive history to connect it with known antecedents. A general view of the Norman policy suggests

¹ In a letter of Henry to Anselm, dated at Rouen, he tells him that he has given notice to the justiciars to act by the archbishop's advice. Whether these were the regents or the judges, or both, may be questioned. We find the queen and the heir-apparent acting with considerable power in the king's absence. Above, p. 342; and below, p. 395.

² See below, p. 389.

³ Giannone, lib. xi. c. 4, mentions a charter of 1141 as attested by 'Henricus Ollia Dei gratia regalis justitiarius.' The marriage settlement of Queen Johanna in 1177 is signed by a 'magister justitiarius,' a 'regiæ curiæ magister justitiarius,' a 'regiæ curiæ justitiarius,' and a 'sacri regii palatii logotheta' as well. Although the Sicilian kings copied Byzantine as well as Western forms, it must not be forgotten that several of their ministers and bishops were Englishmen. Robert of Salisbury, chancellor of Sicily in 1147 (Joh. Salisb. Polycr. vii. 19; John of Hexham, c. 275), Herbert of Middlesex, bishop of Cosenza (R. Diceto, c. 628), Richard Palmer, archbishop of Messina in 1183, and two contemporaneous archbishops of Palermo, Walter and Bartholomew, were Englishmen. See Hoveden, vol. ii. pref. p. xcii.

⁴ On the Judex medius of Soprarbe and the Justitia of Aragon, see Du Cange, sub voc.; Dunham, Hist. of Spain, iv. 178-182; Hallam, M. A. ii. 49 sq.

that the form taken by the institution on English ground arose partly from the king's desire to prevent the administration falling into the hands of a hereditary noble. In a small territory like Normandy, where the duke was always at home, and where very much of the judicial business was devolved on the courts of the feudatories, an officer like the seneschal might suffice for all necessary business of state. But in England, where the king

Necessity for some such officer
in England.

could not be always resident, where the amount of public business was increasing rapidly in consequence of the political changes, and where it was of the utmost importance to avoid the creation of hereditary jurisdictions, it was absolutely necessary that a new system should be devised. The same need was felt in France; and the same tide of events which threw the administration here into the hands of Bishop Roger, brought the management of affairs there into the hands of the Abbot Suger¹. In each case we see an ecclesiastical mayor of the palace; a representative of the king in all capacities, lieutenant in his absence, chief agent in his presence; prime minister in legal, financial, and even military affairs; but prevented by his spiritual profession from founding a family of nobles or withdrawing from the crown the powers which he had been commissioned to sustain. The expedient was a transitional one; the clerical justiciars were superseded by baronial ones when Henry II felt himself strong enough to stand the risk, and occur again only under his sons, whose exigencies and whose policy compelled them to employ such ministers as they found trained to their hands, and as were otherwise qualified to act as mediators between themselves and their people.

Convenience
of having an ecclesiastic
in the office.

121. The chancellor, who at a later period entered into many

The chancellor.

¹ Suger's position at the French court is spoken of in very nearly the same terms as Roger's: 'præerat palatio;' 'nec illum a claustris cura prohiberet curia, nec a consiliis principum hunc excusaret monasterium;' 'cumque ab eo jura dictarentur nullo unquam pretio declinavit a recto;' 'præcipua regni incumbere negotia;' 'ex eo siquidem tempore, quo primum regiis est adhibitus consiliis, usque ad vitæ illius terminum constat regnum semper floruisse et in melius atque amplius, dilatatis terminis et hostibus subjugatis, fuisse provectum. Quo sublato de medio statim sceptrum regni gravem ex illius absentia sensit jacturam.' Vita Suger, lib. i. 'Rege . . . peregre jam profecto, cum vir egregius rerum dominio potiretur.' Ib. lib. ii.

The office of chancellor.

of the rights and dignities of the justiciar, appears in history very much earlier. The name, derived probably from the cancelli, or skreen behind which the secretarial work of the royal household was carried on, claims a considerable antiquity; and the offices which it denotes are various in proportion. The chancellor of the Karolingian sovereigns, succeeding to the place of the more ancient *referendarius*¹, is simply the royal notary: the archi-cancellarius is the chief of a large body of such officers associated under the name of the chancery, and is the official keeper of the royal seal. It is from this minister that the English chancellor derives his name and function. Edward the Confessor, the first of our sovereigns who had a seal, is also the first who had a chancellor: from the reign of the Conqueror the office has descended in regular succession. It seems to have been to a comparatively late period, generally if not always, at least in England, held by an ecclesiastic, who was a member of the royal household, and on a footing with the great dignitaries². The chancellor was the most dignified of the royal chaplains, if not the actual head of that body. The whole of the secretarial work of the household and court fell on the chancellor and chaplains; the keeping of the royal accounts under the treasurer and justiciar, the drawing office.

A clerical

¹ Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 409, traces the history of the Merovingian referendarius as a lay officer: the scriptores, notarii, and cancellarii seem to have been part of his staff. In the Riparian law, however, he appears with the optimates; and in the Karolingian period, the archi-cancellarius or cancellarius, who keeps the seal, becomes an important officer. Ibid. iii. 426. From the time of Lewis the Pious the chancellor was generally in holy orders. The same writer maintains that the arch-chancellor had originally nothing to do with the royal chapel, except so far as it was the storehouse of official documents, and that the union of the office of arch-chancellor and arch-chaplain dates from the reigns of the sons of Lewis. Of course the two functions had been long united before the age of Edward the Confessor, when the title of chancellor was introduced into England. The office held by Dunstan under Edred must have been very much like that of the later chancellors. Reginaldus, who attests Edward's charter to Waltham (C. D. dcccxiii), is the only person who appears as cancellarius in genuine charters. Leofric bishop of Crediton is called chancellor by Florence of Worcester, A.D. 1045. It may be remarked that the office of chancellor of a cathedral was unknown in England until some time after the Conquest; the officer who fulfilled the duties later given to the chancellor bearing the title of scholasticus.

² Above, p. 345, note 2.

up and sealing of the royal writs, and the conducting of the king's correspondence. The chancellor was, in a manner, the secretary of state for all departments¹. He was generally rewarded for his service with a bishopric, and it was not regarded as fitting that the office should be retained by him after his consecration. Of the early chancellors none are of particular eminence, or perhaps they are overshadowed by the greatness of the justiciar. The office was however held by William Giffard, whose services were influential in procuring the election of Henry I; by Roger of Salisbury himself, before his promotion to episcopal rank and to the justiciarship; and by his son, also named Roger, who was one of the victims of Stephen².

Early
chancellors.

122. The treasurer during the Norman period was the keeper of the royal treasure, which was preserved at Winchester: he was also an important member of the household, and sat in the Exchequer at Westminster, where he received the accounts of the sheriffs. William of Pont de l'Arche, who had been treasurer to Henry I, is mentioned in connexion with the seizure of the Winchester treasure by Stephen³; and the office was so important that Bishop Roger obtained it for his nephew the bishop of Ely⁴. But, like the chancellorship, it falls far below the first rank of ministerial dignities. The chamberlain was another financial officer⁵: his work was rather that of auditor or ac-

The treasurer.

The chamberlain.

¹ The words of John of Salisbury, 'Hic est qui regni leges cancellat iniquas, et mandata pii principis aequa facit,' are a curious anticipation of the history of the chancellor's equitable jurisdiction as developed at a later period. The play on the word is only a jesting one. The reference to equity is explained when it is remembered that the Curia Regis was by its very nature a court of remedial and equitable jurisdiction in the wider sense of the word equitable. See below, pp. 399, 391.

² Flor. Wig. A.D. 1102. Mr. Foss's list of the chancellors of Henry I is as follows:—William Giffard, 1100; Roger, 1101; William Giffard again, 1103; Waldric, 1104; Ranulf, 1107-1123; Geoffrey Rufus, 1124. The dates can only be regarded as approximations. The seal was kept during Henry I's reign by the magister scriptorii, as appears from the Constitutio Domus Regis (Lib. Nig. i. 341; p. 345 above); he was probably a subordinate of the chancellor in the position held in Henry II's reign by the vicechancellors. Richard, 'qui regii sigilli sub cancellario custos erat,' became a bishop in 1121. Cont. Flor. Wig.

³ Gesta Stephani, p. 5. He is called by William of Malmesbury, in conjunction with Bishop Roger, custos thesaurorum regalium; Hist. Nov. i. § 11.

⁴ Dialogus de Scaccario, i. 8.

⁵ See Madox, Hist. Exch. pp. 38 sq.

countant than that of treasurer: he held a more definite position in the household than the officers already enumerated, and in the judicial work of the country he was only less important than the justiciar.

Domestic dignities of the court.

The high-steward, constable, and marshal.

The offices of steward, butler, constable, and marshal complete the machinery of the household. The first of these, as we have already seen, was eclipsed in his most important functions by the justiciar, and makes in his official capacity no great figure in English history. The constable, who exercised the office of quartermaster-general of the court and army, and succeeded to the duties of the Anglo-Saxon staller¹; and the marshal, whose functions are scarcely distinguishable from those of the constable, reached at a comparatively early date the position of hereditary dignities. Their military functions however preserved them from falling into the class of mere grand serjeanties, and at a later period they had very great importance in the management of the army². During the

¹ Of the early functions, as well as of the rest of the history, of the constables we have not much information. The name is derived from the comes stabuli of the Byzantine court, and appears in the West as early as the days of Gregory of Tours. The duties of the constables of France are given by Du Cange, s. v.; and those of the constables of Naples by Giannone, xi. 1. But these officers are not exactly parallel with the constables of England. In Naples the constable kept the king's sword, commanded the army, appointed the quarters, disciplined the troops, and distributed the sentinels; the marshals and all other officers being his subordinates. The French office was nearly the same. In England however the marshal was not subordinate to the constable. Probably the English marshals fulfilled the duties which had been in Normandy discharged by the constables. The marshal is more distinctly an officer of the court, the constable one of the castle or army. But the obscurity of the distinction is accounted for by the hypothesis of the text.

² In the reign of Edward I the Earls Bohun and Bigod, the constable and marshal, refused to exercise their functions except in the king's presence, and helped to bring on the crisis that led to the confirmation of the charters. Carte, Hist. Engl. ii. 269, gives, from Anstis, an account of their duties at that time: 'to examine, judge, and determine whether those who owed services by their tenures answered those services by the qualities and numbers of the persons required; then to muster those whom they thought proper to admit, and to assign them quarters; and, if it was an expedition to foreign parts, to billet them into ships for their transportation, and to govern them while they were upon the sea; and upon their landing to direct into what battalions and companies they should be formed; and during the actual wars to hold court for the determinations of all offences committed against the laws of war, and for Norman reigns neither of them comes into much prominence. Miles, the constable of Gloucester, who was made earl of Hereford by the empress, and whose dignity descended to the Bohuns, is the first of the number who takes the position ordinarily associated with the title of high constable. Both the constable and the marshal had places and definite functions in the Exchequer. Somewhat of the same developing and defining process which we have traced in the justiciarship seems to have taken place in these offices. Not only was there a double set of officials, arising partly perhaps from the consolidation of the Anglo-Saxon and the Norman courts, but each of the offices seems to have been held by several co-ordinate functionaries—there are several dapiferi and camerarii¹; and as every castle had its own constable, there were many barons who had a right to call themselves the king's constables. The attainment by some one of these of the right to call himself high steward, or high constable, was doubtless a gradual proceeding; and it may conjecturally be referred to the age of Stephen when both the contending parties sought to retain their fickle partisans by the gift of honours and titles. Probably each one of these offices has a history of its own, for which only scanty materials now exist.

Consolidation of the great offices of the court.

The separation of the great functionaries of the household from those of the State is ultimately marked by the fact of the former becoming hereditary, while the latter continue to be ministerial. And this is further distinguished: the ministerial offices are saleable. The treasurer, the chancellor, even the justiciar, pays a sum of money for his office, or even renders an annual rent or ferm for it². This practice runs on to the thirteenth century, when, so many of the dignities having become hereditary, and the feeling of the nation being strongly expressed in favour of reform, the king was compelled to choose his subordinate ministers with some reference to their capacity

Court offices become hereditary:

State offices saleable.

the decision of all civil causes arising in the army concerning the rights of prisoners and booties taken, and such like.

¹ See Madox, Exchequer, chap. ii.; and p. 345 above.

² See below, pp. 383, 384.

for business. Such a history may account for much of the indefinite and complicated character of the offices of State.

Powers of these officers.

The powers of these officers were very considerable, and were extended by continual encroachments. Each dignitary of the household was a member of the Curia Regis and Exchequer, and in that capacity exercised from time to time judicial functions. Each too had under him a staff of servants over whom he exercised judicature and discipline; and this was extended to the cognisance of all offences committed or disputes arising in the department which was nominally under his management. Hence the origin of the courts of the high steward, the constable, and the marshal, which are subjects of complaint down to a late period. These courts were naturally regarded as exceptions to the common law of the land which was administered by the justiciar or under his superintendence.

Judicial powers over their own departments.

The great council of the kingdom.

123. The witenagemot of the kingdom, now subsisting under the title of the great court or council, forms a second circle round the sovereign¹. Under the Conqueror this assembly retained very much of its earlier character: the bishops and abbots still attended in virtue of their official wisdom, and with them the great officers of State and the chief of the Norman baronage. It was however rather a court than an organised council. It cannot be certainly affirmed that the tenure of a particular estate of land, held by homage and fealty, either was an indispensable qualification or bestowed the privilege of membership: and before the reign of Henry II it would be rash

Feudal qualification of its members.

¹ Gneist, Verwalt. i. 238 sq., argues strongly against the continuance of the witenagemot in the form of a feudal council, and maintains the practically absolute character of the government in the Norman times. It would not now be contended that the assemblies brought together by the Conqueror or Henry I had the definite organisation of the parliaments of Edward I, or even of the councils of Henry II. But that there were such gatherings of magnates, and that those gatherings, when they emerge from obscurity in the reign of Henry II, were assemblies of tenants-in-chief, is clear on the face of the history. The period was one of transition and growth in every way. No legislative act turned the witenagemot into a feudal council, and no legislative act turned the feudal council into a parliament. On the other hand, Gneist's position, that the Norman assemblies were not independent legislative or governing assemblies, needs no proof. The kings were practically absolute, but they retained the history and the form of a national council.

to maintain that every tenant-in-chief of the crown was a member of the assembly, although every member of the assembly was, after the settlement of the question of investiture, obliged to hold his barony by homage and fealty. It is of course only to the bishops and abbots that that measure directly applies, but its operation in their case necessarily involves the observance of the rule in all others. It is sufficiently obvious from the Domesday record that the tenants-in-chief had long had their position and character defined. That the forcing of homage and fealty, with the baronial tenure, upon the bishops had the effect of annihilating their earlier title to appear in the witenagemot as sapientes can scarcely be maintained¹. It completed however the symmetry of the baronage, and gave a basis of uniformity to the court in which they were assembled. The kings no doubt exercised the right of associating in their deliberations such counsellors as it might seem convenient to admit, as, for instance, a Roman legate, a Norman prelate who would be unlikely to have lands in England, or even lawyers, monks, or clergymen of special skill or sanctity; but it does not follow that such strangers would be allowed to vote in case of any difference of opinion. Except in the anomalous period of Stephen's reign, there are no records of any such discussions as might lead to divisions. In private perhaps the sovereign listened to advice, but, so far as history goes, the tenants-in-chief.

Assembly of

Other counsellors.

¹ Matthew Paris places the commutation of title in A.D. 1070: 'Episcopatus quoque et abbatias omnes quae baronias tenebant et eatenus ab omni servitute saeculari libertatem habuerant, sub servitute statuit militari, inrotulans singulos episcopatus et abbatias pro voluntate sua, quot milites sibi et successoribus suis hostilitatis tempore voluit a singulis exhiberi' (ed. Wats, p. 7). Even if this refers to any real act of William, and is not a mistaken account of the effect of the Domesday Survey, the change is not completed until the prelates do homage and fealty for their temporalities. The exact form and nature of episcopal homage is a matter of discussion, on which see Taylor, Glory of Regality, pp. 357 sq. Glanvill (ix. 1) says, 'episcopi vero consecrati homagium facere non solent domino regi etiam de baroniis suis, sed fidelitatem cum juramentis interpositis ipsi praestare solent. Electi vero in episcopos ante consecrationem suam homagia sua facere solent.' As no bishop could say to the king 'devenio homo vester,' the form was probably of the nature of fealty rather than homage. Hence the bishops were summoned to parliament 'in fide et dilectione quibus nobis tenemini,' lay lords 'in fide et homagio.' Yet in common language the bishops held their baronies by homage and fealty.

General
unanimity in recorded
councils.

counsellors who took part in formal deliberations must have been unanimous or subservient. An assembly of courtiers, holding their lands of the king, and brought together rather for pompous display than for political business, may seem scarcely entitled to the name of a national council¹. Such as it was, however, this court of bishops, abbots, earls, barons, and knights was the council by whose advice and consent the kings condescended to act, or to declare that they acted².

The Norman
council generally an assembly of magnates:

A council based on the principle that its members are qualified by feudal tenure of land ought not to confine itself to an assembly of magnates: it should include all freeholders of town or country who are not under any mesne lord, and would thus be in theory a much larger and more liberal representation of the nation than anything that had existed since the days of the Heptarchy. On some occasions, especially at the great councils of Salisbury in 1086 and 1116, it is probable that a general muster of the landowners of the kingdom was held, at which all were expected either to be present or to send their excuses by the sheriffs, who on the former occasion are especially said to have been summoned³. But the number of persons who were really consulted on business, or to whom the show of such attention was paid, must have been always very limited. As both earlier and later was the case, only the highest class was called on to treat of the highest matters; the but sometimes a general meeting of land-owners.

¹ Gr. Hist. (Verw. i. 223) remarks that in the solemn courts held at the festivals the oppressed English might recognise the ancient witenagemot, and the proud Norman the baronial court; whilst the Conqueror took good care that they should be neither the one nor the other. The view which I have maintained in these chapters is different: I believe that the Conqueror wished to make these councils both witenagemots and baronial courts, so maintaining form and reality that the one principle should be a check upon the other; but it is a mistake to adopt too strict definitions in such matter. The evidence of the Chronicle is sufficient to prove the form and reality of deliberation. In 1085, 'At mid-winter the king was at Gloucester with his witan, and he held his court (hired) there five days: and afterwards the archbishop and clergy held a synod there for three days. . . . After this the king held a great consultation (mycel getheah).'
Chron. Sax. A.D. 1085.

² 'Arcebiscopas and leodbiscopas, abbodas and eorlas, thegnas and enihtas.' Chron. Sax. A.D. 1086.

³ 'Archiepiscopi, episcopi, abbates, comites, barones, vicecomites, eum suis militibus.' Flor. Wig. A.D. 1086.

people, if they were called at all, would hear and obey. And thus the constituent parts of the assembly are reduced to the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, and knights. The sheriffs, who would come invariably under one of these heads, may be left out of consideration in this relation. The enumeration is however in no way based on a logical division; all the members were barons by tenure, greater or less, and all the earls and barons strictly so called were probably knights.

Ordinary members of these councils.

On the ecclesiastical members of the council it is unnecessary to dwell: their character is, except as affected by the acceptance of feudal baronies, exactly the same as it was before¹. The archbishop of Canterbury is still recognised as the first constitutional adviser of the crown²: William Rufus acknowledges the right of Lanfranc as distinctly as Henry I does that of Anselm³. And the importance of this position probably lay at the root of the claim made by the kings to decide which of two rival popes should be recognised in the country: the theory that it was by the acceptance of the pall from Rome that the metropolitanical status was completed, might have exposed the king to the necessity of receiving his chief counsellor from a hostile power, unless limited by such a condition⁴: and as the papal theory of appeals and legations was not yet applied

Bishops.

The archbishop of Canterbury is the first adviser of the crown.

¹ This is the old question of the title of the bishops to sit in parliament. It is scarcely necessary to say more than that they had sat before the Conquest as witan, and continued to do so without break afterwards. See Selden, Titles of Honour, pp. 695, 696; Hody, Convocation, pp. 128, 129. The bishop of Rochester always sat in parliament, even when he received his temporalities from the archbishop of Canterbury and not from the king; and accordingly the bishops of the sees founded at the Reformation, who never held baronies at all, sit exactly as the other bishops. The qualification is however strictly official wisdom, for suffragans, although spiritually equal to diocesan bishops, have never sat. Hody explains this by saying that the bishops sit as governors of the Church; and the same may be said of abbots and priors, although, as their appearance in the national council is for the most part subsequent to the Conquest, and as only the abbots and priors who held baronies were summoned, the question with regard to them is more complicated than that of the bishops.

² This fact appears clearly in Lanfranc's letters; e. g. 'hoc est consilium regis et meum,' Ep. 32; cf. Ep. 58. Anselm tried to obtain a promise from William Rufus, that he would act on his advice in the same way. Eadmer, i. p. 20.

³ Above, p. 304.

⁴ Above, p. 285.

to England, the power of the archbishop to further or retard the promotion of bishops was practically unlimited, except by means which it would have been highly dangerous for the king to adopt. Even at the best the relations of the archbishops to the Norman kings were hazardous, and depended far more on personal than on legal considerations. The fact that even William Rufus was obliged to except the primatial see of Canterbury from his unscrupulous misuse of patronage, is another proof of the strong constitutional hold of the archbishops; a hold which their consistent exertions for the protection of the people and the purification of the Church most amply justified. The whole of the episcopal body was until the middle of Henry I's reign sworn to obedience to Canterbury; and the archbishop of York, even after he had obtained recognition of his independence, had so small a body of suffragans as to make his position in fact subordinate. He was very powerful in Yorkshire, but of secondary importance at court.

His important and independent position.

The archbishop of York.

The earls.

124. The earls of the Norman period are not numerous, nor are the peculiar characteristics of the rank well ascertained. The tendency towards feudalisation of the governmental machinery, which had been growing since the days of Canute, might have made the assimilation of the English ealdorman to the Norman count easy and obvious; but that tendency was counteracted by the policy of William in more ways than one; and consequently it is difficult to reduce the expedients which he adopted in the several cases to a uniform rule. In the early days of his reign the earls whom he appointed seem to be merely successors to the English magistrates of the same name. William Fitz-Osbern, for instance, succeeds to the earldom of Herefordshire which had been held by the Confessor's nephew Ralph; Ralph Guader has the earldom of East-Anglia; and Edwin and Waltheof retain until their fall some portion of the territory which they had inherited with the same title. The three great earldoms of Chester, Shropshire, and Northumberland were created by the Conqueror out of the forfeited inheritance of Edwin, Morcar, and Waltheof, and may likewise be regarded as continuing the line of the ancient magistracies.

The Conqueror's earls were chiefly holders of old English earldoms.

Hugh of Avranches earl of Chester, Roger of Montgomery earl of Shropshire, and Alberic earl of Northumberland are the only persons who in Domesday hold the title of comes by virtue of English earldoms¹; all the rest—William of Evreux, Robert of Eu, Robert of Mortain, Eustace of Boulogne, Alan of Brittany, and Robert of Meulan—were counts simply, the first three of Norman, the latter three of French counties². In some other cases the jurisdiction of the ealdorman was held by a bishop, who may have borne the title of earl, although the evidence on this point is not convincing: such was the position of Odo of Bayeux in Kent, of Walcher of Durham, and perhaps of Gosfrid of Coutances, the founder of the fortunes of the Mowbrays, in Northumberland. The third penny of the county, which had been a part of the profits of the English earls, is occasionally referred to in Domesday³, but not in connexion with existing earldoms, as was afterwards the case. The title thus sparingly bestowed by the Conqueror was conferred little more lavishly by his sons: Henry of Beaumont, brother of the count of Meulan, was made earl of Warwick⁴, Robert Mowbray earl of Northumberland, and William of Warenne earl of Surrey⁵, by William Rufus; the count of Meulan himself received the earldom of Leicester from Henry I;

Bishops
acting as earls.

Earls created by William
Rufus and
Henry I.

¹ To these may be added the Countess Judith, the widow of Waltheof, who had the counties of Huntingdon and Northampton as earldoms, which descended to her daughter Maud, and through her to the family of Senlis and the kings of Scots.

² Ordericus Vitalis has unfortunately created a good deal of confusion on this point: he says (lib. iv. c. 7) that the Conqueror gave the county of Buckingham to Walter Giffard, that of Surrey to William of Warenne, and that of Holderness to Odo of Champagne; in each case the comitatus here given was given as a lordship, not as an earldom, and accordingly none of the three appear as comites in Domesday. The lordship of Holderness was held with the county of Aunåle. The earldom of Surrey was created by William Rufus: that of Buckingham is obscure in its origin, but is probably to be referred to William Rufus. That of Devon is said to have been created for Richard of Redvers by Henry I. The most famous however of the disputed earldoms is that of Richmond, the lordship given by the Conqueror to Alan count of Brittany. On this see the third report of the Lords' Committee on the dignity of a peer, pp. 96 sq.; Courthope's Historic Peerage, p. 395.

³ See above, p. 113.

⁴ The count of Meulan had considerable rights in Warwickshire, recorded in Domesday, but the earldom was created for Henry his brother; and he himself obtained the earldom of Leicester in 1103.

⁵ In 1089; Ord. Vit. viii. c. 9. See also Ellis, Introd. i. 507.

the earldom of Gloucester was conferred by the same king on his illegitimate son. In all these cases it is probable that some portion of the traditional authority of the ealdormanship was conferred with the title. The next reign saw a great increase in the number and a change in the character of these officers¹. Stephen, almost before the struggle for the crown had begun, attempted to strengthen his party by a creation of new earls. To these the third penny of the county was given, and their connexion with the district from which the title was taken was generally confined to this comparatively small endowment, the rest of their provision being furnished by pensions on the Exchequer. A similar expedient was adopted by the empress; and as most of the earls so created contrived to retain their titles, it is possible that the frequent tergiversations which mark the struggle may have been caused by the desire of obtaining confirmation of the rank from both the competitors for the crown. Stephen made Hugh Bigod earl of Norfolk, Aubrey de Vere earl of Oxford, Geoffrey de Mandeville earl of Essex, Richard de Clare earl of Hertford, William of Aumâle earl of Yorkshire, Gilbert de Clare earl of Pembroke, Robert de Ferrers earl of Derby, and Hugh de Beaumont earl of Bedford². The empress created the

The earls
made by Stephen and Matilda.

¹ The comites mentioned in the Pipe Roll of 31 Henry I are the counts of Eu, Beaumont, Brittany, Perche, Flanders, Guisnes, Meulan, Mortain, and Provins; and the earls of Chester, Gloucester, Leicester, Warene (Surrey), and Warwick.

² As Stephen's earldoms are a matter of great constitutional importance, it is as well to give the dates and authorities:—

Hugh Bigod, Norfolk; before 1153. Foedera, i. 18.

Aubrey de Vere, Oxford; questionable.

Geoffrey de Mandeville, Essex; before 1143. Foedera, i. 18.

Richard de Clare, Hertford; uncertain.

William of Aumâle, Yorkshire; in 1138. John of Hexham (ed. Raine), p. 120.

Gilbert de Clare, Pembroke; in 1138. Ord. Vit. xiii. 37.

Robert de Ferrers, Derby; in 1138. John of Hexham, p. 120; Ord. Vit. xiii. 37.

Hugh de Beaumont, Bedford. Gesta Stephani, p. 74.

William of Ypres, Kent; questionable. Meyer, Annales Flandriae, p. 51. The dates and authorities for the empress's earldoms are as follows:—

William de Mohun, Somerset. Mon. Angl. vi. 335.

Patriek of Salisbury, Salisbury; before 1153. Foedera, i. 16.

Miles of Gloucester, Hereford; 1141. Foedera, i. 14; Selden, Titles of Honour, p. 648.

earldoms of Salisbury, Hereford, Somerset, Cambridge, and Essex, if not more. Two or three earldoms of uncertain creation, such as those of Buckingham and Lincoln¹, which were possibly connected with hereditary sheriffdoms, appear about the same period.

The dignity of an earl was conferred by a special investiture, the girding on of the sword of the county by the king himself, and may be regarded so far as a personal rather than a territorial office, like knighthood itself. But the idea of official position is not lost sight of, although the third penny of the pleas and the sword of the shire alone attest its original character. The relief of the earl, like the heriot of his predecessor, is much higher than that of the simple baron; and although we have no warrant for supposing that a fixed number of knights' fees was necessarily attached to the title, the possessions of the earl were as a rule very much larger than those of the baron.

The question of the jurisdiction of the earl in his shire is somewhat complicated. In some cases the title was joined to the lordship of all or nearly all the land in the shire; in some it conveyed apparently the hereditary sheriffship²; and in a few cases the regalia or royal rights of jurisdiction. The palatine earldom of Chester³ is the most important instance of the latter class. The earl, as we have seen already, was said to hold his earldom as freely by his sword as the king held England by the crown; he was lord of all the land in his shire that was not in the hands of the bishop; he had his court of barons of the palatinate,

Investiture
of earls.

Jurisdiction
of the earl.

Palatine
earldoms.

Aubrey de Vere, Cambridge. Dugdale, Baronage, p. 190; Selden, Titles, p. 650.

Geoffrey de Mandeville, Essex. Selden, Titles, p. 647.

Reginald, Cornwall; appointed by Robert of Gloucester in 1140. W. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. ii. § 34.

¹ On the history of the earldom of Lincoln, see Courthope, Hist. Peerage, p. 287.

² See the grant to Geoffrey Mandeville, Selden, p. 647. The earls of Salisbury were sheriffs of Wilts from the reign of Henry II to the 16th of Henry III; their earldom being in fact based on a hereditary sheriffdom of earlier date. The Beauchamp earldom of Warwick was in the same way founded on a hereditary sheriffdom held almost from the Conquest.

³ On the palatine earldom in general, see Selden, Titles of Honour, pp. 640 sq.; above, p. 271. The first creation of a palatine earldom under that name is that of Lancaster in 1351.

The palatine
earldoms.

the writs ran in his name, and he was in fact a feudal sovereign in Cheshire as the king was in Normandy¹. The bishop of Durham occupied exactly the same position in Durham, a position of earlier date than the conquest, founded on the immunities granted by the Northumbrian kings, and confirmed by the Conqueror, in the idea probably of placing a strong and inviolable jurisdiction as an obstacle to Scottish invasion². The earldom of Kent is said by Ordericus Vitalis to have been conferred as a palatine earldom on Odo of Bayeux; but, although at the time of the Domesday Survey he is still found in possession of an enormous number of lordships in the county, the day of his greatness was over, and we are left in uncertainty whether he ever really possessed the regalia. Another case is the earldom of Shrewsbury³: Roger Montgomery held as lord all the land in Shropshire, save such as belonged to the church and five comparatively insignificant tenants-in-chief: in a charter preserved by Ordericus Vitalis he speaks of the sheriff of the county as 'my sheriff'⁴ in a way that leads to the conclusion that he also may have possessed palatine rights; but this earldom was forfeited before the time at which documentary evidence would be found to illustrate it more fully. The other earldoms based on the Anglo-Saxon jurisdictions are liable to similar

Possible
palatine jurisdictions

¹ The palatine earldom of Chester had its own courts, judges, and staff of officers, constable, steward and the rest: it had its parliament, consisting of the barons of the county, and was not until 1541 represented in the parliament of the kingdom. The eight baronies of the earldom were Halton, Montalt or Mould, Nantwich, Malpas, Shilbroke, Dunham-Masey, Stockport, and Kinderton: the last was held by the family of Venables, which bore the title of baron of Kinderton long before the head of it was called to the House of Lords. The history of this imperium in imperio is curious, and is given in detail in Ormerod's Cheshire, vol. i. The barons spiritual are said to be eight as well as the temporal ones; namely, two bishops, Chester or Lichfield, and Bangor; six abbots, S. Werburgh's, Combermere, Stanlaw, Norton, Birkenhead, and Vale-Royal. Ibid. pp. 149, 150. The exact accuracy of the details is questionable.

² The organisation of Durham was not quite so complete as the alleged palatine system of Chester: the barony of Hilton is the only one of any note among the tenancies-in-chief. But it had its whole array of officers, courts of justice and record, which were kept in the name of the bishop until 1836. See above, p. 271, note 1.

³ See above, p. 271. This earldom has many marks of a palatinate, but became extinct too early to furnish conclusive evidence of its character.

⁴ Ord. Vit. v. 13.

question¹; and it is possible that if we possessed more abundant materials, it would be found that the reduction of great territorial jurisdictions to merely titular dignities was gradually worked out by the Norman kings, instead of being, as is generally presumed, a principle of policy fully developed by the Conqueror himself. The dignity of earl was, it is scarcely necessary to say, hereditary; but the heir did not acquire the formal rank until he was invested, although he might obtain possession of his lands, and even his share of the profits of the shire-moots, before he received the sword². There are instances moreover of a division of the inheritance of the great earls: Roger of Montgomery, who held the counties of Shropshire and Sussex, left his Norman fiefs to his elder son, and the English to the second³. The first earl of Leicester, who was also count of Meulan, divided his estates between his twin sons, who founded the houses of Meulan and Leicester respectively⁴; and the earldom of Lincoln perhaps owes its origin to a similar partition⁵.

The title of baron, unlike that of earl, is a creation of the Conquest. The word, in its origin equivalent to *homo*⁶, receives under feudal institutions, like homo itself, the meaning of vassal. Homage (hominium) is the ceremony by which the vassal becomes the man of his lord; and the homines of the king are barons. Possibly the king's thegn of Anglo-Saxon times may answer to the Norman baron; both terms have somewhat the

¹ For example, William Fitz-Osbern legislated for Herefordshire: 'Manet ad hunc diem in comitatu ejus apud Herefordiam, legum quas statuit inconcessa firmitas, ut nullus miles per qualicumque commissio plus septem solidis solvat; cum in aliis provinciis ob parvam occasiunculam in transgressione praecepti herilis viginti vel viginti quinque pendantur.' W. Malmesb. G. R. iii. § 256. The earldom of Northumberland was also more like a viceregal appointment than a hereditary dignity; see Courthope, Hist. Peerage, p. li.

² See Hoveden's account of the investiture of William Marshall and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter at John's coronation, vol. iv. p. 90.

³ Ord. Vit. v. 14.

⁴ Ibid. xii. 33.

⁵ See above, p. 363.

⁶ It is explained as connected with the word wer (used in werigild), a man. It occurs as early as A.D. 744 in the form of paro, meaning a free-man, and is used in the Leges Alamannorum as opposed to a slave: more generally however for man generally. Waitz, D. V. G. ii. 183, iv. 281. It does not occur in the writings of Englishmen before the Conquest; but appears in Domesday and in the charter of Henry I in its recognised meaning of a tenant-in-chief of the king. See Ellis, Introd. i. 44, 45.

same indefiniteness, being applied sometimes to a personal relation, sometimes to a territorial one. In one aspect, any of the king's dependents are barones; in another, the barony signifies a definite number of knights' fees¹. But as it has been found impossible to reduce the territorial baronies to any fixed area of extension, it is probable that the term involves, from its first entrance into English history, nothing more than the idea of royal vassal or tenant-in-chief². Of these there were many grades, besides the great distinction of majores and minores which appears in *Magna Carta*³; they varied according to personal qualifications, official duties, and extent of property; some received special invitation, were summoned 'propriis nominibus;' others not. The baron, as possessor of one manor or of many, had a territorial jurisdiction of a limited sort; and when he possessed by royal grant the profits of the hundred in which his castle was situated, he acquired an hereditary magistracy somewhat analogous to that of the earl; but no such power was attached to the barony by itself. As lord of his manors, he had his court of tenants in each: he might be great enough to have a body of personal counsellors, Different grades in the baronage.

Nature of the courts of the barons.

¹ In the Modus tenendi Parliamentum a barony is said to contain thirteen knights' fees and a third: the relation between knight, baron, and earl being the same as that of the shilling, mark, and pound; which is the proportion of their respective reliefs in some copies of Magna Carta; Select Charters, p. 193; Blackstone's Charters, p. 38. But this rule is quite arbitrary; there was no such proportion. On the Scottish and Irish measurements which are called baronies, see Robertson, Essays, pp. 133 sq., 142 sq.

² On the history of the disputed question of barony see Hallam, Middle Ages, iii. 6 sq. Selden maintained that all tenants-in-chief by knight-service were barons; Madox that there was an original but undetermined difference between tenure by barony and tenure by knight-service. See also Gneist, Verwalt. i. 270.

³ The distinction of majores and minores barones, although it appears perhaps in legal phraseology first in the Dialogus de Scaccario and Magna Carta, is in usage and language much earlier. Gneist points out that in the army the difference between the single knight and the leader of 50 or 25, in the Exchequer the difference of relief between a hundred shillings for the knight and a hundred marks for the baron, in the court and in the shire-moot, the interval between the two classes must have made itself apparent. Dialogus de Scacc. ii. 10. It may indeed be fairly conjectured that the land-owners in Domesday who paid their relief to the sheriff, those who held six manors or less, and those who paid their relief to the king, stood in the same relation to one another. See Spence, Equitable Jurisdiction of Chancery, i. p. 40; and above, p. 157, note 1; and on the special summons, p. 567 below.

stewards, chamberlains and constables. In a very few cases he possessed a hereditary sheriffdom, but this was probably never directly attached to a territorial barony, although, as both were hereditary, they might descend for many generations together.

The lowest class of tenants-in-chief who are likely to have presented themselves in the national council are the knights¹, who are included in general under the class of barons, but demand some further notice. In tracing the history of the thegn in an earlier chapter², the knight has been described as succeeding after the Conquest to his position. He occupies nearly the same extent of land, and in several respects has an analogous history. But the knight proper, at least of the twelfth century, is not merely the possessor of a certain number of hides of land, which he holds by the tenure of chivalry, 'per loriam,' or as a 'fief de hauberc;' he has undergone an honourable initiation in the use of arms, which distinguishes him from the unwarlike tenant in socage. The practice of 'dubbing to knighthood' may have had a corresponding usage in Anglo-Saxon times³; it certainly is nowhere mentioned as a Norman innovation, and it is unlikely that Ethelred, Canute, or Edward the Confessor, who had great acquaintance with foreign usages, should not have introduced into England the institution of chivalry, which was then springing up in every country in Europe. But the first mention of it in our annals is in reference to the knighting of

The knights.

The knight is the successor of the thegn.

Institution of knighthood.

¹ Cniht is commonly used in the meaning of servus, although it appears occasionally before the Conquest with a somewhat different application, possibly equivalent to miles. In the guilds, in the monuments of which it occurs, it is explained as 'young men,' but this is questionable. It had acquired its recognised sense by the middle of the twelfth century. Chron. Sax. A.D. 1086.

² Above, p. 156.

³ The story of Athelstan's investiture by his grandfather Alfred is told by William of Malmesbury, G. R. ii. § 133: 'Quem etiam prae mature militem fecerat donatum chlamyde coccinea, gemmato balteo, ense Saxo-nico cum vagina aurea.' The practice is no doubt derived from primitive, almost universal custom, although only occasionally traceable in particular countries. The knighthood of Charles the Bald by his father in 838 (V. Ludovici, c. 59; Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 573) may have served as a precedent for Alfred. Palgrave regards Athelstan's knighthood as the precedent for that of Richard Sans Peur, but, as it seems to me, with very little authority. William the Conqueror was knighted (militiae insignia recipiens) by the king of France. W. Malmesb. G. R. iii. § 230.

Institution of knighthood.

the Conqueror and his sons, when it appears to have had somewhat of the character of a religious as well as of a legal rite¹. Henry I was knighted by his father²; William Rufus is said to have received his knighthood from Lanfranc³; Henry II was dubbed on his visit to England by his great-uncle King David⁴. But these instances seem to be examples only of a practice usual in much lower ranks of society; and although the young aspirant might seek lustre for his inauguration by receiving his spurs from a distinguished warrior, it is not necessary to suppose that the right of conferring it was restricted to a smaller body than the knightly class itself. And thus the history of the institution may be referred to the primitive custom of investing the youth in the full assembly of the tribe, by the hand of his king, princeps, or father. Although in general no man would be regarded as entitled to the privileges of knighthood or allowed to call himself a knight who had not been thus initiated, the whole class of landowners who held by knight-service would be for constitutional purposes comprised under the name of knights. The dignity of knighthood was often bestowed on the skilful warrior who had no qualification in land, and it was of course possessed by the initiated members of the great military orders. Here however we have only to notice those members of the great fraternity of chivalry who as vassals of the king were entitled to take their place in his solemn council.

Burglers and citizens occasionally
in the council.

There were, in some of the towns of the early Norman period, elements of another class of vassals who may occasionally have been brought up to attend the national gatherings; the great

¹ John of Salisbury describes the ceremony as used in the middle of the twelfth century: 'Inolevit consuetudo solemnns, ut, ea die qua quisque militari cingulo decoratur, ccelesiam solemniter adeat, gladioque super altare posito et oblato, quasi celebri professione facta, seipsum obsequio altaris devoveat et gladii, id est, officii sui jugem Deo spondeat famulatum.' Polyeraticus, vi. 10.

² He is said by Ordericus Vitalis (viii. 1) to have received his arms from Lanfranc. This may have been so, but the Conqueror himself 'dubbado his sunu Henric to ridere.' Chron. Sax. A.D. 1086.

³ W. Malnesb. G. R. iv. § 305. Abbots were forbidden to make knights, in the council of London in 1102 (Eadmer, p. 68). Thomas Becket knighted the count of Guisnes (Du Cange, s. v. Miles), and William bishop of Ely knighted Ralph Beauchamp as late as 1191. R. Diceto, c. 664.

⁴ Hen. Hunt, fol. 226.

men of London and York for instance. It is certain that on several occasions the citizens of the capital took part in deliberation. In the assembly at which the election of the Empress Matilda took place, the 'Communio' of the city of London was heard pleading for Stephen's liberation; but we have no evidence for determining in what character they attended¹. The great citizens of London would most of them be of knightly rank, possessing qualifications in land, and taking rank as barons. The corporate character of the city constitution was very grudgingly admitted, and although it is just possible that some representative functions may have been discharged by its principal members who sat in their own personal right, it is probable that the 'communio' itself could only be heard by petition. The idea of representation which was familiar enough in the local courts might be expected, in a constitution so entirely based on land tenure, to appear in the central council as well. But it is not to be traced in existing records, and, when it does appear later, it is in that intermittent, growing, and struggling form which shows it to be a novelty. Of any representation of the freeholders in general there is not even a suspicion. The sheriffs would, as being barons themselves, have their places in the council, and might report the needs and wishes of their neighbours, but as royal nominees and farmers of the revenue, they could not be expected to sympathise deeply with the population which they had to assess and to oppress.

No trace of representative members of the Norman councils.

It is not to be supposed that the assemblies at which all, or even a large proportion, of the tenants-in-chief presented themselves were very frequent. The councils of Salisbury already referred to² are perhaps the only occasions on which anything like a general assembly was brought together. These were for the special purpose of taking the oaths of fealty, and comprised other elements than the tenants-in-chief. The ordinary courts or councils were of a much more limited character, seldom containing more than the bishops and 'proceres,' a term that would include only the earls and greater barons. These courts were held on the great Church festivals, Christmas, Easter, and Whitsun-

General assemblies of the tenants-in-chief not frequent.

The great annual courts.

¹ See above, p. 329.

² See above, p. 358.

tide: generally at the great cities of southern England, London, Winchester, and Gloucester¹. The king appeared wearing his crown; a special peace was maintained, necessarily no doubt in consequence of the multitude of armed retainers who attended the barons²; and magnificent hospitality was accorded to all comers. 'Thrice a year,' says the Chronicle, 'King William wore his crown every year that he was in England; at Easter he wore it at Winchester, at Pentecost at Westminster, and at Christmas at Gloucester. And at these times all the men of England were with him, archbishops, bishops and abbots, earls, thegns and knights³.' A similar usage was observed by his sons, although neither he nor they regularly followed the rotation thus described⁴; they called together their barons whenever and wherever they pleased; and many of their courts were held at their forest palaces in Wiltshire and Berkshire. Under Henry I the number of places of council was largely increased, and the enlarged accommodation afforded by the growing monasteries was utilised. Councils were held at Windsor, Rockingham, Woodstock, among the forest palaces; at Oxford, Northampton, and other midland towns⁵. The cessation of the solemn courts under Stephen was regarded by Henry of Huntingdon as a fatal mark of national decline⁶.

Places of council.

Theory of the counsel and consent
of the baronage.

125. These assemblies must be regarded as legally possessed of the full powers of the old witenagemot: but the exercise of their powers depended on the will of the king, and under the

¹ See above, p. 268.

² See above, p. 181. The crown was placed on the king's head by the archbishop, on these occasions in his own chamber, before he walked in procession. See Eadmer, lib. vi. p. 137; Hoveden, iii. 59; Gervase, c. 1587.

³ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1087; W. Malmesb. Vit. S. Wulfst. lib. ii. c. 12: 'Rex Willelmus consuetudinem induxerat, quam successores aliquam diu tritam postmodum consensescere permisere. Ea erat ut ter in anno cuncti optimates ad curiam convenirent de necessariis regni tractaturi, simulque visuri regis insigne quomodo iret gemmato fastigiatus diademate.' The custom was restored by Henry II, but disused after the year 1158. Gneist, who will not allow the continuance of the witenagemot in any shape, or the existence of a regular feudal court under the Norman kings, sees in these assemblies only pageants whose splendour would indemnify the magnates for the absence of all real power. Verwaltungsrecht, i. 224.

⁴ 'Quem morem convivandi primus successor obstinate tenuit, secundus omisit.' W. Malmesb. G. R. iii. § 279.

⁵ See Hen. Hunt. fol. 220 sq.

⁶ Ibid. fol. 223.

Conqueror and his sons there are scarcely any traces of independent action in them. Their legislative authority is admitted: it is with their counsel and consent¹ that William the Conqueror amends the laws of the Confessor, and divides the ecclesiastical from the secular courts; Henry I mentions in the preamble to his charter² that he had received the crown by the counsel of the barons; with their consent he had retained the forests; and it was with the counsel of his barons that his father had amended the laws of S. Edward³; Stephen, in the corresponding document, asserts his election by the clergy and the people; but neither of them distinctly declares the share of the council in the act thus prefaced, and we have no other legislative records of the period.

In legislation.

The right of the council to join in taxation is nowhere distinctly stated: yet Henry I describes an aid as 'auxilium quod barones mihi dederunt⁴;' and it must be supposed that the king would lay before his barons any plan for increasing the existing burdens, and that such announcement would be regarded as necessary for the validity of the exaction; the silence of the counsellors or their ready assent would be a matter of form.

In taxation.

The judicial proceedings which took place in the king's presence are frequently mentioned, but even here a question may be raised as to the freedom of debate. It was by a judicial sentence that Earls Waltheof and Roger were condemned⁵; in a great session of the king's court the bishop of Durham was tried in 1088⁶; in a council at Salisbury in A.D. 1096 William of Eu had cature.

In judi-

¹ Above, p. 277, note 1.

² Ancient Laws, p. 215. Eadmer (Hist. Nov. iv. p. 94) mentions an edict (indicto edicto) for the punishment of criminal courtiers, issued by Henry I 'per consilium Anselmi et procerum regni,' the text of which is lost.

³ Statutes of the Realm, i. 4.

⁴ Chron. Abingd. ii. 113. The article of Henry's charter which relieves the demesne lands of the military tenants, 'ab omnibus gildis et omni opere,' seems also to imply that their consent was required for any taxation, although it does not involve an assembly called to grant it. See First Report on the dignity of a Peer, pp. 38, 39; and compare p. 398 below.

⁵ 'Judiciali sententia damnatos.' Flor. Wig. A.D. 1074. 'Censoribus inter se sentientibus per plures inducias usque in annum [judicium] protelatum est.' 'Post multos tractatus reum esse mortis definitum est.' Ord. Vit. iv. 15. The trial was at the Christmas court at Westminster; Chron. Sax. A.D. 1075. Freeman, Norm. Conq. iv. 589.

⁶ See below, pp. 440 sq.

his trial by battle and his cruel punishment¹; in the same council the king sentenced William of Alderly to be hanged, and the other conspirators to be imprisoned; in A.D. 1102 Henry I summoned Robert of Belesme before his court, and alleged forty-five articles of treason against him²; in A.D. 1130 Geoffrey de Clinton was accused of treason in the Easter court at Woodstock³. In all these, and numerous other cases which might be adduced, it is clearly the full national assembly, and not the mere justices, before whom the trial is conducted. The barons act as judges, the king apparently gives the sentence, although in this respect also he is open to advice. It was by the counsel of Hugh of Chester that William of Eu suffered mutilation⁴. The mode of trial was probably the same as in the lower courts, the accusation by sworn witnesses, compurgation, ordeal and trial by battle⁵. On one occasion, we are informed, the barons interfered so far as to recommend William Rufus to show mercy; it was by the advice of his wise men that he spared the minor criminals in A.D. 1096⁶.

Process of trial in the council.

Jurisdiction of the national councils in questions of right.

Matters of civil jurisdiction were also brought before these assemblies, although the determination in such cases would fall to the lot of the more experienced lawyers of the Curia Regis or Exchequer. A great council at Pedreda in the Conqueror's reign determined the suit between the churches of York and Worcester⁷, and a similar quarrel between the bishops of Llan-

¹ 'Octavis Epiphaniae apud Saresbiriā celebrato concilio.' Flor. Wig. A.D. 1096.

² Ord. Vit. xi. 3.

³ Hen. Hunt. fol. 220. David king of Scots took part in this trial: 'Dum David Rex in curia Henrici regis caute iudicium indagaret,' &c. Ord. Vit. viii. 22.

⁴ Ord. Vit. viii. 23.

⁵ Ordericus tells us that Roger of Hereford was tried by the Norman laws and sentenced to the forfeiture of lands and perpetual imprisonment. The same penalty must have followed if he had been tried by English law. If the words refer to the method of procedure it is difficult to see what difference there could have been between the Norman and the English law, except in the use of trial by battle, which does not appear to have been employed in the case. Ord. Vit. iv. 15.

⁶ Ord. Vit. viii. 23: 'Consultu sapientum huiusmodi viros pepercit.'

⁷ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1070: 'In consilio in loco qui vocatur Pedreda celebrato, coram rege ac Doruberniā archiepiscopo Lanfranco, et episcopis, abbatibus, comitibus et primatibus totius Angliā.' The dispute between York and Canterbury was heard in an Easter court; 'Uterque igitur in Paschali solemnitate ad regem venit ibique prolati in mediā partium rationibus sententiam de negotio regali curia dedit.' V. Lanfr. c. 11.

daff and S. David's came before the court more than once in the latter years of Henry I¹. In A.D. 1126 the king, by the advice of his barons, granted the custody of Rochester Castle to the archbishop of Canterbury². The proceedings of Stephen against the bishops, impolitic as they were, were conducted with a shadow of legality in a similar assembly³.

Most, however, of the proceedings of the national council at this period, of which any record is preserved, come under the head of general business. The nominations of bishops were always made on these occasions until the right of canonical election was admitted by Henry I⁴: and even then the election took place in the king's court, often at the great festivals when the majority of the barons were present, and when the consecration and the investiture could be celebrated with equal pomp⁵. The ceremony of conferring earldoms and knighthood was a public business of the court⁶, as well as the witnessing of the homages paid to the king or his presumptive successor⁷. The foreign and ecclesiastical policy of the king was here canvassed without much jealousy or intimidation⁸; war and peace, royal

General discussions.

Elections of bishops in the national councils.

¹ Hen. Hunt. fol. 220: 'Post Pascha (A.D. 1132) fuit magnum placitum apud Londoniam, ubi de pluribus quidem et maxime de discordia episcopi Sancti Davidis et episcopi Clamorgensis de finibus parochiarum suarum tractatum est.' The discussion was continued in a conventus at London, and another at Winchester. This suit is described in the Cont. Flor. Wig. (A.D. 1128) as discussed 'in generali concilio' some years before.

² Cont. Flor. Wig. A.D. 1126: 'Consilio baronum suorum.'

³ W. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. ii. § 20; Gesta Stephani, p. 49.

⁴ Instances of this proceeding are very numerous: e.g. 'in Nativitate Domini curiam suam Glawornae tenuit, ubi tribus suis capellanis . . . dedit praesulatum.' Flor. Wig. A.D. 1085.

⁵ Two instances will suffice here. Under Henry I, after the settlement with Anselm,—'Willelmus . . . ad archiepiscopatum Cantuariensem Glawornae ubi in Purificatione Sanctae Mariae rex tenuit curiam suam eligitur;' Cont. Flor. Wig. A.D. 1123; under Stephen, after the grant of free election to the clergy,—'Sciatis me dedisse et concessisse Rodberto episcopo Bathoniae episcopatum Bathoniae . . . canonica prius electione praecedente et communi vestro (sc. archiepiscoporum, episcoporum, abbatum, comitum, vicecomitum, baronum et omnium fidelium) consilio, voto et favore prosequente . . . apud Westmonasterium in generali concilii celebratione et Paschalis festi solemnitate.' Foedera, i. 16.

⁶ See above, pp. 363, 368.

⁷ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1086, 1116, 1126.

⁸ Henry I writes to Anselm (Epp. Ans. iii. 94), 'volo legatos meos Roman mittere et consilio Dei et baronum meorum domino papae iude

Election of
the king.

marriages¹, and the like. Of the share taken by the baronage in the election of the king enough has been said already: it was a right which each sovereign in turn was 'politic enough to acknowledge, and of the reality of which he was so far conscious that he took every means of escaping it. The election of Henry I and Stephen, the claim put forward to elect the empress, the acceptance of the heir of King Henry and the rejection of the heir of Stephen, place this prerogative of the nation, however indifferently the council which exercised it represented the nation, upon an incontestable basis.

Ecclesiastical business in the great
councils.

The power of the clergy was so strong during these reigns that we must not expect to find ecclesiastical questions treated in the secular councils except under the greatest reserve. It must however have been a very large gathering that accepted the conditions made by Henry I and Anselm in 1107²: in the following year we find the canons of a Church council at London passed in the presence of the king, with the assent of all his barons³; in A.D. 1127, after a similar council, Henry granted his assent to the statutes passed in it, and confirmed them 'by his royal power and authority⁴,' on the principle of his father's policy.

Coincidence
of baronial and episcopal councils.

On this and some other occasions we find distinct traces of a usage which forms a peculiar mark of our ecclesiastical history; the king holds his court at Westminster, whilst the archbishop celebrates his council in the same city; the two assemblies together form a precedent for the coincident summoning of parliament and convocation in later days⁵. The special significance respondere.' See also lib. iv. epp. 4, 6. The sec of Ely was founded by the king with the counsel of the kingdom, 'regi et archiepiscopo caeterisque principibus visum.' Eadmer, p. 95.

¹ Eadmer, lib. vi. p. 136: 'Rex . . . consilio Radulfi Cantuariorum pontificis et principum regni quos omnes . . . congregavit, decrevit sibi in uxorem Athelcidem . . .'. See also Hen. Hunt. fol. 220.

² 'In kalendis Augusti conventus omnium episcoporum, abbatum et procerum regni Londoniae in palatio regis factus est.' Flor. Wig. A.D. 1107; Eadmer, p. 91.

³ 'Episcopi statuerunt in praesentia ejusdem gloriosi regis Henrici, assensu omnium baronum suorum.' Flor. Wig. A.D. 1108; Eadmer, p. 95.

⁴ 'Auditis concilii gestis assensum praebuit, auctoritate regia et potestate concessit et confirmavit statuta concilii.' Cont. Flor. Wig. A.D. 1127.

⁵ In 1102, 'Celebratum est concilium in ecclesia beati Petri in occidentali parte juxta Londoniam sita, communi consensu episcoporum, et abbatum however of the king's ratification of the canons of 1127 lies in the fact that the archbishop had just returned from Rome, invested with that legatine character which was so often a stumbling-block both in civil and ecclesiastical affairs. The king had succeeded in obtaining the office for the first time for the primate, with whom he was acting in concert; the canons of the council had thus the threefold sanction of the national Church, the King, and the Holy See, without any concession being made by either as to the necessity of confirmation by the other two. These proceedings completed the harmony of Church and State, which was one of the great objects of Henry's policy, and which was rudely broken by the quarrels of Stephen.

The canons of A.D. 1127.

In the last reign of the period the ecclesiastical councils claim and exert more real power than could be decently claimed for such assemblies of the barons as either party could bring together. The assembly at Winchester in which Matilda was elected was a synod of the clergy, who were present in three bodies, bishops, abbots, and archdeacons, and were separately consulted¹; but it was largely attended by the barons of the party. The council of A.D. 1151, in which Stephen, Eustace, and the barons appeared, and in which both parties appealed to the pope for the settlement of their claims, was primarily an ecclesiastical council summoned by archbishop Theobald in his capacity of

Ecclesiastical councils of Stephen's reign act in secular business.

et principum totius regni: in quo praesedit Anselmus. . . Huic conventui affuerunt, Anselmo archiepiscopo petente a rege, primates regni, quatenus quicquid ejusdem concilii auctoritate decerneretur utriusque ordinis cordi cura et sollicitudine ratum servaretur; Eadmer, p. 67. Florence's account is based on this; but he adds, 'In festivitate S. Michaelis rex fuit Landoniae apud Westmonasterium et cum eo omnes principes regni sui, ecclesiastici et saecularis ordinis, ubi duos de clericis duobus episcopatibus investivit . . . , ubi etiam Anselmus tenuit magnum concilium de his quae ad Christianitatem pertinent.' The case of 1127 is even more distinct: 'Rex archiepiscopus tenuit ad Rogationes apud Londoniam, et Willelmus archiepiscopus Cantuariensis similiter in eadem villa apud Westminster.' The king's assembly was in the palace, the archbishop's in the church: the date of the latter is given by the Continuator of Florence, May 13-16, the Friday, Saturday, Sunday, and Monday after the Rogation days.

¹ William of Malmesbury was present and describes the council accurately: 'Post recitata scripta excusatoria quibus absentiam suam quidam tutati sunt, sevocavit in partem legatus episcopos, habuitque cum eis arcium consilii sui; post mox abbates, postremo archidiaconi convocati. . . ' Hist. Nov. iii. § 43.

legate¹. It is in fact difficult to discover after the fourth year of Stephen any assembly to which the name of national council can be given, although, in the confused accounts of the final pacification, we may detect evidence that proves such assemblies to have been held. The abeyance however of all the constitutional machinery at this period, and the almost irreconcilable chronological difficulties which meet us in the annals, may well excuse some hesitation in forcing a general conclusion from these precedents.

Relation of
the great council to the king's court and Exchequer.

126. The exact relation of the administrative system to the national council is not very easy to define; for the lawyers and historians give no glimpse of a theory of government, and the documentary evidences of the Norman period are by no means abundant. It would be rash to affirm that the supreme courts of judicature and finance were committees of the national council, although the title of Curia belongs to both, and it is difficult to see where the functions of the one end and those of the other begin. And it would be scarcely less rash to regard the two great tribunals, the Curia Regis and Exchequer, as mere sessions of the king's household ministers, undertaking the administration of national business without reference to the action of the greater council of the kingdom. The historical development of the system is obscure in the extreme. The Conqueror, as duke of Normandy, had no doubt a high court of judicature and a general assembly of his barons; Edward the Confessor had his national witenagemot, which likewise exercised the functions of judicature; he also, as we must infer from Domesday, had a centralised system of finance, a treasury with its staff of keepers and assessors. How much of the new administrative machinery was imported directly from Normandy, how much was English, how much derived its existence from the juxtaposition of the two, we have to decide on conjecture rather than on evidence; and the materials for answering the question, which concerns still wider generalisations, will be given further on. It may be enough here to note, that whereas under William the Conqueror and William Rufus the term Curia generally, if not invariably, refers to the solemn courts held thrice a year or on particular summons, at which all tenants-in-chief were supposed to attend¹, from the reign of Henry I we have distinct traces of a judicial system, a supreme court of justice, called the Curia Regis, presided over by the king or justiciar, and containing other judges also called justiciars, the chief being occasionally distinguished by the title of 'summus,' 'magnus,' or 'capitalis.' The same body also managed the assessment and collection of the revenue, and for this purpose had a separate and very elaborate organisation, through the history of which the character of their judicial work is chiefly made intelligible; and which may accordingly be stated first.

¹ 'Anno xvi'. Teobaldus Cantuariensis archiepiscopus et apostolicæ sedis legatus tenuit concilium generale apud Londoniam in media Quadragesima, ubi rex Stephanus et filius suus Eustachius et Angliæ proceres interfuerunt, totumque illud concilium novis appellationibus infrenduit.' Hen. Hunt. fol. 226.

Central system of administration from the reign of Henry I.

The Exchequer² of the Norman kings was the court in which the whole financial business of the country was transacted, and as the whole administration of justice, and even the military organisation, was dependent upon the fiscal officers, the whole framework of society may be said to have passed annually under its review. It derived its name from the chequered cloth which covered the table at which the accounts were taken³, a name

The Exchequer.

¹ This of course is not in exact agreement with Gneist's view. He holds that only the great magnates ever attended. It is clear however that on some occasions a large proportion of the landowners were present even in the Norman reigns, and under Henry II these assemblies are distinctly courts of feudal tenants-in-chief, from the very first years of the reign. It seems far more probable that the earlier assemblies were constituted on the same principle, than that that king should begin his reign by a violent innovation. Of course, as a rule, only the great barons would take the trouble or be at the cost of attending. It is of the greatest importance in all our early history to remember that attendance at courts and councils was not regarded as a privilege, but as a burden; suit and service were alike onerous.

² The contemporaneous authorities on the Exchequer are the Pipe Rolls, and the Dialogus de Scaccario, a work on the subject written by Richard bishop of London the Treasurer, who was son of Bishop Nigel the Treasurer, and great-nephew of the justiciar Roger of Salisbury. The great work of Madox, the History of the Exchequer, furnishes an enormous amount of illustrative matter.

³ Dialogus de Scaccario, i. 1: 'Pannus . . . niger virgis distinctus distantibus a se virgis vel pedis vel palmae extentae spatio.'

which suggested to the spectator the idea of a game at chess between the receiver and the payer, the treasurer and the sheriff. As this name never occurs before the reign of Henry I¹, and as the tradition of the court preserved the remembrance of a time when the business which took place in it was transacted 'ad taleas,' 'at the tallies,' it seems certain that the date of complete organisation should be referred to this period². Under the Anglo-Saxon kings we may presume that the treasure or hord was under the management of a gerefa or *hordere*³, but although the mention of such an officer is not uncommon, there are no distinct traces of courts of account: the taxes were collected by the sheriffs and other reeves, and the treasure was preserved in the palace: some

The growth of the Exchequer.

¹ The arguments for a Norman Exchequer (eo nomine) existing earlier than the English are of no account. There is no genuine mention of it before the reign of Henry II. The supposed mention of the Exchequer of Normandy in a record of 1061 (Gneist, Verwalt. i. 194) is a mistake. But the subject will be noticed further on.

² As the roll of 31 Henry I is still in existence, it seems quite justifiable to regard the Exchequer as a fully developed part of the Norman régime, although a great deal of its political and constitutional importance belongs to the period of revival under Henry II.

³ The word occurs in the laws of Athelstan, 'Cyninges hordera othle ure gerefena;' not however as the name of a great official. The author of the Dialogus says that there were in his time some who referred the institution back to the English kings; he does not agree with this, because there is no mention in Domesday-book of the 'blanch-ferm.' Mr. Stapleton however in the preface to the Rolls of the Norman Exchequer points out that the 'blanch ferm' has its origin in a state of things that did not exist in Normandy, and was 'consequent upon the monetary system of the Anglo-Saxons.' The argument is very technical, but quite conclusive. The 'ferm' or pecuniary payment made by the sheriffs was said to be 'blanched,' 'dealbatum,' when it had been tested by fire, weighed, and by additional payment brought to the standard of the royal mint at Winchester. There was no such fixed standard in Normandy, and as the blanch-ferm was an integral part of the English system, it is clear that it could not have been derived from the Norman. Although the blanch-ferm is not mentioned in Domesday, the ferm is in many places described as settled in King Edward's time. This seems to prove the existence of a central department of finance before the Conquest from which the peculiarities of the English Exchequer were derived. It does not of course follow that it bore the name, or that great improvements in it were not effected by the Norman lawyers. But it satisfactorily disposes of the statements of Gneist (Verwalt. i. 194) and Brunner (Schwurgericht, p. 150), that the court of Exchequer was bodily imported from Normandy. The Sicilian Exchequer, also quoted as an argument of the Norman origin, was very probably organised by Master Thomas Brown, the English minister of King Roger, who was, after his return to his natale solum, placed in the English Exchequer by Henry II. Dialogus, i. 6.

machinery for account and guardianship must be inferred. Under the Conqueror and William Rufus the word 'fiscus' or 'thesaurus' is commonly used, and even under Henry I the word 'scaccarium' is by no means of common occurrence.

The officers of the Exchequer are the great officers of the household; the justiciar who is the president, the chancellor, the constable, two chamberlains, the marshal, and the treasurer, with such other great and experienced counsellors as the king directs to attend for the public service, and who share with the others the title of Barons of the Exchequer. Amongst these, if not identical with them, are the justices or ordinary judges of the Curia Regis, who appear to be called indiscriminately 'justitiiarii' and 'barones scaccarii.'

Twice a year, at Easter and at Michaelmas, full sessions were held in the palace at Westminster, attended by all the barons, with their clerks, writers, and other servants, each of whom had his assigned place and regular duties. Two chambers were used for the transaction of business: the upper one, or exchequer of account, was that in which the reports were received, and all the legal negotiations carried on and recorded; and the lower one, or exchequer of receipt, in which the money was paid down, weighed, and otherwise tested¹. The record of the business was preserved in three great rolls; one kept by the treasurer, another by the chancellor, and a third by an officer nominated by the king, who registered the matters of legal and special importance². The rolls of the treasurer and chancellor were duplicates; that of the former was called from its shape the great roll of the Pipe, and that of the latter the roll of the Chancery. These documents are mostly still in existence. The Pipe Rolls are complete from the second year of Henry II, and the Chancellor's rolls nearly so. Of the preceding period only one roll, that of the thirty-first year of Henry I, is preserved, and this with Domesday-book is the most valuable store of information which exists for the administrative history of the age.

The financial reports were made to the barons by the sheriffs of

¹ Dialogus, i. 2.

² Ibid. i. 5, 6; Select Charters, pp. 170, 175, 177, 181.

System of account.

the counties. At Easter and Michaelmas¹ each of these magistrates produced his own accounts, and paid into the Exchequer such an instalment or proffer as he could afford, retaining in hand sufficient money for current expenses. In token of receipt a tally was made; a long piece of wood in which a number of notches were cut, marking the pounds, shillings, and pence received; this stick was then split down the middle, each half contained exactly the same number of notches, and no alteration could of course be made without certain detection². At the Michaelmas audit these tallies were produced, and the remainder of the accounts made up. If the sheriff were able to acquit himself entirely, he began the new year without arrears; if not, a running account was kept by the same primitive method.

Particulars of account:
(1) The ferm
of the county.

The particulars accounted for by the sheriffs afford us a complete view of the financial condition of the country. The first item is the 'firma' or ferm of the shire³. This is a sort of composition for all the profits arising to the king from his ancient claims on the land and from the judicial proceedings of the shire-moot: the rent of detached pieces of demesne land, the remnants of the ancient folkland; the payments due from corporate bodies and individuals for the primitive gifts, the offerings made in kind, or the hospitality,—the feorm-fultum,—which the kings had a right to exact from their subjects, and which were before the time of Domesday generally commuted for money; the fines or a portion of the fines paid in the ordinary process of the county courts, and other small miscellaneous incidents. These had been, soon after the composition of Domesday, estimated at a fixed sum, which was regarded as a sort of rent or composition at which the county was let to the sheriff, and recorded in the Rotulus Exactorius; for this, under the name of ferm, he answered

¹ Dialogus, ii. 2; Select Charters, pp. 204, 205.

² Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 708. The fire which destroyed the old Houses of Parliament is said to have originated in the burning of the old Exchequer tallies.

³ The farm, ferm, or firma, the rent or composition for the ancient feorm-fultum, or provision payable in kind to the Anglo-Saxon kings. The history of the word in its French form would be interesting. The use of the word for a pecuniary payment is traced long before the Norman Conquest; Stapleton, i. p. xiv. On the Rotulus Exactorius, see Dialogus, i. c. 18.

annually; if his receipts were in excess, he retained the balance as his lawful profit, the wages of his service; if the proceeds fell below the ferm, he had to pay the difference from his own purse. If land chargeable with these sums fell out of cultivation, he was excused a proportionate amount under the head of waste; if new land was brought under tillage, he had to account for the profit under the title of increment¹. Before rendering this account, the sheriff discharged the king's debts in the shire, paid the royal benefactions to religious houses, provided for the maintenance of stock on the crown lands, the expenses of public business, the cost of provisions supplied to the court, and the travelling expenses of the king and his visitors incurred within his district². The payments had been long made in kind, and even in the reign of Henry II old men remembered the corn and cattle brought up to the court as the tribute of various shires³; horses, hounds, and hawks were still received at a settled valuation, in payment of debt or fine⁴.

The next item in point of importance is the Danegeld, a tax which had assumed in Norman times the character of ordinary revenue, and which, like the ferm, was compounded for by the sheriff at a fixed sum. This tax had been increased heavily by William the Conqueror: in A.D. 1084 it had been trebled⁵; six shillings were exacted from each hide of land, instead of two, the usual sum raised under the Anglo-Saxon kings. It may be reasonably inferred that the fixing of the sum of the Danegeld for each county was one of the results of the Domesday Survey; and it must not be understood that the sums accounted for under this head afford any clue to the extent of land in culti-

Sources and burdens of the ferm.

(2) The Danegeld.

¹ Madox, pp. 225, 226. ² Dialogus, ii. 6; Select Charters, pp. 212, 213.

³ Dialogus, i. 7; Select Charters, p. 185.

⁴ E. g. Ivo de Heriz pays five dextrarii, destriers or war-horses, that he may have certain lands at fee-farm; Pipe Roll 31 Henry I, p. 7: Reginald de Muscans pays one fugator, or coursing-dog, for the like privilege; ibid. 35: William de Merlai, a palfrey; p. 36: Outi de Lincoln, a hundred 'Norrise' hawks and a hundred gerfaleons; p. 111. The fugator seems to have been worth twenty shillings, p. 35; a hawk 40s., p. 47; a destrier from 40s. to £20, pp. 11, 85. In Domesday, the count of Meulan (Mellent) receives a large payment in honey as one of the dues of the county. Abundant illustrations of this may be found both in Domesday and in the Pipe Rolls.

⁵ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1083.

Exemptions and compositions.

vation. Monasteries possessed in many cases immunity from Danegeld; in other cases they had special commutations; a large extent of land frequently 'defendit se,' that is, was held responsible, or rated, as one hide; and all persons employed in the king's service were excepted from the impost. The Danegeld was a very unpopular tax, probably because it was the plea on which the sheriffs made their greatest profit; and it was accordingly made a point among the concessions won from Stephen at the beginning of his reign. It was abolished by Henry II, who however taxed the land in much the same way under other names; and was in very nearly the same form reproduced under the title of carucage by the ministers of Richard I. With the Danegeld may be noticed another impost which fell in the time of Henry I on the towns chiefly, and which, although it bore the feudal name of *auxilium*¹ or aid, and answers to the later tallage, was probably the tax which represented in the case of the towns the same demand as in the country was met by the Danegeld. It seems, like the Danegeld, to have been a fixed sum payable annually.

The auxilium
burgorum.

(5) Proceeds of the pleas of the crown.

A third head of ordinary or ancient national revenue comprised the proceeds of the pleas of the crown; the fines and other profits arising from the trial of offences which had been severed from the ordinary operation of the shire and hundred, and which, although tried before the sheriff in his character as justice, were, so far as the fines were concerned, made to contribute directly to the income of the king². Of these the most important is the murdrum, the fine payable, as has been already stated, by the hundred in which a murder has taken place in case of its failing to prove the slain man to be an Englishman. The commixture of the populations had so far proceeded in the time of Henry II that it was impossible to decide the question of nationality, and all murders were punished alike¹. With these may be mentioned a wide class of amercements, some of which have their origin in Anglo-Saxon and some in feudal customs; of the former are fines for non-appearance in the hundred and shire courts, and of the latter penalties for breach of forest law.

¹ In the Pipe Roll of 31 Henry I, the auxilium burgi or civitatis is in every case a round sum, varying from £3, the auxilium of Wincheombe, to £120, the auxilium of London. Besides these auxilia burgorum there are some small payments in Wilts and Berks called auxilium comitatus, and in Surrey, Essex, and Devon, auxilium militum. If these are not arrears from a previous year, in which there may have been some general impost of the sort, they must be regarded as special payments belonging to those counties. An auxilium de militibus is mentioned in the Liber Niger, i. 56, where it is said that when the king takes an auxilium of 20s., the knights of William of Avranches, in Kent, pay only 12s.; if he takes a mark, they pay 8s.: this seems however to be a scutage. The auxilium vicecomitis was a different payment, made to the sheriff for his services. These auxilia must be distinguished from the three feudal aids.

² Above, p. 187.

Under the head of feudal income² come all the items arising from the transfer of lands, reliefs, guardianship, marriage, escheat, and other incidents; the sale of public offices included. This was of course a large and comparatively permanent source of revenue. The arbitrary sums exacted under the name of reliefs by William Rufus were one of the grievances which Henry I in his coronation charter undertook to redress. We are not able to discover how this promise was fulfilled, for although in the reign of Henry II a regular arrangement appears to be in force by which the relief of the knight's fee was five pounds, and that of the barony one hundred, the corresponding payments in his grandfather's reign are not to be brought under so simple a principle³. It is however probable that a record of the number of knights' fees in England had been made before the death of Henry I, and that it was the basis of the computation adopted by his grandson. Before this was done, the valuation, where the payment was not altogether arbitrary, must have been made according to the record of the hidage preserved in Domesday. And it may be observed, that whilst Henry I took,

(4) Feudal income.

Reliefs.

¹ Dialogus, i. 10; Select Charters, p. 193. The payments on this head are very various, even in the same hundred; see the Roll of 31 Henry I, pp. 8, 9, &c.

² The five marks of feudal tenure (1) hereditary succession, (2) reliefs, (3) wardship and marriage (4) aids, and (5) escheats, all receive abundant illustration from the Roll of 31 Henry I.

³ Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 216 sq.: e.g. under Henry II Hugh de Chaucumb pays £30 for a relief for six knights' fees. But the sums continue to vary occasionally until settled by Magna Carta, which refers to the system mentioned above, as the antiquum relevium: and the Dialogus describes the relief of a baron as matter of special arrangement with the king: lib. ii. c. 10.

Aids. as an aid for the marriage of his daughter, three shillings on each hide¹, Henry II, on a like occasion, took one mark on the knight's fee². Whatever was the basis of rating, all the feudal incidents would be accounted for in the same way. Henry I may have taken an aid on the occasion of his son's knighthood, as he did on his daughter's marriage, but of this there is no record. The Pipe Roll of the thirty-first year of his reign contains several notices of sums paid for permission to determine suits connected with land, by covenant or by trial by battle; for leave to marry, to avoid answering the claim of another claimant, for cancelling agreements of exchange, and for other liberties which betray the existence of a good deal of legal oppression.

Exactions
under the forest law.

The forest law, which, heavy as it was under William the Conqueror, seems to have reached the extreme of severity and cruelty under Henry I, was also made a source of revenue. The fines exacted by the justices under this system form a considerable item in the accounts.

Sale of offices.

Among the great offices of the household which appear from the Pipe Roll to have been saleable are those of dapifer, marshal, and chancellor. The last-mentioned officer in A.D. 1130 owes £3006 13s. 4d. for the great seal³; the office of treasurer was bought by Bishop Nigel for his son for £400⁴. Inferior places in the legal staff are also sold. In Norfolk, Benjamin pays £4 5s. to be allowed to keep the pleas of the crown⁵; in Northumberland, Uhtred son of Waltheof makes a payment for the grant of sac and soc, and a similar transaction is recorded in Suffolk⁶; John the Marshal pays forty marks for a mastership in the king's court, Humfrey Bohun four hundred marks to be dapifer regis⁷; Richard Fitz-Alured pays fifteen marks that he may sit with Ralph Basset on the king's pleas in Buckinghamshire⁸. At the same time the officers of the ancient courts are found purchasing relief from their respon-

¹ Hen. Hunt. fol. 217.

² Roll 31 Henry I, p. 140.

³ Roll 31 Henry I, p. 91.

⁴ Ibid. p. 18. Adam de Port pays £9 to be dapifer. Ibid.

⁵ Ibid. p. 101.

⁶ Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 398.

⁷ Hist. Eliens., Ang. Sac. i. 627.

⁸ Ibid. pp. 36, 98.

sibilities; the judices and juratores of Yorkshire pay £100 that they may be judges and jurors no longer, anxious no doubt to avoid the heavy fines exacted from them either for non-attendance or for other neglect of duty¹.

The sum accounted for in the single Pipe Roll of the reign of Henry I, including all the debts and other gross receipts, is not less than £66,000 for the year. The exhaustive and orderly character of the roll is in marked contrast with the very scanty details of the similar accounts at the beginning of Henry II's reign, when the whole sum accounted for is not more than £22,000: and this fully confirms the statements of the historians and of the writer of the Dialogus de Scaccario, as to the ruinous state into which the machinery of government had fallen under Stephen.

But it is not only in the department of finance that this most important record illustrates constitutional history, and we must refer to it again in examining the framework of the Norman judicature. Before doing this it will be necessary to recur to the Domesday Survey, which was not only the general record of the royal revenue, but the rate-book of valuation of all the land in the kingdom. The formation of this record afforded a precedent for a rating system which was of no small importance in its bearing on later history: and it is not a little singular that a measure taken by the Conqueror, in order to fix and make available to the utmost his hold upon the country, should be the first step in a continuous process by which the nation arrived ultimately at the power of taxing itself, and thus controlling the whole framework of the constitution and the whole policy of government.

The Domesday Survey was taken by officers appointed by the king, who visited the several counties, and called before them all those persons of whom in ordinary times the county court was composed. Tradition recorded that, when the Conqueror wished to confirm the national laws, in order to obtain a true report of those laws he summoned to his court twelve elected representatives of each shire to declare upon oath the ancient lawful customs¹. A similar plan was now adopted. The king's barons exacted an oath from the sheriff and all the barons and Norman landholders of the shire; every hundred appeared also by sworn representatives, and from each township the priest, the reeve, and six villeins or ceorls². On the deposition or verdict of these jurors was drawn up the report of the name of each manor or township, and its present and late holder; its extent in hides, the number of ploughs for which it furnished work; the number of homagers, ceorls or villeins, cotters, and serfs; how many freemen, how many soke-men; the extent of wood, meadow, and pasture; the number of mills and fisheries; the increase and decrease since King Edward's time; the several and collective values of every holding. By this report an exhaustive register of the land and its capabilities was formed, which was never entirely superseded; for although the feudal taxation was, within a century after, based on the knight's fee instead of the hide, much of the general taxation continued to be assessed on the hide, and, the number of hides which the knight's fee contained being known, the number of knights' fees in any particular holding could be easily discovered. Ranulf Flambard, as Ordericus Vitalis informs us, attempted to reduce the number of acres contained in the hide from the English to the Norman computation, and if he had succeeded the measure would have compelled a new assessment³; but as Domesday continued to be the ultimate authority for the rating of the country, the attempt, if it were ever made, must be understood to have failed. But the changes in the ownership

¹ Roll 31 Henry I, p. 34.

The Domesday Survey.

Taken by inquest.

A permanent assessment.

¹ Hoveden, ii. 218; Select Charters, p. 78.

² 'Hic subscribitur inquisitio terrarum, quo modo barones regis inquirunt, videlicet per sacramentum vicecomitis scirae et omnium baronum et eorum Francigenarum, et totius centuriatus, presbyteri, praepositi, vi. villanorum uniuscujusque villæ. Deinde quomodo vocatur mansio; quis tenuit eam tempore regis Eadwardi, quis modo tenet, quot hidæ, quot carrucatae in dominio, quot hominum; quot villani, quot cotarii, quot servi; quot liberi homines, quot sochemanni; quantum silvæ, quantum prati, quot pascuorum, quot molendina, quot piscinae; quantum est additum vel ablatum; quantum valebat totum simul, et quantum modo; quantum ibi quisque liber homo vel sochemannus habuit vel habet. Hoc totum tripliciter, scilicet tempore regis Aedwardi et quando rex Willelmus dedit, et quomodo sit modo; et si potest plus haberi quam habeatur.' Ely Domesday, Dom. iii. 497. Henry of Huntingdon gives the commissioners the title of justitiarum; fol. 212.

³ See above, pp. 298, 302, 348.

of land, the formation of new forests, and the bringing of old wastes into cultivation, must have made it difficult to secure a fair apportionment of taxation; and this compelled on the part of the exchequer proceedings which we find in close connexion with the provincial administration of justice. It is unnecessary here to anticipate in detail what must be repeated under the head of judicature: it is enough to remark that, as early as the reign of William Rufus, questions of assessment were referred by the crown to the report of the county court, and that in the reign of Henry I the assessment and levying of taxation seems to have formed one portion of the duty of the justices, who, with the functions if not with the name of itinerant judges, transacted the local business of the Exchequer in each shire ¹.

Circuits of the barons of the Exchequer to adjust the rating.

127. So intimate is the connexion of judicature with finance under the Norman kings, that we scarcely need the comments of the historians to guide us to the conclusion, that it was mainly for the sake of the profits that justice was administered at all. Such no doubt was the principle upon which Ranulf Flambard and his master acted. A deeper and more statesmanlike view probably influenced Henry I and his great minister—the belief that a nation in which justice is done is safer and more contented, and presents therefore an easier and richer body to be taxed. But there is no reason to suppose that Henry acted on any higher motive: the value of justice depended in his eyes very much on the amount of treasure with which it supplied him; and accordingly there is not a single fiscal or judicial measure of his reign by which light is not thrown both on the Curia Regis and on the Exchequer.

Royal justice a profitable source of revenue.

The Curia Regis, the supreme tribunal of judicature, of which the Exchequer was the financial department or session, was, as has been stated already, the court of the king sitting to administer justice with the advice of his counsellors ²; those

The Curia Regis in its judicial character.

¹ See below, p. 390.

² That William the Conqueror heard causes in person we know from Lanfranc's words in a letter (Ep. 19) addressed to Herfast bishop of Elmham: 'Rex . . . praecepit ut querimonia de clericis abbatis Balduini . . . sopita remaneret, quo ad usque ipsemet ipsam causam audiret vel a me . . . audiri praeciperet.' Down to the reign of John the kings occasionally administered justice in person; Henry II very frequently.

counsellors being, in the widest acceptation, the whole body of tenants-in-chief, but in the more limited usage, the great officers of the household and specially appointed judges. The great gatherings of the national council may be regarded as full sessions of the Curia Regis, or the Curia Regis as a perpetual committee of the national council, but there is no evidence to prove that the supreme judicature so originated. In the more general meetings, as at the three annual placita, the king wore his crown, and consulted, or made a show of consulting, his vassals on all matters of state. The courts in the king's absence were presided over by the chief or great justiciar, acting 'ex praecepto regis' or 'vice sua'; 'in meo loco,' as the Conqueror expressed it¹. The other persons who bear the title of justiciar, the ordinary members, as they may be called, of the court, were the same as those of the Exchequer; the same persons who acted as barons in the latter acted as justices in the former: the fines paid or remitted in the Curia were recorded in the Exchequer, and the writ that was issued in the one chamber was treated by the other as being, what it was truly, its own act. The great officers of the household seem to have acted in the business of the Curia Regis, simply however as justices; we have no record that apportioned to them the definite seats or functions which they held in the Exchequer; accordingly

The three annual courts.

Justices of the Curia.

Place of the officers of the household.

¹ Gneist's conclusions on the character of the supreme judicature of the Norman reigns are as follows:—Under the name of the Curia Regis is to be understood the personal judicature of the king: the Curia Regis does not consist of the entire community of tenants-in-chief, for as yet they formed no distinct body or corporation; nor of a definite number of great vassals, for there was as yet no legal line drawn between great vassals and small; nor of a definite number of great officials, for the great officials were not so constituted as to form a court of peers: the justice of the Curia, which was not administered by the king himself, was administered by special commissions, not by a standing body of judges, or by the barons of the Exchequer. Verwalt. i. 232, 241–243. This is an extreme view, and in harmony with the general idea held by this great jurist of the absolute despotism of the Norman sovereigns. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the general tendency of English writers has been to ascribe to the legal institutions of the period greater solidity and definiteness than they can be proved to have possessed. The view which I have tried to indicate in the text and in the Select Charters, regarding the period as one of transition, in which routine was gradually becoming a check on despotic authority, will probably not commend itself to the maintainers of either view.

when we find the chancellor or chamberlain sitting in judgment, we are not to suppose that the cause on which he decides is one belonging specially to the chancery or the chamber; he is simply a member of the king's judicial court.

The number of persons who filled the office of justice or baron of the Exchequer during the Norman reigns was not very large, nor are the relations of the members of the court to one another very well defined; it is even possible that a close examination of existing records would show that all the officers who discharged judicial functions were members, under some other title, of the king's household. Roger of Salisbury bore the name of 'justitiarius' from the year 1107 to his death; but there are several other justices¹, mentioned both in records and by the historians, whose position seems to be scarcely inferior to his². Ralph Basset appears early in the reign of Henry I as a very influential judge³; his son Richard is called by Ordericus Vitalis and Henry of Huntingdon 'capitalis justitiarius'⁴ even during the life of Bishop Roger; and Geoffrey de Clinton, who was the king's chamberlain or treasurer, held

The number
of justices small.

Justices
under Henry I.

¹ Besides the question of the chief justiciarship, treated above, the title of justitia, or justitiarius, has obscurities of its own. (1) It is often used in a very general way, in the salutations prefixed to charters, 'comitibus et baronibus et justitiariis et vicecomitibus;' in which it seems to include, as it did in France, all landowners who possess courts of their own, or are qualified to act as judices in the shire-moot. See Henry I's charter to London, Stephen's charter, and the Leges Henrici I, § 29; Select Charters, pp. 102, 103, 113. (2) It belongs to the sheriffs, who are called by John of Salisbury (Polyer. v. 15, 16) justitiarum errantes, and to whom the name justitia in the so-called Laws of Edward the Confessor seems to belong. It is probable that whilst the sheriff, in his character of sheriff, was competent to direct the customary business of the court, it was in that of justitia that he transacted special business under the king's writ. Bracton, lib. iii. c. 35 (ed. 1640, f. 154). (3) It is specially given to officers of the king's court, e. g. to Miles of Gloucester, 'baroni et justitiario meo' (Charter of Stephen, Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 135); in which sense it seems to prove that his position was one of judicial authority as well as ministerial. (4) To the chief justice. Henry of Huntingdon gives the name to the commissioners of the Domesday Survey, fol. 212, who are called barones in the Survey itself; see above, p. 386.

² See the remarks on the development of the chief justiciarship, above, p. 346. Henry I tells Anselm that he has ordered the justiciars to act by his advice. (Epp. Ans. iv. 93.)

³ Ord. Vit. vi. 10, xi. 2; Chron. Abingdon, ii. 170.

⁴ Ord. Vit. xiii. 26; Hen. Hunt. de Cont. Mundi; Ang. Sac. ii. 701.

pleas in A.D. 1130 over all England¹. The Pipe Roll of that year furnishes us with the names of other justices: pleas were held not only by the two Bassets and Geoffrey de Clinton, but by William of Albini the Butler, Eustace Fitz-John and Walter Espec, Miles of Gloucester the Constable, Pain Fitz-John, Robert Arundel, and Walkelin Visdeloup². Other names may perhaps be found in the charters of Henry I and Stephen. The capitalis justitia however seems to be the only one of the body to whom a determinate position as the king's representative is assigned in formal documents³.

Character of the Curia
Regis.

The Curia Regis, in this aspect, was the machinery through which the judicial power of the crown was exercised in that wide sphere of legal business on which, in its now complicated relations, it was brought to bear. That business consisted largely of causes in which the king's interest was concerned, or which were brought up by way of appeal when the powers of the popular courts had been exhausted or had failed to do justice⁴. In these particulars it succeeded to the royal jurisdiction of the Anglo-Saxon kings. It was also a tribunal of primary resort in cases of disputes between the tenants-in-chief of the crown, a feudal court in which were arranged the quarrels of the Norman lords, who were too strong to submit to the simple justice of the shire and hundred⁵. It was however more than this: the

It inherits something from the Anglo-Saxon system, and something from the Norman.

¹ See Mon. Angl. vi. 218. Pipe Roll 31 Hen. I.

² Ibid.

³ See the charter of Henry I to the canons of Trinity, Aldgate: 'Et prohibeo super forisfacturam meam quod non ponantur in placitum de aliquo tenemento nisi coram me vel capitali justitia meo.' Foed. i. 12.

⁴ The Pipe Roll of Henry I does not expressly mention the jurisdiction of the Curia Regis, but it is probable that most of the entries 'pro recto terrae suae' and the like refer to suits in which a writ has been obtained from the court. Cases in the King's court during the reign of Henry I will be found in the Chronicle of Battle, p. 51; in the Chronicle of Abingdon, ii. 182; in the Cartulary of Gloucester, i. 236; in Elmham, ed. Hardwick, pp. 355, 362, 366, 382. 'Ric. de Kullo debet i. marcam auri ut juste tractetur in curia domini sui;' Pipe Roll. p. 143. 'Walterus Maltravers reddit computum de 20 marcis argenti ut rex juvet eum versus Paganum Filium Johannis;' Ibid. p. 124. 'Burgenses de Gloecstra debent 30 marcas argenti si possent recuperare pecuniam suam per justitiam regis, quae ablata fuit eis in Hibernia;' Ibid. p. 77.

⁵ 'Et si anodo exurgat placitum de divisione terrarum, si est inter barones meos dominicos, tractetur placitum in curia mea; et, si est inter vavassores duorum dominorum, tractetur in comitatu.' Writ of Henry I: Select Charters, p. 99. Such a trial is described in a charter of Henry I ancient customary process of the local courts, with that strict maintenance of formalities and that incapacity for regarding equitable considerations which seems inseparable from the idea of compurgation and ordeal, was now becoming antiquated. As a special favour, suits were brought up from the view of the provincial courts to be decided by such new methods as the wisdom of the king and his counsellors might invent; and from the Curia Regis issued the writs which directed inquiry and recognition of rights as to land, the obligations of tenure, the legitimacy of heirs, and the enforcement of local justice¹. These writs, although not absolutely unknown in England before the Conquest, were derived no doubt in their Norman form from the process of the Karolingian lawyers; they were the expedients by which the 'jus honorarium' of the king, as fountain of justice, was enabled to remedy the defects of the 'jus civile' or 'commune,' the customary proceedings of the local moots².

Its growing importance as a resource for equity.

System of writs.

Their origin.

The Curia Regis had criminal jurisdiction also, as Ralph Basset proved when he hanged forty-four thieves at Hundehoge³. It was in fact a supreme court of justice, both of appeal and, where leave was obtained, of primary recourse.

Criminal jurisdiction.

But it was also a ministry of justice, before which the whole judicial action of the country passed in review. This was done partly by the Court of Exchequer, in which, as we have seen, the sheriffs annually rendered their accounts; but partly also by direct inspection. The provincial judicature was brought into immediate connexion with the central judicature by journeys of the king's judges. We have seen traces of this arrangement as early as the time of Alfred, who may have been acquainted with the system in use under the Frank emperors⁴. Edgar and Canute had themselves made judicial circuits; the Conqueror's choice of the three great cities of the south of England for his annual placita brought the sense of royal justice home to the country at

Review of provincial judicature.

in the Cartulary of Gloucester, i. 236: and see the trial of the bishop of Durham; below, p. 440.

¹ Writs of these kinds will be found in great numbers in most monastic cartularies; e. g. Chron. Abingdon, ii. 92, 93, 84, 85.

² On the connexion of the Norman and English Brevia with the Frankish Indiculi, see Brunner, Schwurgericht, pp. 76-84; and below, Chap. XII.

³ Chron. Sax. A.D. 1124.

⁴ See above, p. 183.

Circuits of the justices.

large. But Henry I went a step further. He sent the officers of the Exchequer through the country to assess the revenue¹; and during his reign the whole kingdom was visited by justices, officers of the Curia Regis, not perhaps with the systematic regularity enforced by his grandson, but with sufficient order to prove that he saw and satisfied the want of such an expedient. In A.D. 1130 Geoffrey de Clinton, the chamberlain, had lately visited seventeen out of the thirty-four counties of which the accounts are preserved; Ralph Basset had visited seven; Richard Basset five; Eustace Fitz-John and Walter Espec had held pleas in the northern counties; Miles of Gloucester and Pain Fitz-John in the west-midland and the Welsh March; William of Albini, Robert Arundel and others, in the forests and in the south-western counties. It is probable that this was by no means an exceptional measure: in A.D. 1124 we find Ralph Basset, as has been frequently mentioned, holding a court in Leicestershire; Ordericus Vitalis gives an account of a trial held before him in the county court of Huntingdonshire in A.D. 1115 or 1116². A measure dictated still more distinctly by this policy may be traced in the list of sheriffs for A.D. 1130. Richard Basset and Aubrey de Vere, a judge and a royal chamberlain, act as joint sheriffs in no less than eleven counties: Geoffrey de Clinton, Miles of Gloucester, William of Pont l'Arche the Treasurer, are also sheriffs as well as justices of the king's court. That such a system was open to much abuse is self-evident; these officers sitting as judges and barons in the Exchequer actually audited the accounts which they presented as sheriffs; but they were under the strong control of the king and Bishop Roger; and although there were scandals no doubt, such as that for which Geoffrey de Clinton was tried in this very year³, the important fact remains that by these means the king and justiciar kept in their hands the reins

Action of the justices in
the country,
in the county courts.

The sheriffdoms held by the justices.

¹ The great fiscal iter of Henry I's reign is mentioned in the Dialogus de Scaccario, i. c. 7: in it the terms of the counties were fixed.

² 'Radulfo autem Basset sedento pro tribunali, congregatis etiam provincialibus universis apud Huntingdoniam, ut mos est in Anglia.' Ord. Vit. vi. 10. Ralph may have been sheriff of Huntingdonshire at the time, but he was in attendance on the queen, and seems to have acted on the same business in London shortly after.

³ See above, p. 372.

of the entire judicial administration. The justices whilst employed in provincial work sat in the shire-moot; and this usage of Henry I, with the series of similar measures initiated by Henry II, forms the link between the old and new organisations of the country, by which that concentration of local machinery was produced, out of which the representative system arose. The parliament of the thirteenth century was the concentration of local representation in and with the national council. It was no small step in that direction when the action of the Curia Regis was brought into direct connexion with that of the shire-moot. The Norman curia met the Anglo-Saxon gemot in the visitations of the itinerant justices.

Step toward self-government.

128. We thus come to the constitution of the shire-moot. In a former chapter the history of this institution has been traced up to and past the date of the Conquest; and it has already been shown how in the inquest which preceded the Domesday Survey, as well as in the production of the record of Edward's laws, the means of gaining information which it afforded were utilised. The existence of the shire-moot through the reigns of the Conqueror¹ and William Rufus is proved by the existence of writs addressed, as in the preceding reigns, to the sheriffs and other leading members². There is in existence a writ directed by William Rufus to the sheriff of Northamptonshire ordering him to call together his shire to examine into the rights of the monks of Ramsey³. It appears from the very charter by which Henry I orders the restoration of the ancient courts that they had been used under his brother for the purposes of extortion⁴,

The county courts.

Abuses of these courts.

¹ 'Requiratur hundredus et comitatus sicut antecessores nostri statuerunt.' Ll. Will. I; Select Charters, p. 81.

² 'Willem king gret Willem biscop and Swein scirefen and alle mine thegnes on Estsexen frondlice.' Mon. Angl. i. 301. See a similar writ in favour of Chertsey Abbey, ibid. i. 431.

³ 'Rex Willelmo de Cahannis, salutem. Præcipio tibi ut facias convenire sciram de Hamtona et iudicio ejus cognosce,' &c. Palgrave, Commonwealth, clxxix.

⁴ 'Henricus rex Anglorum Samsoni episcopo et Ursoni de Abetot, et omnibus baronibus suis Francis et Anglis de Wirecestresira, salutem. Sciatis quod concedo et præcipio ut amodo comitatus mei et hundreda in illis locis et eisdem terminis sedeant sicut sederunt in tempore regis Eadwardi et non aliter; ego enim quando voluero faciam ea satis summonere propter mea dominica necessaria ad voluntatem meam.' Select Charters, and the same may be inferred from the description of Ranulf Flambard as 'driving all the gemots' throughout all England. From the year 1108 onwards these courts, as well as those of the hundred, were held 'as in King Edward's days and not otherwise.' The lords of land and their stewards attended, and from each township the reeve and four men¹, and the parish priest. The full court met twice a year under the sheriff or his deputy, and was still competent to declare folk-right in every suit; the pleas of the crown were recorded in it for the view of the Curia Regis, whether reported by the sheriff to the Exchequer or examined by the justices in a provincial visit². It had a criminal as well as a civil jurisdiction as before, although the management of the pleas of the crown on the one side, and the interference by royal writ on the other, must have materially affected its independence. It retained however all its authority in matters of voluntary jurisdiction, witnessing transfers of land, and sanctioning by its testimony private charters and documents of all sorts. The ancient forms were also in use; witness, compurgation, and ordeal; and the old theory that in these popular courts the suitors were judges.

The shire-moot.

Antiquity of its customs.

The new light thrown on the shire-moot, by the increased number of records, makes it a little difficult to know what particulars of custom, now for the first time discoverable, are new or old. The composition of the court and its times of session are however clearly ancient. The custom of interference of the crown by writ, although not unprecedented³, is, as a custom,

p. 99. Compare Leges Henrici I, c. vii. § 1: 'Sicut antiqua fuerat institutione formatum, salutari regis imperio, vera nuper est recordatione formatum, generalia comitatum placita certis locis et vicibus et diffinito tempore per singulas Angliæ provincias convenire debere, nec ullis ultra fatigationibus agitari nisi propria regis necessitas vel commune regni commo- lum sæpius adjiciat.'

¹ 'Intersint autem episcopi, comites, vicedomini, vicarii, centenarii, aldermanni, præfecti, præpositi, barones, vavasores, tungrevii, et ceteri terrarum domini. . . Si uterque (sc. baro et dapifer) necessario desit, præpositus et quatuor de melioribus villæ assint pro omnibus qui nominati non erunt ad placitum submoniti.' Ibid. §§ 2, 6.

² 'Agantur itaque primo debita veræ Christianitatis jura; secundo regis placita; postremo causæ singulorum dignis satisfactionibus expleantur et quoscunque scyresmot discordantes inveniet, vel amore congregat vel sequestret iudicio.' Ibid.

³ See above, p. 187.

new¹. The references to trial by battle, which now become common, show that the Normans had introduced that custom in its legal completeness. But the most important novelty is the inquest by oath, which has been already referred to, and which forms an important link in the history of the jury. William the Conqueror directs the justiciars on one occasion to assemble the shire-moots which had taken part in a suit touching the rights of Ely; that being done, there were to be chosen a number of the English who knew the state of the disputed lands in the reign of Edward; these were to swear to the truth of their depositions; and action was to be taken accordingly². A similar writ of William Rufus to the sheriff of Northamptonshire, already mentioned, directs a like proceeding in the affairs of Ramsey; whilst two writs of William the Etheling to the sheriff of Kent order, and direct action to be taken upon, the verdict or recognition of the good men of that county in reference to the rights of S. Augustine's³.

Trial by battle and inquest by jury.

Inquest by
sworn jurors.

¹ For example; 'Henricus rex Anglorum Nigello de'Oilli et Willelmo vicecomiti de Oxeneforde salutem. Praecipio vobis ut faciatis abbati de Abben-dona plenariam rectitudinem de exclusa sua,' &c. Chron. Abingd. ii. 92. 'H. rex Anglorum, W. vicecomiti de Oxeneforde, salutem. Fac cito et sine mora plenam justitiam Faritio,' &c. Ibid.

² 'W. rex Anglorum Lanfranco archiepiscopo et Rogero comiti Moritonii et Gauffrido Constantiensi episcopo salutem. Mando vobis et praecipio ut iterum faciatis congregari omnes scyras quae interfuerunt placito habito de terris ecclesiae de Heli, antequam mea conjunx in Normanniam novissime veniret; cum quibus etiam sint de baronibus meis qui competenter adesse poterunt et praedicto placito interfuerunt et qui terras ejusdem ecclesiae tenent. Quibus in unum congregatis eligantur plures de illis Anglis qui sciunt quomodo terrae jacebant praefatae ecclesiae die qua rex Edwardus obiit, et quod inde dixerint ibidem jurando testentur.' Liber Eliensis, i. 256. The result of the inquiry is referred to by Henry I as final: 'Sicut dirationatum fuit in tempore patris mei apud Keneteford, coram baronibus patris mei . . . et testimonio plurium syrarum.' Mon. Angl. i. 482.

³ 'Willelmus filius regis Willelmo vicecomiti de Chent salutem. Praecipio quod praecipias Hamonein filium Vitalis et probis vicinis Santwic quos Hamo nominabit, ut dicant veritatem de nave abbatis de Sancto Augustino, et, si navis illa perrexit per mare die qua rex novissime mare transivit, tunc praecipio ut modo pergat quousque rex in Angliam veniat et iterum resaisiatur inde abbas praedictus. Testibus episcopo Sarisb. et cancellario apud Wodestoc.' 'W. filius regis W. vicecomiti salutem. Praecipio quod resaisias abbatem de Sancto Augustino de nave sua sicut ego praecepi per meum aliud breve et sicut recognitum fuit per probos homines comitatus, quod inde abbas erat saisitus die qua rex mare novissime transivit, et in pace teneat, et hoc sine mora, ne inde clamorem amplius audiam. Teste cancellario apud Windesor.' Palgrave, Commonwealth, clxxx.; Elmham, Question as to a jury of presentment.

The jurors and judges of the shire-moot.

The employment of a number of sworn thegns to report on the character of accused persons, which has been traced to the laws of Ethelred, may probably have continued to be usual; and thus the growth of the jury in criminal matters may have kept pace with its development in civil affairs. But of this we have slight evidence, unless the session of Hundehoge, where the thegns of Huntingdonshire acted with the king's justiciar, may be again appealed to. But however this may be, it is certain that the administration of justice in the shire-moot was now vested in persons who were bound by oath to the fulfilment of their duties and to speak the truth¹. The Pipe Roll of Henry I proves the existence of large bodies of judices and juratores. Whether the terms are equivalent; whether they merely mean the qualified members of the courts from whose body witnesses and compurgators must be chosen; whether the judices were a permanent body of local proprietors², and the juratores a selection of freemen sworn to declare the truth in the particular case; whether the judices may not have been the presenters of the criminals, and the juratores the witnesses in the civil suits, ed. Hardwick, pp. 353, 354: in the latter place these acts are referred to William Rufus during his father's life; but this is very improbable. The same authority furnishes another writ of the same sort; p. 356: 'Fae recognosci per homines hundredi de Middeltone quas consuetudines Abbas S. Augustini habere debet in villa de Newingtone.' A writ of Stephen ordering restitution to the church of S. Martin, London, in pursuance of a like recognition, 'Sicut recognitum et testificatum fuit coram M. vicecomite in hundredo apud Meldonam,' is printed in Madox, Formulare Angl. p. 40. In 1106 Henry I commissions five barons to ascertain the customs of the church of York by the oath of twelve men; Thorton, Nottinghamshire, iii. 177.

¹ The promissory oath, such as that taken by the twelve thegns to accuse no one falsely, and by modern jurymen to 'well and truly try and true deliverance make,' as well as that of the modern witness, differs widely from the declaratory oath of the ancient popular courts, which was confined to the affirmation of a single fact, prescribed by the judges as the point to be proved, or to the confirmation by compurgators of the oath of a principal. The observance of the distinction would have served to prevent the construction of many improbable theories of the origin of juries. The oath of the jury-inquest was a promise to speak the truth, 'Sacramentum quod verum dicent' (Assize of Clarendon), or 'Quod inde veritatem secundum conscientiam suam manifestabunt' (Const. Clarendon).

² The judices in the county court are described in the Leges Hen. I. c. xxix.: 'Regis judices sunt barones comitatus, qui liberas in eis terras habent per quos debent causae singulorum alterna prosecutione tractari, villani vero vel cotseti vel ferdingi vel qui sunt viles vel inopes personae non sunt inter legum judices numerandi.'

it would be dangerous even to guess. They appear however to be distinguished from the 'minuti homines,' or mean men, who were likewise bound to attend the shire-moot and hundred-moot, and who probably did not possess so much land as was necessary to qualify a man for acting as judge in a suit in which land was in question. That these persons were very numerous is certain from the very large fines imposed on them for neglect of duty. In Yorkshire the sheriff accounts for thirty-one marks drawn from nine 'judicatores comitatus;' and for 336 marks five shillings and sixpence 'de minutis iudicibus et juratoribus comitatus.' It is no wonder that we find almost immediately after that the unfortunate payers have undertaken to compound for their attendance: 'The judges and jurors of Yorkshire owe a hundred pounds that they may no more be judges or jurors'.¹ The sheriff of Kent accounts for £17 3s. 4d. from the jurors of Kent, and another sum from Sussex; in Essex, £5 6s. 8d. is raised from the 'minuti homines;' in Lincolnshire, seventy-four marks and a-half; in Bedfordshire, forty shillings from the 'juratores et minuti homines;' and four judges of the isle of Axholm render account for eight marks due for the pleas of William of Albini². It can scarcely be doubted that all these fines were incurred for non-attendance, and that they prove and judges of the shiremoot.

The jurors

¹ Pipe Roll Hen. I, pp. 27, 28. The entry 'Judices et juratores Eboraciscire debent £100 ut non amplius sint iudices nec juratores,' ibid. p. 34, is sometimes quoted as referring to Walter Espec and Eustace Fitz-John. This is however not the case: it is the first entry among the accounts accruing from the county of York in consequence of their visitation. The exact meaning of the entry is uncertain: Brunner (Schwurgericht, p. 355) adduces it as an illustration of the attempts made from the beginning of the jury system to escape the responsibility. It appears to me rather to refer to the old system which was gradually being replaced by the jury system, and to be a sort of composition for the fine incurred by non-attendance at the shire-moot and hundred-moot. But the same desire to avoid jury-work appears constantly later on, when fines 'pro defectu recognitionis' are frequent. To the scarcity of qualified jurors the following passage refers: 'Si opus est, licet in placitis iudicibus qui aderunt respectare placitum ex abundantia, donec senatores absentes interesse possint, vel ipsi iudicium inquisierint; nec jure cogendi sunt ad jurandum quod nesciant iudicium inde;' i. e. in cases in which at the county court there is not a sufficient number of qualified judges informed on the particular case, the trial may be respited until either they have informed themselves, or the absent witan can be present. Leges Hen. I, c. 29.

² Pipe Roll Hen. I, pp. 65, 69, 118, &c.

either the dislike of the free-holders to attend the court of the justice itinerant, or a serious decline in the ancient constitution of the county courts. But this does not affect the main question, which is the continuance of the custom of employing jurors to transact the judicial work.

Extortion practised in the shire-moot.

The use made of the shire-moot for the purpose of raising money may account for the reluctance of the suitors to attend. That this was the practice is clearly shown by Henry's writ for the restoration of the ancient custom: 'I will cause those courts to be summoned when I will for my own sovereign necessities, at my pleasure¹;' an important engagement intended to deprive the sheriffs of their opportunities of wanton exaction, but to secure to the king the right of asking for or taking money when he should deem it necessary. Unfortunately this is the only evidence that we have of the method of raising money from the shire-moot²; but it seems almost certain that when the occasion arose, the counties would be consulted by the barons of the Exchequer and not by the sheriffs. The same writ directs that suits between the barons of the king's demesne for the division of land are to be decided in the Curia Regis; similar suits between vassals, 'vavassores,' in the county court and by trial by battle.

The hundred-moot.

Nearly all the general statements made about the shire-moot are true also of the hundred-moot. This also is restored by Henry I as it was in King Edward's days. The same reluctance to attend is proved by the entry of penalties on the Pipe Roll; the sheriff of Sussex accounts for 102 marks 'for the pleas of Richard Basset from the minuti homines for default of the hundred-moot;' and in Middlesex a small payment of the same kind is entered³. The 'Leges Henrici I,' as they are called,

¹ Above, p. 393.

² The following curious writ of Henry I proves both the formal demand of an aid from the barons of his court and the negotiation of the particulars through the officers of the Exchequer: 'H. rex Anglorum R. episcopo, et Herberto camerario et Hugoni de Bochelanda, salutem. Sciatis quod clamor quietas v. hidas abbatis Faricii de Abendona de elemosyna de Wrtha, de omnibus rebus, et nominatim de isto auxilio quod barones mihi dederunt, et hoc dico, sicut clamavi quietas eas per aliud breve meum in omni tempore. Testibus,' &c. Chron. Abingd. ii. 113.

³ Pipe Roll Hen. I, pp. 71, 151; cf. pp. 28, 30, 56, 117, 143.

attest the existence of the two courts of the hundred, the great one for view of frankpledge, held twice a year under the sheriff, and afterwards called the great court of the hundred, or Sheriff's tourn and leet¹; and the lesser court, the Curia parva Hundredi, held twelve times a year, and presided over by the bailiff of the hundred²: in the latter the chief business was probably the disputes about small debts, which long continued to furnish its sole employment³.

129. The manorial constitution, which is the lowest form of judicial organisation, was by this time largely if not completely developed. The manor itself was, as Ordericus tells us, nothing more nor less than the ancient township, now held by a lord who possessed certain judicial rights varying according to the terms of the grant by which he was infeoffed. Every manor had a court-baron, the ancient gemot of the township⁴, in which by-laws were made and other local business transacted, and a court-customary in which the business of the villenage was despatched. Those manors whose lords had under the Anglo-Saxon laws possessed sac and soc, or who since the Conquest had had grants in which those terms were used, had also a court-leet, or criminal jurisdiction, cut out as it were from the criminal jurisdiction of the hundred⁵, and excusing the suitors who attended

The manorial courts.

Court-baron, court-customary, and court-leet.

¹ Ll. Hen. I, c. viii: 'Bis in anno convenient in hundretum suum quinquē liberi . . . ad discendum inter caetera si decaniae plenae sint.'

² Ibid. c. vii: 'Hundreta vel wapentagia duodecies in anno congregari.' Under Henry II these courts were held every fortnight, 'de quindena in quindenam.' Henry III fixed them every three weeks; Ann. Dunst. pp. 139, 140.

³ See Eyton's Shropshire, xii. 168; Viner's Abridgment, s. v. Court. Early notices of transactions in the court of the hundred will be found in Madox, Formulare Anglicanum, p. 40.

⁴ The tuncspesmot occurs in a charter granted by Richard I to Wenlock Priory: the king grants that all the prior's men, tithes, and effects shall be quit of all oppressions and exactions, from shire-moot and hundred-moot, from pleas and complaints, from husting, portmannot (court of portreeve in boroughs), and tuncspesmot. Eyton, Shropshire, iii. 237.

⁵ On the institution of the court-leet, see Scriven on Copyholds; Gneist, Self-government, i. 89, 101, sq. Although the documentary history of these courts belongs to a later age, there can be little risk in tracing their origin back to the sac and soc of the older jurisdictions, and not regarding them as mere creations of Norman feudalism. If they had been so, there must have been some evidence of their creation after the Conquest; but, so far from this being the case, the language in which they are mentioned in documents of the Norman period is distinctly borrowed from the Anglo-it from going to the court-leet of the hundred¹. If the lord had a grant of view of frankpledge also, his tenants were released from attendance at the sheriff's tourn. It was only the great baronial jurisdictions, which were almost shires in themselves, that freed their suitors from all attendance at the popular courts. These greater jurisdictions, liberties, or honours², the growth of which in Anglo-Saxon times we have already traced, were multiplied under the Norman sovereigns³. They presented to the great feudatories the most favourable opportunities for extending the principles of feudal law, and making themselves absolutely supreme among their dependents. It tasked accordingly the energies of the national courts to watch them: they attracted to their own courts the poorer freemen of the neighbourhood, to the diminution of the profits of the hundred and the shire and to the impoverishment of the crown; they served as a basis for the judicial tyranny of the petty castellans, which we have seen break out into anarchy in the wretched times of Stephen; and it was no small triumph when Henry II forced them to admit his itinerant justices to exercise jurisdiction in them⁴, although the proceeds of the assizes con-

Liberties
and honours.

Saxon. The history of the leet-jury, which might throw some considerable light on the early development of the jury principle in England, is still a desideratum. It may be regarded as quite certain that if the manorial jurisdictions had been created in the feudal period, they would have taken the feudal form; their courts would have been courts of baronies, not of single manors, and their process would not have been identical with that of the old popular courts, as for the most part it is. ¹ See above, p. 398.

² The honour may contain several manors and hold one court-day for all, but the several manors retain their separate organisation under it; and it has no independent organisation irrespective of them. 'Although an honour consists of many manors and there is for all the manors only one court held, yet are they quasi several and distinct courts.' Scriven, ii. 737; quoted by Gneist, Verwalt. i. 164.

³ The jurisdiction of the hundreds fell more especially into the hands of the territorial proprietors; so much so, that before the end of the period, perhaps in a majority of cases, these courts had become part of the fief of the lord whose castle or manor-house was the stronghold of the neighbourhood; and, besides these, a great number of hundreds were held by the monasteries; e.g. Robert d'Oilli had a grant of the hundred outside the Northgate of Oxford: any good county history will furnish illustrations. In these cases the bailiff of the hundred was nominated by the lord and presided in the courts, except at the sheriff's tourn. In the case of an honour such as that of Peverell, the sheriff was excluded even from the tourn. Dep. Keeper's Report, xvi. app. 41.

⁴ Assize of Clarendon, Select Charters, p. 238.

tinned no doubt to increase the income of the lords. The legal records of Henry I's reign furnish us with but little information respecting either the smaller jurisdictions of the manor or the greater ones of the honour or liberty. There is however no doubt that the same principles of legal procedure were used in these as in the popular courts; the juratores and iudices were there as well as in the shire and the hundred; compurgation and ordeal; fines for non-attendance; the whole accumulation of ancient custom as well as Norman novelty. They were in fact, as they had been earlier, public jurisdictions vested in private hands¹; descending hereditarily in connexion with the hereditary estate, and only recoverable by the crown either by a forcible resumption of the estate, or by a series of legal enactments such as reduced the dangers of private authority by increasing the pressure of central administration. The latter process was one part of the reforms of Henry II, but the former, owing to the strangely conservative policy of the kings, was very seldom resorted to. When a great barony by forfeiture or escheat fell into the hands of the crown, instead of being incorporated with the general body of the county or counties in which it lay, it retained a distinct corporate existence and the whole apparatus of jurisdiction which it had possessed before. Under the title of an Honour, it either continued in the possession of the king and

Procedure
in the manorial
courts.

Treatment
of escheated honours.

¹ An example of a transaction in the court of Bath under Bishop John of Tours will be found in Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 76. The Bishop sits with his friends and barons. A letter is produced from the regent William, son of Henry I, directing the delivery of an estate to a person who has inherited it. The bishop reads the letter, and asks the opinion of the court. The prior of Bath states the claim of the convent on the land in question. A discussion follows, 'variis ab alterutro contradictionibus:' the bishop adjourns, that those members of the court who are 'neither advocates nor favourers of either side' may have time for consideration. Having deliberated, they return into court, and one of them delivers the sentence:—the claimant must produce his title-deeds or witnesses; if he can do neither, he must be heard no more. He makes no reply; and the sentence is approved by the court; two bishops, three archdeacons with many clerks and chaplains, and five laymen, probably the friends and barons mentioned before; and the document is attested by twelve witnesses. A writ from the king confirms the decision of the court, directing that the prior and convent shall retain the land. This proceeding is certainly more like that of a witenagemot than that of a court of law, but it is recognised by the king 'sicut dirationaverunt [monachi] . . per iudicium curie tue.'

was farmed like a shire¹, or was granted out again as a hereditary fief. Whilst it remained in the king's hands, the fact that he was the lord of the honour did not raise the immediate tenants of the barony to the rank of tenants-in-chief, or entitle the crown to claim from them the rights that it claimed from such tenants². It was therefore separable from the estates of the crown at a moment's notice, and was not used to promote the uniformity or symmetry of the provincial organisation.

Demesne of the crown.

130. Somewhat analogous to the franchises of the nobles was the jurisdiction of the demesne estates of the crown, the profits of which are recorded in the Pipe Rolls, although they were not in all cases farmed by the sheriffs of the counties in which they lay. The royal estate of Windsor was accounted for in the year 1130 by William de Bocland, who was steward also of several other royal manors. In these estates, which, when they had been held by the crown since the reign of Edward the Confessor, bore the title of manors of ancient demesne³, very much of the ancient popular process had been preserved without any change; and to the present day some customs are maintained in them which recall the most primitive institutions. In one great division however of the royal lands, the forests, this is not the case, although the forest administration itself was to a certain extent modelled upon the popular system. The forests, we are told by the author of the Dialogus de Scaccario, were peculiarly subject to the absolute will of the king; they were outside the common law or right of the kingdom; they were not liable to be visited by the ordinary judges of the Curia

The forests.

¹ So the Honour of Wallingford is specially mentioned in the Assize of Clarendon; and those of Wallingford, Nottingham, Boulogne, and Lancaster in Magna Carta. Some of these were set apart as a provision for the king's ministers: e.g. the Honour of Berkhamstead was held by the chancellor in the reign of Henry II. The Honour of Peverell long retained a separate existence, having been forfeited early in the reign of Henry II. Its courts were only abolished by the statute 12 and 13 Victoria.

² Dialogus de Scaccario, ii. 24; Magna Carta, art. 43.

³ 'A manor of ancient demesne was extra-hundredal; it was as it were a hundred in itself, owing no suit nor having any concern in other hundred courts, but like the latter, controlled by the county court and responsible to the king's justiciars in many matters, but chiefly in those which were connected with the criminal law, and came under the class called Pleas of the Crown.' Eyton, Shropshire, iii. 73. 74.

Regis, but by special commission and by special officials; they had laws and customs of their own, and these were drawn up rather to insure the peace of the beasts of chase than that of the king's subjects¹. The cruelty of the forest law is constantly ascribed to Henry I, who shared with William Rufus the character of bloody ferocity from which the Conqueror, Robert, and Stephen were comparatively free. The master forester seems to have been independent even of the great justiciar; the forest courts were separate from the courts of the shire, although in the shires in which there were royal forests the same persons who were bound to attend the shire-moot were forced to do suit at the forest courts². The constant interference and irresponsible position of the officers contributed greatly to the hatred with which the forest administration was viewed; and the extent of land absorbed in this way went on increasing until the reign of Stephen. Henry I refused to surrender the forests which his father and brother had made; Stephen promised to surrender Henry's forests, but either failed to keep his word, or allowed the people to believe that he had failed. The first forest code is of the reign of Henry II, but it records the severities of his grandfather, and its report is borne out by the words of Ordericus and other contemporaries³.

131. A more important feature of administrative history at this period is the growth of the towns⁴. This has been traced

¹ Dialogus de Scaccario, i. 11: 'Sane forestarum ratio, poena quoque vel absolutio delinquentium in eas, sive pecuniaria fuerit sive corporalis, seorsum ab aliis regni judiciis scernitur et solius regis arbitrio vel cuiuslibet familiaris ad hoc specialiter deputati subijcitur. Legibus quidem propriis subsistit, quas non communi regni jure, sed voluntaria principis institutione subnixas dicunt, adeo ut quod per legem ejus factum fuerit, non justum absolute sed justum secundum legem forestae dicatur.'

² Assize of Woodstock, art. 11. Select Charters, p. 150.

³ On the number and position of the forests, see Pearson's Historical Maps, pp. 44-48; Ellis's Intr. i. 103-116. 'The royal domains consisted of 1422 manors, 30 chases, 781 parks, and 67 forests;' Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, i. 190 (from Cowell?), but this computation does not apply to the Domesday Survey, or even to the Norman period with any strictness.

⁴ The fortified towns mentioned in Domesday are Canterbury, Nottingham, York, Oxford, Hereford, Leicester, Stafford, Chester, Lincoln, and Colchester. The customs of forty-one cities or boroughs are either given in detail or briefly noticed. Most of these are the county towns of the present day. In the laws of Athelstan, ii. § 15, 2, Canterbury, Rochester, in a former chapter down to the date of the Conquest. We have seen that they were originally no more than large townships or collections of townships, whose constitution cannot be shown to have differed from the general type of the ancient village, but which had accumulated rights and functions answering more strictly to those of the hundred. And at the time of the Conquest they had gained such importance as to have in many cases special compositions for taxation, and tribunals of their own¹. With the exception however of London, no town yet shows itself to have arrived at anything like the later civic constitution; and London under its port-reeve and bishop, the two officers who seem to give it a unity and identity of its own, is only a bundle of communities, townships, parishes, and lordships, of which each has its own constitution.

State of towns at the Conquest.

Charter of the Conqueror to London.

The charter granted by the Conqueror to the chief city of the kingdom is of a curiously jealous and scanty character: 'William the king greets William the bishop and Gosfrith the port-reeve², and all the burghers within London, French and English, friendly: and I do you to wit that I will that ye twain be worthy of all the law that ye were worthy of in King Edward's day. And I will that every child be his father's heir after his father's day; and I will not endure that any man offer any wrong to you. God

London, Winchester, Lewes, Hastings, Chichester, Southampton, Wareham, Dorchester, Shaftesbury, and Exeter are particularly mentioned as having moneys; very many others are specified in Domesday, and still more are discoverable from coins. See Ellis, Intr. i. 174-177.

¹ See above. pp. 94-96. Oxford paid £20 and six sextaries of honey in the time of King Edward; £65 at the Survey. Stafford paid £9 at the former period; Shrewsbury £7 16s. 8d.; Norwich £20 to the king, £10 to the earl; at Huntingdon two-thirds of the firma burgi were paid to the king, one-third to the earl. Ellis, Intr. i. 190 sq.

² The word port in port-reeve is the Latin 'porta' (not portus), where the markets were held, and, although used for the city generally, seems to refer to it specially in its character of a mart or city of merchants. The port-gerefa at Canterbury had a close connexion with the 'ceapmanne gilde'; and the same was probably the case in London, where there was a enhten-gilde, the estates of which were formed into the ward of Portsoken. From the position assigned to the port-reeve in this writ, which answers to that given to the sheriff in ordinary writs, it may be inferred that he was a royal officer who stood to the merchants of the city in the relation in which the bishop stood to the clergy: and if he were also the head of the guild his office illustrates very well the combination of voluntary organization with administrative machinery which marks the English municipal system from its earliest days.

keep you¹. Here is no grant of corporate privileges; the son may succeed to his father's franchise, but there is no corporate succession; the state of things that had existed in King Edward's day is guaranteed and no more. The charter of Henry I shows a marked advance². The city is recognised as a distinct unity, although that unity depends on hereditary succession only: it is independent of county organisation, the county in which it lies is itself let at ferm to the citizens; it is placed on a level with the shires, it is to have a sheriff of its own and a justiciar: as a greater privilege still, it is to elect its own sheriff and justiciar, and to be open to no other jurisdiction than that of its own elected officers. The citizens are not to be called before any court outside their own walls, and are freed from Danegeld, from scot and lot, from responsibility for the murder-fine and obligation to trial by battle: they are freed from toll and other duties of the kind throughout all England, at the ports as well as in land. They are to possess their lands, the common lands of their townships, and their rights of coursing in Chiltern, Middlesex, and Surrey. Yet with all this no new incorporation is bestowed: the churches, the barons, the citizens, retain their ancient customs; the churches their sokens, the barons their manors, the citizens their township organisation, and possibly their guilds. The municipal unity which they possess is of the same sort as that of the county and hundred. They have their folk-moot, answering to the shire-moot outside; their ward-moot answering to the hundred court; their hustings-court every Monday, which may be regarded as a general meeting of the citizens, although later lawyers regarded this also as a county court. There is no mention of any merchant-guild, the membership of which is a requisite for civic magistracy. No guild is mentioned at all, although we know from the laws of Athelstan that a frith-gild existed in London in his days, and from another charter of Henry himself that there was a 'cnihten-gild,' or confraternity of citizens which had possessed its own lands with sac and soc and other customs in the days of King Edward. Whatever may have been the position of the guilds at this time,

Charter of Henry I to London.

Shire constitution of London
recognised.

Other
privileges.

Their moots.

London
guilds.

¹ Select Charters, p. 79.

² Ibid. pp. 103, 104.

it would seem certain that they were not a part of the constitution of the city, which clearly was organised under a sheriff like any other shire. It is possible that this charter of Henry I conferred a new constitution, and that the elective sheriff was a substitute for the ancient port-gerefa; whilst the English enihthen-gild, with which the port-gerefa and his soken are closely connected, was dissolved, to reappear perhaps at a later period in the form of the merchant-guild and 'communa.' But however this may have been, before the end of the reign the trade-guilds force their way into notice. In A.D. 1130 Robert the son of Lefstan pays for the guild of weavers £16 into the Exchequer. He was probably the alderman of the guild; and his father Lefstan seems to have occupied the same position in the *enihthen-gild*¹. But the guild, so far as it is illustrated by documents, comes into prominence almost as early in the provincial towns as it does in London, and requires more special mention in relation to them².

Rise of the trade-guilds and craft-guilds.

Constitution of London in 1130.

Between the date of Henry's charter and that of the great Pipe Roll some changes in the organisation of the city must have taken place. In A.D. 1130 there were four sheriffs or vice-comites who jointly account for the ferm of London, instead of the one mentioned in the charter; and part of the account is rendered by a chamberlain of the city. The right to appoint the sheriffs has been somehow withdrawn, for the citizens pay a hundred marks of silver that they may have a sheriff of their own choice, whilst the four sheriffs in office pay two marks of gold each in order to be quit of it³. There is no charge for the Danegeld, but instead there is an 'auxilium civitatis' amounting to £120. These facts may not indeed point to any oppressive or repressive policy on the part of the king, but it may be inferred, from the great dislike of the guild system shown by Henry II and his ministers, that it was no part of the royal Jealousy of the independence of the city.

¹ Pipe Roll 31 Hen. I, p. 144: 'Robertus filius Levestani reddit compositum de £16 de gilda Telariorum Londoniarum.' In the charter of Henry I, which confirms to the church of the Holy Trinity the rights of the old enihthen-gild, it is said that they are to be held as they were 'tempore patris mei et fratris mei, et meo, et tempore Leostani.' Foedera, i. 11. In the Pipe Roll, Witso the son of Levestan pays half a mark of gold for his father's office.

² See below, p. 412.

³ Pipe Roll 31 Hen. I, pp. 143, 145, 148, 149.

policy to encourage municipal independence where it could not be made directly serviceable to the humiliation of the nobles¹.

Our next glimpse of the state of London is in the reign of Stephen, when, as we have already seen, the chief men of the city were allowed to join the small body of barons and bishops who elected the king. To Stephen the Londoners were for the most part faithful, although Thomas Becket, the son of one of them, was the adviser and executor of the policy which prevented the succession of Eustace and secured the throne to Henry II². In that council at Winchester by which the empress was elected to be lady of the English, the citizens appeared by messengers acting on behalf of the *communio*³, a description of municipal unity which suggests that the communal idea was already in existence as a basis of civic organisation. That idea was fully developed in the next reign, but in the case cited the word may possibly mean nothing more than the folk-moot which had been recognised in Henry's charter.

During the Norman period, then, London appears to have been a collection of small communities, manors, parishes, church-sokens, and guilds, held and governed in the usual way; the manors descending by inheritance, the church jurisdictions exercised under the bishop, the chapter, and the monasteries; and the guilds administered by their own officers and administering their own property: as holding in chief of the king, the lords of the franchises, the prelates of the churches, and even the aldermen of the guilds, where the guilds possessed estates, might bear the title of barons. It was for the most part an aristocratic constitution, and had its unity, not in the municipal principle, but in the system of the shire.

The growth of the provincial towns is more distinctly traceable. We have in a former chapter seen their origin in the township of Anglo-Saxon times, generally in the dependent ¹ It is possible that the disappearance of the port-reeve, the conversion of the cnichtengild into a religious house, and the later particulars mentioned above, signify a civic revolution, the history of which is lost, but which might account for the earnest support given by the citizens to Stephen, and the struggle for the establishment of the Communa which marks the reign of Richard I.

² Gervase, Chron. c. 1371.

³ W. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. iii. § 46.

London under Stephen.

The 'Communio.'

Composite character of the constitution of London.

Provincial towns.

Boroughs in Domesday. township which acquired wealth and solidity under the protection of a great earl or bishop, or of the king himself. In the time of the Confessor, as represented to us in Domesday, the boroughs had obtained a clearly recognised status. Their customs are recorded as fully as they would have been in later times by charter; their constitution is set before us as by its judicial character approaching that of the hundred rather than that of the mere township, although the jurisdiction is manorial rather than civic: the existence of guilds is likewise recorded; the men of Dover have a guild-hall, and there are guilds possessed of land at Canterbury¹.

Jurisdiction in the towns. The first point to be noticed is, however, that of jurisdiction, which both before and after the Conquest is almost inseparable from that of tenure. In some of the Domesday towns the sac and soc belongs, as in Lincoln, to the owners of manorial estates which are united within the walls². In some it belongs entirely to the king, or to the earl or bishop³; and in some it is divided between the crown, the bishop, the earl,—each of whom may be regarded as a public magistrate,—and one or more private lords.

Subject to the sheriff. In all these cases, unless expressly excluded by grant, the sheriff exercised the same superintendence over the towns as he did over the country: they were exempt from the hundred court, either as being themselves hundreds, or as being held by lords possessing sac and soc, but they were not exempt from the shire administration. The sheriff collected from them the rents which formed a portion of the ferm, and watched the royal rights in their courts of justice. The Norman Conquest produced no change in the towns, save this, that the tenure became a more prominent feature of dependence than the jurisdiction.

Tenure in towns.

¹ 'Willelmus filius Goisfridi iii. [mansuras habet] in quibus erat giballa burgensium.' Domesd. i. 1. In Canterbury, 'Ipsi quoque burgenses habebant de rege xxxiii. acras terrae in gilda sua;' 'habet archiepiscopus xii. burgenses et xxxii. mansuras quas tenent clerici de villa in gildam suam.' Ibid. pp. 2, 3.

² 'In ipsa civitate erant xii. lagemannii, id est habentes sacam et socam.' Lincoln, Domesd. i. 336. Besides these twelve, several other great proprietors had their halls with sac and soc.

³ Sandwich belongs to the Archbishop of Canterbury; Domesd. i. 3; Exeter belongs to the king; ibid. 100; Warwick to the earl; Madox, Firma Burgi, p. 16, where many other cases are given.

They were regarded as held in demesne by the lords who had the jurisdiction, and where no other lord claimed it, they were held in demesne of the king. The difference between the towns thus held is not perhaps very great until the age of charters begins: then, when a town belongs to the king, it has a royal charter; other towns have charters from their lords which sometimes express the consent of the king to the grant of liberties. Of the boroughs which possess early charters, Northampton is in the king's demesne¹, Beverley in that of the archbishop of York². Leicester early in the twelfth century was divided into four parts, held by the king, the bishop of Lincoln, Simon of Senlis who represented the old earls of Mercia, and Ivo of Grantmesnil the sheriff and farmer of the king's share³. Subsequently Count Robert of Meulan got all four shares into his own hands, and left the town as a borough in demesne to the earls of Leicester his descendants. The city of Winchester, like that of London, scarcely appears in Domesday at all⁴; its citizens had already, it would seem, something of the same status as those of London: their support was given to Stephen at his election in the same way, and they shared with the Londoners, and occasionally disputed with them, the privilege of service in the kitchen and the buttery at the coronations⁵. One result of the doctrine of tenure in the case of the towns was to leave the different classes of men in the same condition in which they were in the country: the burghage tenure answers to the socage of the rural manors, and the lowest class of townsmen, until admitted into the guild, is on an exact level with the rustici or nativi, the class into which the Normans ultimately threw no small portion of the ceorls and villeins of the Anglo-Saxon days.

Towns in royal demesne.

Leicester under several lords.

Position of Winchester.

The population of towns answers to that of the country.

The first step towards a separate administration and distinct organisation is, as usual, one connected with fiscal arrangements.

¹ Madox, Firma Burgi, p. 7.

² Foedera, i. 40.

³ Ord. Vit. xi. 2. The Leicester charters, a most interesting series, are translated by Thompson in his book on English Municipal History.

⁴ '[The customs, services, and charges of] London, Winchester, Abingdon, and a few others, were omitted probably on account of charters of immunity previously granted;' Ellis, Intr. i. 190.

⁵ Hoveden, iii. 12, 248.

Fiscal changes in
the towns.

It was quite natural that the city communities, growing in wealth and strong in social unity, should wish to be divided from the country districts. The sheriff was answerable to the crown for a certain sum, and whatever he could make above that sum was his own profit : nothing was easier than to exact the whole of the legal sum from the rich burghers, and take for himself the profits of the shire ; or to demand such sums as he pleased of either, without rendering any account. The burghers made it a point then to have such a valuation of their town as would show what was really due, apart from the profits of the shire ; and this done, they would pay to the sheriff no more, except as a free gift or in return for special services. The Domesday Survey accordingly gives the profits of the towns at distinct round sums, which had probably been long before agreed on. The next point gained was to take the collection of this sum out of the hands of the sheriff ; which was done by obtaining from the crown a charter letting the town to the burghers at a fee farm rent equal to the sum thus deducted from the ferm of the shire. This was called the firma burgi, a rent paid to the crown from the borough, for which the burghers were responsible, and which they collected amongst themselves by strict apportionment¹.

The *Firma
Burgi*.

Who bought the *Firma
Burgi*?

It must have been however a primary question, to whom could such a charter be granted, and what organisation existed among the burghers that was capable of entering into such an engagement. Various answers have been given to the question : sometimes the guild, sometimes the lect jury, sometimes the germ of a corporation, the existence of which is somewhat hastily presumed, has been assumed as the recipient of the grant. But it seems most natural to refer it to the only organisation of the existence of which we have certain evidence, the fully qualified members of the township or hundred court of the town, as already constituted. These were the owners of land, the owners of houses, shops, or gardens ; the burgage-tenants, from whose burgages the rent was originally due, and from which it must, if raised legally, be paid : these men met in the church-yard or town-hall as the men of the township ; in a trading town they would be the members of the guild ; and, in the judicial work of the town, they were the class who furnished the judices and juratores, the leet jury in fact, when that jury first comes to light¹. Under the reeve, the praepositus as the Norman lawyers called him, there was already a communitas civitatis, although of a very primitive form.

¹ See Madox, Firma Burgi, p. 18 ; Hist. Exch. pp. 226 sq. ; Brady on Boroughs, pp. 40 sq. ; Gucist, Self-government, i. 104-110, 847-850, Verwalt. i. 134 sq. The arrangement might be either at fee farm or for a term of years. The firma burgi (totidem verbis) first appears in Domesday in the case of Huntingdon. The fermes of Northampton, Wallingford, and Colchester are specified in the Pipe Roll of 31 Henry I.

The tenants in burgage were the original communitas civitatis.

The body thus recognised speedily discovered its own strength, and obtained further grants of perpetual privileges, or purchased the occasional enjoyment of them : the city of London serving as the standard to which all attempted to rise. In A.D. 1130 the citizens of Lincoln paid 200 marks of silver and four marks of gold that they might hold their city of the king in chief² : a charter would probably be the result of this payment, or at all events the bestowal of privileges enumerated in the charter of Henry II. That king specifies, as one of the existing rights of the burghers of Lincoln, that they had a merchant-guild composed of the men of the city and the merchants of the county³. The charter of Archbishop Thurstan to Beverley places the 'hans-hus' or guild-hall among the foremost of the privileges conferred on his men. 'I will that my men of Beverley shall have their hans-hus⁴, that they may there

Additional privileges purchased.

Cases of Lincoln and Beverley.

¹ See Gneist, as above referred to. He distinctly regards the communa, the origin of the corporation, as the result of a combination of the firma burgi with the leet jurisdiction. This I entirely agree with, but the adjustment of the relation of these two elements with the guild presents some difficulties as to its universal applicability.

² Pipe Roll 31 Hen. I, p. 114.

³ 'Gildara suam mercatoriam de hominibus civitatis et de aliis mercatoribus comitatus, sicut illam habuerunt tempore Edwardi, Willelmi et Henrici regum Angliae.' Foed. i. 40 ; Select Charters, p. 159.

⁴ The 'hans,' afterwards such a name of power, appears first in England, later in Germany. G. L. von Maurer, Städteverfassg. ii. 254 ; Sartorius, Urk. Gesch. d. Deutsch. Hanse, i. 73. It seems to be identical with guild, and it is also used in the sense of a tax. Sartorius, i. 75, 76. We have here a hans hus at York and another at Beverley. The men of York had in the time of John their guild at home and several hansas both in England and in Normandy. The men of Dunwich have their hansa et gilda mercatoria confirmed by the same king. Select Charters, pp. 303, 304. In the second year of Henry III the citizens of Hereford paid for a charter, and to have for ever a merchant-guild, with a hansa and other liberties.

Early charters of towns.

Rise of the guilds.

Ancient
origin of guilds.

treat of their bye-laws, to the honour of God and S. John, and the canons, and to the improvement of the whole township, freed according to the same law as that which those of York have in their hans-hus.' In other towns the guilds were already making their way: the Pipe Roll records payments by the weavers of Oxford of two marks of gold that they might have their guild; the shoemakers pay five that they may recover theirs; the weavers of Huntingdon pay forty shillings; those of Lincoln a mark of gold¹. But the most significant indication of growth is found in the curious payment of Thomas of York, the son of Ulviet, who gives the king a coursing dog that he may be alderman of the merchant-guild of York: the value of a coursing dog was twenty shillings², so that either the position was an unimportant one, or Thomas's hold upon it so strong as to make the king's consent a matter of small value. There is as yet no indication that the guild aspires to modify the constitution of the city.

The origin of guilds, as has been already remarked, runs back to remote antiquity. The simple idea of a confraternity united for the discharge of common or mutual good offices, supported by contributions of money from each member and celebrating its meetings by a periodical festival, may find parallels in any civilised nation at any age of the world. The ancient guild is simply the club of modern manners³. In Eng-

Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 284. There was a hansa also at Montgomery (Eyton, Shropshire, xi. 134); at Liverpool, Wigan, and Preston (Harland's Mamecestre, i. 182, 198, 204).

¹ Pipe Roll 31 Hen. I, pp. 2, 5, 48, 109.

² Ibid. pp. 34, 35. Ulviet, the father of Thomas, was, as we learn from the inquest into the customs of the church of York (above, p. 395), a lageman or magistrate of the city. Perhaps we may infer from this a gradual change from the lageman to the guild system produced by continuing the substantial power, under different names, but in the hands of the same families. Compare the relations of Leofstan and his son Robert with the cnihthen-gild and weavers' gild of London, above, p. 406.

³ On the subject of guilds see an essay by Brentano, prefixed to Toulmin Smith's English Guilds, which condenses the results of the investigations of Wilda and others. The rules laid down by Hincmar for the geldoniae or confratrinae of his time show that they were identical with the religious guilds of the Anglo-Saxons. Gneist, Self-government, i. 110, Verwalt. i. 139, thinks that too much importance has been attached to the guilds by modern writers, and that their constitutional importance was much less in England than on the Continent.

land it appears early, if not first of all, in a religious form, and that form it retained throughout the middle ages, although it does not engross the name. Three of these religious guilds are known to us by their statutes, which date from the early years of the eleventh century¹. At Abbotsbury in Dorset Orey grants a guild-hall as property to the guild, in honour of God and S. Peter, and lays down rules for the members. The contributions are to be in wax, bread, wheat, and wood: the wax is for the maintenance of lights in the minster. Fines are ordered for the neglect of duty, for offensive words, and for bringing more than the due number of guests to the guild-feast. The only specified duty is that of contributing to the comfort of the dying, and attending the burial and praying for the souls of deceased members: a steward and 'feormeras,' or caterers for the feast, are the only officers mentioned, but there are two classes of guild brothers, one distinguished by full membership. The rules of the Exeter guild direct three annual feasts, with masses and psalm-singing for quick and dead; the contributions are in malt and honey; the fines are for neglect of the feast or the contribution, and for offensive words. On the death of a brother an additional subscription of fivepence is called for; at a house-burning one penny; and there is a provision for funeral services. The second order of membership appears under the name of 'cniht.' In these two cases the duties of the members are purely religious, and nowhere concern questions of law or police. The statutes of the thegns' guild at Cambridge² contain similar Guilds of Anglo-Saxon times.

The Abbotsbury guild.

The Exeter guild.

¹ The statutes of these guilds are given in English by Kemble, Saxons, i. 511-514. Those of Abbotsbury are in the Cod. Dipl. dececxlii; and the other two in Hicke's Dissert. Epist. pp. 20-22. The objects of the guilds are thus stated by Hincmar: 'In omni obsequio religionis junguntur, videlicet in oblatione, in luminaribus, in oblationibus mutuis, in exsequiis defunctorum, in eleemosynis et ceteris pietatis officiis;' especially the offering of candles and maintenance of lights. Brentano, p. lxxxii.

² Kemble, Saxons, i. 513. The thegns' guild naturally calls to mind the lagenanni of Cambridge, mentioned in Domesday, and referred to above, p. 94. The heriot of the Cambridge lagenanni was eight pounds, a palfrey, and the arms of a knight. They were certainly thegns, and this guild may be a rudimentary form of a corporation; for it is observable that the guild brethren make some rules which, without the aid of the magistrates, they would find it very difficult to enforce.

The Cambridge guild.

provisions : there are directions for the burial of members, fines for misgreeting and violence, and regulations for mutual help in difficulties. But there is much more : if a brother be robbed, the guild undertakes to exact eight pounds from the thief ; if a brother slay a man righteously, the guild helps to pay the wergild ; if unrighteously, he bears his own penalty ; if one slay another, he must redeem his place as a guild-brother by a fine of eight pounds ; and if any eat and drink with one who has slain a guild-brother, he pays a pound or clears himself by compurgation. It can scarcely be doubted that this form of guild had legal recognition : the law of Ethelred prescribes a fine for breach of ' peace given in an alehouse,' which apparently refers to something of this kind¹.

The ' frith-gild.'

The Cambridge statutes thus connect the religious guild with the ' frith-gild,' a form of association of which, although it is of a more advanced and complex character, there are even earlier documentary traces. The provision of the laws of Ini and Alfred, that the ' gegildan,' or guild-brethren, of the kinless man should share in the receipt and responsibility of the wergild, may possibly be referred to an institution of the sort existing among the foreign settlers in the seaport towns of Wessex² : it is possible that it may denote a wide extension of the guild system amongst the English, but no further light can now be thrown upon it. Under Athelstan however we have the complete code of a ' frith-gild of the city of London, in which may be recognised a distinct attempt on the part of the public authorities to supplement the defective execution of the law by measures for mutual defence³. It is drawn up by the bishops and reeves belonging to London, and confirmed by the pledges of the ' frith-gegildas ;' and, if it be indeed the act of a voluntary association, forms a curious precedent for the action of the Germanic leagues and the Castilian hermandad of later ages. By this statute a monthly meeting is directed, at which there is to be ' byttfylling⁴' and a refection, the remains of which

The *Judicia
civitatis Lundoniae.*

¹ Ethelred, iii. 1.

² Ini, 16. 21 ; Alfred, 27, 28 ; Schmid, Gesetze, 587-589 ; see above, p. 89.

³ Athelstan, vi. § 1-12 : 'Judicia civitatis Lundoniae.'

⁴ The byttfylling is in the Latin version buccellorum impletio, the filling are to be bestowed in alms: on the death of a member each brother gives a loaf and sings, or pays for the singing of, fifty psalms. Thus far the common form of the religious guild is preserved. The other articles refer to the enforcement of mutual defence: each member pays fourpence for common purposes, towards a sort of insurance fund from which the guild makes good the losses of members; and a contribution of a shilling towards the pursuit of the thief. The members are arranged in bodies of ten, one of whom is the head-man; these again are classed in tens under a common leader, who with the other head-men acts as treasurer and adviser of the hundred members. The special objects, for which minute directions are given, are the pursuit and conviction of thieves and the exacting of compensation, the carrying out of the law which Athelstan and the witan had passed at Greatley and Thundersfield. It is improbable that any institution on so large a scale existed in any other town than London, although the Cambridge statute² may have been drawn up on the same model; and it would be rash to connect the 'Cnihtengild' of Henry's reign with this guild in particular, although the existence of the one, taken in connexion with the 'cnihts' of the Exeter guild, irresistibly suggests the mention of the other.

social and police system of the London 'frith-gild.'

Its arrangement in tens.

A charter of the reign of Edgar mentions three 'geferscipas' or fraternities existing at Canterbury¹; one of these may be the priests' guild which is recorded in Domesday as possessing land, another the 'ceapmanne gild,' the third a cnihtengild².

Guilds at Canterbury.

of butts or vats: whether the ale brewed at one meeting was drunk at the same, or at the next, or sold for the benefit of the guild, it is hard to say. No contribution of malt is mentioned in these statutes, as was the case with those of Exeter. The Chronicle of Battle mentions four guilds, adding that the abbot pays to each the regular contribution of a member 'ad cervisiam faciendam,' and has a poor man to represent him and drink his share at each meeting; pp. 20, 21. Giraldus Cambrensis (Ang. Sac. ii. 397) describes the guildhall of London as 'Aula publica quae a potorum conventu nomen accepit.' See above, p. 29, note.

¹ Somner, Canterbury, part i. p. 178, describes a charter of Edgar dated A.D. 956, and attested by Hlothwig the port-reeve, and the congregation at Christ Church, and the congregation at S. Augustine's, and the three 'geferscipas innan burhwara utan burhwara miccle gemittan.'

² Somner, p. 179; below, p. 416. An imperfect Canterbury charter of the reign of Ethelbert (860-866) is attested by 'ego Æthelstan and ingan burgware, ego Æthelhelm and cnihta gealdan.' Kemble, C. D. ii. p. 83.

The merchant-guild :

owning property :

and making
by-laws :

a supplementary organisation :

including all traders.

The third form of guild, the merchant-guild, 'ceapmanne gilde,' or hansa, must be at least as old as the Conquest. The charters of the twelfth century refer to the gilda mercatoria as existing in king Edward's time¹. The guild-hall of the men of Dover is not likely to have been merely the meeting-place of a private religious club². The guilds of Canterbury possessed messuages and lands at the time of the Domesday Survey; and the 'ceapmanne-gild' in the days of Anselm exchanged eight houses with the monks of Christ Church, each party conveying the right of sac and soc as they themselves had held it³. In the hans-hus of Beverley and York the burghers met to make their statutes, the by-laws by which they regulated the trade and other municipal business of the town which did not fall under the view of the more ancient courts. A merchant-guild which possessed land, exercised jurisdiction, and enacted by-laws, must have already assumed the character of an official organisation, supplementary perhaps in the first place to the township administration, but gradually coalescing with it. Possibly the merchant-guild may have sometimes purchased the firma burgi. For in the great mercantile towns all the land and houses would be held by merchants and their dependents: from the merchant who had made three voyages over the sea at his own cost and so thriven to thegn-right, to the mere retailer, every one who was in the position of a freeholder was connected with trade, every one who would have a claim on public office or magistracy would be a member of the guild⁴. Further still, the merchant-guild supplied a machinery of enfranchisement; the villein, the nativus of the Norman

If this is genuine it is the earliest extant instance of such a guild in England.

¹ Charter of Lincoln, Foedera, i. 40.

² Domesday, i. 1.

³ It is an agreement 'betwux than hirede æt Christescircean and than cnihtan on Cantwareberig of ceapmanne gilde;' and it is attested by Calveal the 'portegerefa and tha yldista men of tham heape.' Somner, p. 179.

⁴ The charters of Henry II and Richard I to Winchester are granted to the citizens of the merchant-guild; Select Charters, pp. 158, 257. Whether this means that all the citizens of the town were in the guild, or that there were others dependent on the bishop who were not in the guild, can only be decided by local records. The privileges granted are much the same as those generally bestowed on burgenses.

times, who could obtain admission into the guild and was un-claimed by his lord for a year and a day became a freeman¹. His membership was allowed to give him that status which otherwise the law refused to landless men.

Enfranchising power of the merchant-guild.

The merchant-guild contained all the traders, whether or no they possessed an estate of land. The charters of Oxford and other towns direct that no one shall exercise any merchandise in the town who does not belong to the merchant-guild or cannot plead ancient custom². Such a fraternity would of course aim at engrossing among its own members the local authority: they would furnish the great majority, if not the whole of the members of the court-leet; they would be the electors of the reeve, the recipients of the charters. There were craft-guilds besides, those of the weavers and shoemakers for instance, which might in small manufacturing towns aim at the same position, but which would as a rule content themselves with making regulations for their own crafts and with possessing property to pay the expenses of their own festivals. The fines paid by these bodies show that the king or the sheriff viewed them with jealousy; the confirmation of their position by charter proves that they were originally voluntary associations and not the creation of the State. The right of the merchant-guild to exclude from the privileges of trading all who were not members of its own body seems to imply necessarily either that these craft-guilds originally stood in a filial relation to it, or that the membership of the narrower involved also the membership of the wider society. The struggles between the patrician burghers of the merchant-guild and the plebeians of the craft-guilds, which mark the municipal history of Germany, have no exact parallel in

Its monopoly of local trade.

Craft-guilds.

Relation of the merchant-guild to the craft-guilds.

¹ Customs of Newcastle, Select Charters, p. 107; charter of Lincoln, ibid. 159; charter of Nottingham, ibid. 159; Glanvill, De Legibus, v. 5, ibid. 155.

² So also that of Montgomery; Eyton's Shropshire, xi. 134; and that of Chester; Harland's Manecestre, i. 189. It is probable that this arrangement was of the essence of the guild, and that the power of enforcing the regulation was the great privilege secured by the confirmation of the guilds by charter. The same exclusive right is exercised, occasionally at least, by the craft-guilds: in 1157 the shoemakers of Magdeburg ordained that no shoes should be sold in the city except by members of their guild or by their licence; G. L. von Maurer, Städteverfassg. ii. 397. Compare the case of the weavers of York, Rot. Cl. i. 421.

The merchant-guild and the craft-guilds.

Constitutional position of the merchant-guild.

Relation of the guild to the communa.

Illegal guilds.

Illegal communa.

England although there are traces of disputes between the mayor and citizens of London and the guild of weavers in the fourteenth century which show that the relations of the two bodies were not satisfactorily determined¹. That these relations were created by a separate measure, such as that by which the several guilds at Berwick² coalesced in a single merchant-guild, is scarcely probable. For the present period however the existence of the merchant-guild and its prominence in the charters are nearly all the data that we possess. In the reign of Henry II there can be little doubt that the possession of a merchant-guild had become the sign and token of municipal independence: that it was in fact, if not in theory, the governing body of the town in which it was allowed to exist. It is recognised by Glanvill as identical with the communa of the privileged towns³, the municipal corporation of the later age.

Yet the merchant-guild and the governing body of the town are not identical in idea; the chief of the guild is the alderman, the chief of the magistracy is the praepositus or reeve. The merchant-guild of York may be recognised, but the communa of London is watched and discouraged; the formation of new guilds without authorisation is punishable; they are adulterine like the adulterine castles of the barons; their object is suspected to be not the maintenance of their craft, or of peace or religion, but the defeating of the king's rights. In the twenty-sixth year of Henry II, eighteen adulterine guilds in London are fined in various sums; amongst these are the goldsmiths, the butchers, and the pilgrims; each is mentioned as having its own alderman⁴. The offence of Ailwin of Gloucester⁵ and of Thomas 'from beyond the Ouse'⁶ at York was probably of the same sort, they had set up a 'communa' without authority. There must have been in London, and in a less number in York and

¹ Madox, Firma Burgi, pp. 192 sq.

² Houard, Traités, ii. 467; Smith, English Gilds, pp. 338 sq.; Acts of Parliament of Scotland, i. 89.

³ Glanvill, De Legibus, v. 5.

⁴ 'Admerciamta de gildis adulterinis;' Hist. Exch. pp. 390, 391.

⁵ 'Ailwinus Merciarus reddit computum de £100 pro Communa.' Rot. Pip. 16 Henry II; Hist. Exch. p. 391.

⁶ 'Thomas de Ultrausa reddit computum de xx. marcis pro Communa quam volebant facere.' Rot. Pip. 22 Henry II; Firma Burgi, p. 35.

Winchester also, some other influential men who were not connected with trade, and whom the aggressive policy of the guilds would necessarily exclude from municipal power: these continued probably to hold their own courts as lords of manors or to claim exemption from the jurisdiction of magistrates from whose election they were excluded; but they can never have been strong enough to oppose the popular current: the great men of Lincoln who possessed sac and soe must either have been absorbed in the merchant-guild or have been bought up by it before Henry II recognised it by charter; possibly before Henry I sold to the burghers the status of tenants-in-chief. But doubtless every trading town had its own special history, and made its own special sacrifices for unity and freedom. In London the struggle lasted the longest and took the most various forms. The communa there did not obtain legal recognition until 1191; it was not until the reign of Edward II that all the citizens were obliged to be enrolled among the trade-guilds, and in the reign of Edward III the election of the city magistrates was transferred from the representatives of the ward-moots to the trading companies¹.

Relation of the guild to the land-owning community.

The growth of the corporation of London.

The history of this feature of our local institutions will always be read with different feelings; whilst municipal independence has in many cases helped the cause of liberty, it has in others encroached largely on wider rights; and so far as it is based on the guild, it must be regarded as the result of a series of infringements on the ancient rights of free inhabitants, as one out of many cases in which an organisation originally created for the protection of the weak has been allowed to monopolise their rights and to usurp the functions of government². The dislike with which the communa was viewed outside the towns is marked by Richard of Devizes, a free-speaking author, who furnishes some important data for the civic history of the reign of Richard I. The communa is 'tumor plebis, timor regis, tepor sacerdotii.'

Political importance of these bodies.

¹ See Dr. Brentano's Essay in Smith's English Guilds, p. cxi.

² That this was the case with the French communes occasionally may be seen by the charter of Philip II, withdrawing the privileges of Étampes in consequence of the oppression of the churches and knights by the commune; Ordonnances des Rois, xi. 277.

Growth
of the communes
in France.

The process then by which the guilds gained their municipal position is obscure; and it was not completed within the Norman period. Its history can scarcely be interpreted without reference to the development of town organisation which was going on abroad. In France the communal constitution was during this period encouraged, although not very heartily, by Lewis VI, who saw in it one means of fettering the action of the barons and bishops and securing to himself the support of a strong portion of his people¹. In some cases the commune of France is, like the guild, a voluntary association, but its objects are from the first more distinctly political. In some parts of the kingdom the towns had risen against their lords in the latter half of the eleventh century, and had retained the fruits of their hard-won victories². In others, they possessed, in the remaining fragments of the Karolingian constitution, some organisation that formed a basis for new liberties. The great number of charters granted in the twelfth century³ shows that the policy of encouraging the third estate was in full sway in the royal councils, and the king by ready recognition of the popular rights gained the affections of the people to an extent which has few parallels in French history. The French charters

Charters of
communes.

¹ Thierry divides the municipalities of France into five zones or regions: (1) the North, the home of the sworn commune, comprising Picardy, Artois, Flanders, the Isle of France, Champagne, and Normandy; (2) the South, the home of the consular forms, dating (by a bare possibility) from Roman times; (3) Central France, where the administration was generally in the hands of a prévôt, and the constitution, something like that of the English unchartered towns, based on the ancient usage in the rural districts; (4) the West, comprising Brittany and the Poitevin provinces; in the former the parish church was the centre of administration, and the system was generally parochial, half ecclesiastical and half civil; in the latter sworn communes were founded on the model of Normandy; (5) the Eastern, which had been part of the medieval German empire and shared the general history of the German municipalities. Tableau de l'Ancienne France Municipale; Hist. du Tiers État, ii. 42 sq.

² The commune of Le Mans appears as early as 1072, 'facta igitur conspiratione quam communionem vocabant'; Gesta Pont. Cenomanni, Mabillon, Analecta, p. 308; that of Cambrai dates from 1076, and that of Beauvais from 1099. Thierry, Tiers État, ii. 62.

³ Many of these may be found in the Ordon. des Rois; in Baluze's Miscellanea, vols. iii. iv., and in the Recueil des Monuments Inédits de l'Hist. du Tiers État, ed. by Aug. Thierry. See also Kemble, Saxons, ii. pp. 521-544; and the Historical Illustrations appended to Guizot's Lectures on Civilisation in France.

are in both style and substance very different from the English. The liberties which are bestowed are for the most part the same¹, exemption from arbitrary taxation², the right to local jurisdiction³, the privilege of enfranchising the villein who has been for a year and a day received within the walls⁴, and the power of electing the officers⁵. But whilst all the English charters contain a confirmation of free and good customs, the French are filled with an enumeration of bad ones⁶. The English recur in thought to a time when, in tradition at least, they possessed all that is granted, and even more; the French regard only the present oppressions from which they are to be delivered. The English have an ancient local constitution the members of which are the recipients of the new grant, and guilds of at least sufficient antiquity to render their confirmation typical of the freedom now guaranteed; the French communia is a new body

The character of their liberties.

Contrasted with those of England.

¹ Many of the provisions of the communal charters recall the early guild customs; e.g. the direction that the members shall not abuse one another (Stabilimentum Rothomagense, Duchesne, p. 1066); the entrance into the body is effected by a payment to the common fund (charter of Noyon, A.D. 1191; Baluze, iii. 79).

² See the charter of Tours, A.D. 1181; Baluze, iii. 80; Chaumont, A.D. 1182; Ordonnances, xi. 225. In the latter case the words are, 'ut omnes qui in eadem permanebunt Communitate, ab omni talliata, injusta captione, creditione et universa irrationabili exactione, eujuscunque sint homines, liberi et immunes jure perpetuo permaneant.'

³ Only however where the king's own right of demesne was clear; the commune of Beauvais was under the justice of the bishop; Ordonnances, xi. 198. The privilege of not being called to plead outside the town is common; e.g. charter of Corbie, Ordonn. xi. 216.

⁴ 'Si quis moram fecerit per annum et diem in Communia Senonensi in pace et sine juris vetatione, et aliquis postea eum requisierit quod sit homo suus, non illi de eo respondebunt jurati;' Charter of Sens, A.D. 1189; Ordonn. xi. 263. The privilege was not peculiar to communes: 'Quicumque vero in villam venientes, per annum et diem ibi in pace manserint, nec per regem, nec per praepositum, nec per monachum justitiam veterint, ab omni jugo servitutis deinceps liberi erunt;' Charter of the vill of Seaus, A.D. 1153; Ordonnances, xi. 199. Cf. the charter of Voisines, A.D. 1187; ibid. iv. 456. It was probably an understood right, which required limitation: the free rustic who wished to join the commune of S. Riquier had to resign his land to his lord; Ordonn. xi. 184. Cf. charters of Roye, ibid. 233; and Bray, ibid. 296. The parish of Lorris has the enfranchising clause; ibid. p. 202.

⁵ Charter of Tours; Baluze, iii. 80; Beauvais; ibid. 81; Chateaufneuf, A.D. 1181; Ordonn. xi. 221.

⁶ See the charter of Bourges, A.D. 1145; Ordonnances, i. 9; that of Orleans, A.D. 1168; ibid. i. 15; that of Amiens; ibid. xi. 264; Baluze, iii. 84; Beauvais, A.D. 1115; Ordonnances, xi. 177; Laon, A.D. 1128; ibid. 187.

The French commune

which, by the action of a sworn confederacy, has wrung from its oppressors a deliverance from hereditary bondage¹. The French charters abound in saving clauses protecting the rights of the feudal lords which the grant infringed, or setting aside those rights in accordance with the principle of alliance between king and commune against their common foes. In the English charters there are no signs of such antagonism as marks the one case, or of such cautious liberality as distinguishes the other. The commune lacks too the ancient element of festive, religious, or mercantile association which is so conspicuous in the history of the guild. The idea of the latter is English, that of the former is French or Gallic. Yet notwithstanding these differences, the substantial identity of the privileges secured by these charters seems to prove the existence of much international sympathy. The ancient liberties of the English were not unintelligible to the townsmen of Normandy; the rising freedom of the German cities roused a like ambition in the towns of Flanders²; and the struggles of the Italian municipalities awoke the energies of the cities of Provence. All took different ways to win the same liberties.

contrasted
with the English
guild.

Town life of Germany.

The town life of Germany presents in its mercantile development a closer parallel with that of England, but there is not between the two systems the direct historical connexion which, through the long union of the Norman, Angevin, and Poictevin inheritances with the English crown, subsists between the institutions of France and England. The German hansa may have been derived from England; the communa of London was certainly derived from France. Hence for points of common history we must look further back, to the township and the mark: the later growth of German city life, the colonial character of the great Saxon towns with their artificial patriciate and strict caste system, the independent mercantile communities of the Rhine and Franconia, the imperial history of Worms, Cologne, and Frankfort, the mercantile principalities of Augsburg and Nuremberg, have, if some slight coincidences in London history be excepted, no parallels in England. The cities of Spain again, whilst they unite in one form or other most of the elements existing separately elsewhere,—the colonial character of the Saxon, the communal spirit of the French, the mercantile association of the English town system,—are in the details of their historical growth far removed from the conditions of English society; and they are, it must be added, too little illustrated by accessible documentary history to furnish either a parallel or a contrast. The Italian towns have a distinct development of their own, rather owing, it is true, to their external relations than to any peculiar element inherent in their institutions, but sufficiently marked to make us set them aside in a view so general as that to which we must limit ourselves. Great in mercantile enterprise, great in political ambition, centres of life and progress, they were no integral part of the system in which they were embedded: they were, whether bound to, or in league against imperial power, practically independent of any higher authority than their own; and by their jealousies, enmities, and ambitions, they constituted themselves political unities, too weak to stand alone, too proud to throw themselves into the general interest of the peoples among which they were placed, destined by their very temper and circumstances to a short and brilliant career, but allowed to claim a very slight share in the benefits, for the winning of which their own history had been both a guiding and a warning light.

¹ 'Universi homines infra murum civitatis et in suburbio commorantes, in cujuseunque terra maneat, communiam jurabunt.' Charter of Beauvais, A.D. 1182; Baluze, Misc. iii. 80: charter of Compiègne, A.D. 1153; ibid. p. 83: of Soissons, A.D. 1181; ibid. p. 79.

² See the Flemish charters in Kemble, Saxons, ii. 528 sq. In that of S. Omer the guild has an important place.

Varieties of civic constitutions there.

Italian towns.

The communa of London, and of those other English towns which in the twelfth century aimed at such a constitution, was the old English guild in a new French garb: it was the ancient association, but directed to the attainment of municipal rather than mercantile privileges: like the French communia, it was united and sustained by the oaths of its members and of those whom it could compel to support it. The major and the jurati, the mayor and jurats, were the framework of the communa, as the alderman and brethren constituted the guild, Relics of older systems survive in the modern corporations.

The mayor,
aldermen, and councillors.

and the reeve and good-men the magistracy of the township. And the system which resulted from the combination of these elements, the history of which lies outside our present period and scope, testifies to their existence in a continued life of their own. London, and the municipal system generally, has in the mayor a relic of the communal idea, in the alderman the representative of the guild, and in the councillors of the wards the successors to the rights of the most ancient township system. The jurati of the commune, the brethren of the guild, the reeve of the ward, have either disappeared altogether, or taken forms in which they can scarcely be identified.

Chartered towns not numerous in the Norman
period.

Although the importance of this rising element of English life is sufficiently great to justify the place that we have here given it, it is not to be supposed that during the period before us it was very widely diffused. The English municipalities were neither numerous, nor, with the exception of London, in possession of much political power: their liberties took the form of immunities and exemptions, rather than of substantial influences: they were freed from the exactions of the sheriffs, but not empowered to take a representative share in the administration of the county; they were enabled to try their own prisoners, to oust strange jurisdictions, to raise their taxes in their own way, but not to exercise jurisdiction outside their walls, or to raise their voice in granting or refusing a contribution to the wants of the State. Even their charters were received with misgiving, they were purchased with solid gold, and had as a matter of fact to be redeemed in the form of confirmation from each successive king. Still the history of the twelfth century is one of distinct and uniform progress.

Their growth continuous.

Points of development.

The close of the Norman period saw the English towns thus far advanced, and aiming at further growth. They had secured the firma burgi, and freed themselves from the pecuniary exactions of the sheriffs; they had obtained a recognition by charter of their free customs, that is of the special rules of local administration which they had immemorially observed, especially the exemption from the Norman innovation of trial by battle; their constitution was still that of the township and the hundred, but the relief from the financial administration of the sheriff had suggested the possibility of liberation from his judicial administration also. The guilds were operating so as to produce a stronger cohesion among the townsmen; they gathered frequently in their drinking-halls, and drew up their own regulations for the management of trade; their leading men possessed the ancient burgages on which the king's dues were payable, and this was enough to entitle them to such social power as was left in local hands; they possessed, if not the sole right to trade, something very like a monopoly of all mercantile dealings, and a claim to immunity from tolls throughout the shire or the realm, and in some cases even in the foreign dominions of the king. Accordingly the membership of the guild is indispensable to the full and perfect status of the burgher. Some, if not all, the towns so privileged, could confer freedom on the villein by allowing him to stay for a year and a day within their walls, or enrolling him in their guild: the most offensive of the services demanded from tenants of demesne land were remitted to them. They could still be tallaged, taxed at the will of the king, but so could the rest of the nation. Except through the agency of their own magistrates they could not be forced by a stranger to appear in the courts of law. Diversities of custom there doubtless were, but in all this there was a strong tendency towards liberty. How well the towns repaid the confidence shown by the kings in the gift of these privileges appears in the history of Henry II and his sons.

Advantages really secured by
the towns.

The example set by the sovereign in the cities and boroughs that were under his direct control was followed by the lords who held boroughs in demesne. The earl of Leicester chartered his town¹, and the earl of Chester the boroughs of the palatine

Towns in the hands of mesne lords.

¹ Thompson, Municipal Antiquities, pp. 29, 39, 41, 44, &c. The history of Leicester supplies a story illustrative of the process by which new liberties were obtained. In order to avoid the necessity of trial by battle, the men of Leicester, in or about the reign of Henry I, petitioned the earl that they might have a body of twenty-four men chosen out of their own number to decide all pleas; and they promised to pay 3*d.* yearly for each house in the High-street that had a gable: these twenty-four were the jurors of the portman-mote; a court which appears in some other corporations in the north, and answers to the court-leet, or lagh-moot. The story earldom : Durham received its privileges from the bishop, and the great prelates whose rights excluded the interference of sheriff and shire-moot were able to bestow on their towns privileges scarcely less extensive than those given by the crown.

Unchartered towns.

But there were other town communities outside all these classes, depending on mesne lords who were without the power of granting immunities, or depending on the crown but not rich enough to purchase charters. These subsisted under the ancient township or manorial system, and down to a comparatively late period were distinguished only by external features from the rural communities. From this class sprang the largest part of the market towns of the present day : the privilege of having a market was not grudged by the rulers whose revenues it helped to swell ; and once established, the market involved a humble machinery of police and magistracy, which gave to the place, otherwise undistinguished from the villages around it, some semblance of municipal constitution.

Market towns.

The villein class.

132. The history of that extensive portion of the population which lay outside the classes thus accounted for, is, during the Norman period, extremely obscure. The man who had no political rights, and very little power of asserting his social rights, who held his cottage and garden at the will of a master who could oppress him if he could not remove him, and could claim without rewarding his services,—who had no rights against his master, and who could only assert such rights as he had through the agency of his master,—the rusticus, the nativus, the servus,—fell only occasionally within the view of the writer who chronicled great events, and then but to add an insignificant feature to his picture. The villein possessed no title-deeds, by the evidence of which his rights were attested ; he carried his troubles to no court that was skilled enough to record its proceedings. It is only by a glimpse here and there that we are enabled to detect his existence ; and the glimpses are too uncertain to furnish a clue by which his history can be traced.

The rusticus or nativus.

is found in an inquest of 39 Hen. III. which, I fear, is not good authority. Compare, however, the charters printed in Harland's Mamecestre, i. 182, 183, 188, 195, 198, 199, where important illustrations are given from the constitutions of Chester, Preston, Liverpool, Lancaster, and Salford.

Yet when he reappears, as he does in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, he bears marks of a history on which some Depression into servitude. conjectures must be hazarded. Under the Anglo-Saxon system there is no difficulty in estimating his position: it is one of depression but not of helplessness: when he comes before us in the reign of Richard II his condition is one which suggests that, however much social causes may have served to ameliorate his actual lot, the legal theory of his status has become hardened and sharpened so as to warrant almost wanton oppression.

The Anglo-Saxon laws recognised, as we have seen, a class of Anglo-Saxon servitude. serfs, or theows, who were the mere chattels of their master. The landless man, on the contrary, was free in all personal relations, although he must have a surety or a patron, to answer for his forthcoming, or to assert his rights in all matters of which the law took cognisance. The landless man might settle on the land of another, or take service in his household; he might act as a hired labourer, or as a small rent-paying tenant; he might be attached hereditarily to his master, or to the land that his master owned. And the lowest class of landowner, that is, the coorl who possessed a little alod of his own, had often, perhaps generally, found it necessary to put himself under the protection of his powerful neighbour, who would defend his rights and discharge his public services in consideration of a rent paid or labour given, or an acknowledgment of dependence. The barons who took Servitude in Domesday. the Domesday Survey recognised the existence of all these classes, and of distinctions among them much more minute than can be interpreted at the present day¹. That record attests the existence of more than 25,000 servi, who must be understood to be, at the highest estimate of their condition, landless labourers; over 82,000 bordarii; nearly 7000 cotarii and cotseti, whose names seem to denote the possession of land or houses held by service of labour or rent paid in produce; and nearly 110,000 villani. Above these were the liberi homines and sokemanni, who seem to represent the mediæval and modern freeholder.

¹ Ellis, Intr. ii. 511 sq., gives the following numbers: bordarii, 82,119; cotarii, 5054; coscets, 1749; servi, 25, 156; villani, 108,407; besides small numbers of different classes which may be referred to the same heads. The distinctions among these classes are generally based on the variety of services to which they were liable or the extent of the land they were allowed to hold; but local customs differed, and the warning, 'Videat qui seyrum tenet, ut semper sciat quae sit antiqua terrarum institutio vel populi consuetudo,' was very necessary. Rectitudines, in the Ancient Laws, ed. Thorpe, p. 186. Most of the terms are explained in the Rectitudines Singularum Personarum; in Greenwell's edition of Boldon Buke, pp. l. sq.; in Robertson's Scotland under her Early Kings, ii. 158 sq.; in Hale's Domesday of S. Paul's, and Register of Worcester; in Pearson's Early and Middle Ages, Thorpe's Lappenberg, and Ellis's Introduction to Domesday.

Villénage in Domesday.

The villani of Domesday are no doubt the ceorls of the preceding period, the men of the township, the settled cultivators of the land, who in a perfectly free state of society were the owners of the soil they tilled, but under the complicated system of rights and duties which marked the close of the Anglo-Saxon period had become dependent on a lord, and now under the prevalence of the feudal idea were regarded as his customary tenants; irremovable cultivators, who had no proof of their title but the evidence of their fellow ceorls. For two centuries after the Conquest the villani are to be traced in the possession of rights both social and to a certain extent political: their oaths are taken in the compilation of Domesday, their representatives attend the hundred-moot and shire-moot; they are spoken of by the writers of the time as a distinct order of society, who, although despicable for ignorance and coarseness¹, were in possession of considerable comforts, and whose immunities from the dangers of a warlike life compensated for the somewhat unreasoning contempt with which they were viewed by clerk and knight. During this time the villein could assert his rights against every oppressor but his master; and even against his master the law gave him a standing-ground if he could make his complaint known to those who had the will to maintain it. But there can be little doubt that the Norman knight practically declined to recognise the minute distinctions of Anglo-Saxon dependence, and that the tendency of both law and social habit was to throw into the class of nativi or born villeins the whole of the population described in Domesday under the heads of the villein.

Advantages

Tendency towards depression.

¹ E.g. 'Servi vero, quos vocamus rusticos, suos ignominiosos et degeneres in artibus eis indebitis emtrire contendunt, non ut excaut a vitiis sed ut abundant divitiis . . . Redimunt suos a dominis servi. . . .' W. Map, de Nugis Curialium, p. 9.

of servi, bordarii, and villani¹. Not but that, if it came to a question of law, the local witnesses might in each case draw a distinction as to the status of the villein concerned; the testimony of the township or the hundred might prove that this man was descended from a family which had never been free, this from a bought slave, this from a commended ceorl; but the law administered by Norman jurists classed nativi and villani together²: the nativus could not be made a knight or a clerk without the leave of his master, or without formal emancipation; the villanus, with his sequela, his service, and his progeny, could be disposed of in the same deed of sale or gift that alienated the land on which he had been settled for ages³: the villein could not leave his home, for by so doing his lord lost his services. It is true that in a state of society in which the land is far too wide for its inhabitants, and in which accordingly the wages of labour may be said to be paid in land, such a state of dependence may be compatible with much personal comfort and some social ambition; but it is in itself a degraded position, and has a tendency to still further degradation. Incidentally however it is probable that the influx of Norman ideas helped to raise the lowest rank of dependents; for although the free ceorl becomes the villein, the servus or theow disappears altogether. Not to anticipate here the further conclusions which still lie far ahead of us, it may be said that under the Norman

Legal status
of the villein.

¹ In one entry on the Pipe Roll of Henry I they seem to be treated as part of the stock upon an estate: 'Restoldus debet £239 15s. 2d. numero, pro defectu comitatus, videlicet in annona, et domibus, et grangiis, et molendinis, et piscariis, et villanis, et bordariis, et buris et bubuleis et foeno;' p. 2.

² The fifth book of Glanvill is devoted to the question of villenage, or the status of the nativus: 'Omnia catalla cujuslibet nativi ita intelliguntur esse in potestate domini sui quod propriis denariis villanus dominum suum a villenagio se redimere non poterit; si quis vero extraneus eum ad liberaudum emeret suis nummis, posset quidem perpetuo versus dominum suum qui eum venderat se in statu libertatis tueri.' ch. 5. 'Ascriptitii qui villani dicuntur, quibus non est liberum obstantibus quidem dominis suis a sui status conditione discedere;' Dialogus de Scaccario, i. 10. The chattels of the ascriptitii might be sold to pay their lord's debts, but not until all his own saleable property had been sold; and in case of a scutage, those of the knights holding under a defaulting lord might be sold as well as those of the villein. Ibid. ii. 14.

³ See examples in Madox, Formulare Anglicanum, pp. 416 sq. None of them however belong distinctly to the Norman reigns.

Advantages
of the villein
in the Norman period.

kings such slight indications as we possess of the state of the villeins show them to have been in possession of considerable social privileges. They were safe in the possession of their homes; they had a remedy against the violence of their masters¹; they could, if they chose to renounce their holdings and take refuge in a town, become members of the guild, and there, when unclaimed for a year and a day, obtain the full rights of free men; they could obtain manumission by the intervention of the Church, which always proclaimed the liberation of the villein to be a work of merit on the part of the master. But it by no means followed that manumission was a material benefit, if thereby the newly enfranchised man lost his title to be maintained on his lord's land, and must forthwith look for new service or throw himself on the chances of war or trade. Under a fairly good lord, under a monastery or a college, the villein enjoyed immunities and security that might be envied by his superiors; he had a ready tribunal for his wrongs, a voice in the management of his village; he might with a little contrivance redeem his children and start them in a higher state of life. His lord had a peremptory claim on his earnings, but his lord had a lord whose claims on him were as irresistible if not as legally binding. He was excluded from juries and assizes touching property, but by that exemption he was freed from the risk of engaging in quarrels in which he would be crushed without pity by the more powerful neighbour against whom he might have to testify. If he was without political rights, so were also the great majority of his superiors.

His disabilities not disadvantageous to him.

The few laws of the Norman period do not much affect the villein. The manumitting clause of the Conqueror's charter, as commonly received, is the interpolation of a late-age²: it is only by a bold inference that we can argue from the words of the charter of Henry I that the villeins came within the provision that the barons should treat their men as the king treated the barons. The enfranchising power of the borough or the guild may be inferred, but cannot be proved. The restriction imposed by the Constitutions of Clarendon on the ordination of the rustics seems to imply that the practice had reached a point at which it was liable to be abused¹. The exclusion of the villani, cotseti, and ferdingi, of mean and poor persons, from the judicial duties of the shire-moot, was a measure which common prudence and policy alike must have dictated². It may however be doubted whether the word villani had during the twelfth century fully acquired the meaning of servitude which was attached to it by the later lawyers.

¹ 'Aluredus de Cheaffeword reddit compotum de 40s. pro rustico verberato.' This must have been his own rusticus, for an assault on another man's villein would not have been reported in the royal accounts. Pipe Roll 31 Hen. I, p. 55.

² Thorpe, Ancient Laws, p. 213: 'Si qui vero velit servum suum liberum facere, tradat cum vicecomiti per manum dexteram in pleno comitatu, quietum illum clamare debet a jugo servitutis suae per manumissionem, et ostendat ei liberam viam et tradat illi libera arma, scilicet lanceam et gladium, deinde liber homo efficitur.'

133. The military system of the Normans, so far as it is connected with their doctrine of tenure, need not be further discussed here. We have seen that the distribution of the land into knights' fees was a gradual work, which was not completed in the reign of Henry II. When therefore Ordericus Vitalis describes the regular feudal force of the kingdom as consisting of sixty thousand knights, to whom a proper provision in land had been assigned by the Conqueror, it is clear that he is stating an inference drawn from some calculations which we do not possess, unless, as seems probable, it was based on a misunderstanding of the Domesday Survey³. The apparently inexplicable diversities

¹ 'Fili rusticorum non debent ordinari absque assensu domini de cujus terra nati dignoscuntur.' Const. 16; Select Charters, p. 134. This legislation however is by no means peculiar to this age or country; see the law of Charles the Great in Labbe and Cossart, Conc. vii. 1061; that of Lewis the Pious, ibid. vii. 1480; and the Lateran Council of 1179, ibid. x. 1730.

² See the passage quoted above, p. 396, note 2. In the Pipe Roll of 31 Henry II are several cases of amercements imposed for placing rustici on juries and assizes. Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 379.

³ It is certain that even the officials of the Exchequer had no certain computation of the number of knights' fees. Alexander Swerford, the original compiler of the Liber Ruber Scaccarii, who wrote in 1230, tells us that Longchamp when Chancellor had endeavoured in vain to ascertain it: 'Illud commune verbum in ore singulorum tunc temporis divulgatum fatuum reputans et mirabile, quod in regni conquisitione dux Normannorum Rex Willelmus servitia xxxii. millia militum infeodavit.' Hunter, Three Catalogues, p. 13. Stephen Segrave however, the minister of Henry III, reckoned 32,000 as the number; Ann. Burton, p. 367. The calculation of Higden in the Polychronicon, lib. i. c. 49, makes the whole number

Legal notices of the villein.

Military system.

Knights' fees.

Difficulty of computation.

in the computation of the acreage of the hide, the variation of the numbers of hides contained in the knight's fee, and the fact that the system of assessment by knights' fees furnishes no real clue to the number of warriors actually producible, are sufficient reason for not hazarding a conjectural estimate. The number of knights who could be brought into the field at once was by no means large; the whole number furnished by the tenants-in-chief from the ten counties south of the Thames and Avon was, as we learn from the Liber Niger, only 2047¹: and these counties probably contained a fourth part of the population of England. The official computation, on which the scutage was levied, reckoned in the middle of the thirteenth century 32,000 knights' fees, but the amount of money actually raised by Henry II on this account, in any single year, was very far from commensurate. The exact obligation of the knight's service was to furnish a fully-armed horseman to serve at his own expense for forty days in the year. This service was not in practice limited to the defence of the country in which the estate lay; the Norman knights served the Norman king both in England and abroad, nor did the question of foreign service arise during this period of our history. The baron led his own knights under his own banner, the host was arranged by the constable or marshal under the supreme command of the king: the knights who held less than baronial fees under the crown appeared with the rest of the forces of the shires under the command of the sheriffs. The infantry must have been furnished almost entirely by the more ancient fyrd system, or by mercenaries. It is however improbable that anything like a regular force of infantry was maintained by the Norman kings. It was enough, after the

Obligation of military service.

Union of the shire-fores under the sheriff.

60,015, of which 28,015 are held by the religious; but as he makes the parish churches 45,002 in number, his calculation is only a contrivance to reconcile the 60,000 of Ordericus with the 32,000 of popular opinion. From Higden the statement is taken by the author of the chronicle called Eulogium (vol. ii. p. 154), from which work it was taken by a host of copyists: Selden in his notes on Fortescue quotes it from the Eulogium.

¹ Pearson, Early and Middle Ages, i. 375; ii. 209, 496, 497. Mr. Pearson's conjecture that the number of 32,000 really applied to the hides, and that the knights' fees, calculated at five hides each, would be 6400, is ingenious; but the statement, wherever it is made, is distinctly referred to the knight's fees only.

pacification of the country by the Conqueror, that a force of knights should be kept together for such hurried expeditions on the Welsh or Scottish borders as received the name of wars. The like body accompanied the king in his visits to Normandy. Where more was required, as was the case in the struggles of the early years of Henry I, recourse was had to the native population. Every free man was sworn, under the injunction of the Conqueror, to join in the defence of the king, his lands and his honour, within England and without¹: nor was any fixed period for such service defined by the law; although custom must have restricted the demand for it to cases in which the kingdom was imperilled by invasion, and must have limited its duration according to the provision made by the county for the force it furnished. The oath thus taken must have legalised the employment of English troops for the war in Maine in 1073, and the summons issued by William Rufus to the English, in obedience to which 20,000 foot-soldiers were furnished for war in Normandy². Each of these received from the shire a sum of ten shillings, which, compared with the twenty shillings which in the county of Berks were paid towards the expenses of each knight for two months³, may perhaps imply that two months was the customary period of service. On these terms then it is probable that the English forces which assisted Henry against Robert of Belesme were collected; and although the long peace which followed gave but few opportunities for the king to demand the fulfilment of the obligation, the invasion by King David in 1138 found the Yorkshiresmen still mindful of their duty and capable of discharging it successfully⁴.

Obligation to foreign service.

Provision made by the shire for the fyrd.

Action of the fyrd.

But there can be little doubt that for the Norman wars of Henry I, and for the partisan warfare which desolated England under Stephen, mercenaries were largely employed. In 1085 the Conqueror's army raised for the defence against Canute of Denmark was composed of 'solidarii'⁵, footmen and archers collected from all parts of France and Brittany; and after the Mercenary soldiers.

¹ Select Charters. p. 80.

³ Above, p. 117, note 2

⁵ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1085.

² Flor Wig. A.D. 1094.

⁴ Ric. Hexham, ed. Twysden, c. 321.

Employment of mercenaries.

first Crusade the hosts of veteran adventurers who survived their pilgrimage were at the disposal of Henry I. The mercenaries drawn by him from Flanders gave Stephen and Matilda a precedent for a practice which to a great extent indeed economised the blood and sinew of the native English, but yet was productive of much misery and great irritation. The rapacity of the Flemings created in the people an intense feeling of hatred, and one of the most popular provisions of the reform carried out by Henry II was the expulsion of these plunderers. The fact that each of these three sources of military strength, the feudal array, the national militia, and the mercenary companies, was available on both sides of the channel, placed a very powerful engine of warfare in the king's hands; and we shall see as we proceed that among the very first steps towards a reorganisation of the national unity were measures which forbade the introduction of mercenaries into England, a growing reluctance, culminating in a positive refusal, on the part of the feudal tenants to fight the king's battles abroad, and the actual cessation of any attempt to use the English free population for foreign warfare.

Unpopularity of mercenaries
in England.

How much of this system was Norman?

134. This survey of the history of the Norman sovereigns, whilst it furnishes but a broken outline of their administrative system in general, suggests questions which it is by no means easy to answer. How far was the machinery, the recorded facts of which have been here given, the national system of the Normans in their earlier seats? how far was it a mere translation of English institutions into Norman forms? how far was it the result of a combination which forced both elements into new developments? What was purely Norman, what was purely English, what was new? The opinions of lawyers and historians have widely differed on this point; and the differences seem in many cases traceable rather to the mental constitution than to the political or national prepossessions of the writers. One authority insists on the immemorial antiquity of every institution the origin of which cannot be fixed by date; another refuses to recognise the possible existence of a custom before it appears definitely in contemporary records: this writer regards the common features of two systems as positive proofs that the one is derived from the other; that refuses to receive any amount of analogy as proof of historical connexion. The result has been on the one hand to treat the Norman system of government as an entire novelty, and on the other to reduce its influences to the merest and most superficial shades of change. The view that has been taken in the earlier chapters of this book has recognised to the fullest extent the permanence of the Anglo-Saxon institutions, and under each head of the present chapter have been noted the features of the Norman reigns which appeared really strange to the older rule. In the policy of the Conqueror we have traced the existence of an idea of combination, of dovetailing or welding together the administrative framework of the two races. In taxation the Danegeld is distinctly English, the feudal aid is as distinctly Norman: William maintained both. In legal procedure the hundred-moot and the shire-moot are English, the custom of trial by battle is Norman; in military organisation the fyrd is Anglo-Saxon, the knight-service is Norman: in each case the Conqueror introduced the one without abolishing the other. This principle was dictated in the first instance by the necessity of providing institutions for two distinct nationalities, and was perpetuated as the nationalities coalesced, because it furnished the king with a power of holding the balance of the kingdom with a firm purpose of strong government. Just as the nationalities combined to produce one nation strengthened in character and polity by the union, so the combination of the institutions produced a new growth in which, whilst much that is old can be detected, there is much else that could not have existed but for the combination. The increase of official records in the reign of Henry II and his sons enables us to trace this influence more accurately as we advance. But there are some points which demand notice at our present stage of inquiry.

Variety of opinions.

Idea of this work.

Principle of combination.

We have considered the leading principle of the system of the Conquest to be the combination of the strongest part of the Norman system with the strongest part of the early English system; the maintenance of the local and provincial

Origin of
the Curia
Regis and Exchequer.

Norman,
English, or merely the work of despotism?

Element of truth in each theory.

machinery of the latter with the central and sovereign authority characteristic of the former. The most important parts of the centralising system of the Norman kings are the Curia Regis and Exchequer; and here the most opposite opinions have been put forth for many years with the utmost confidence. The Curia Regis has been regarded as the simple reproduction in conquered England of the Curia Ducis of Normandy¹, which again was a reproduction of the court of the Karoling kings of the West Franks as it existed under Charles the Simple when he bestowed Normandy on Rollo. From another point of view it is represented merely as the English court of Edward the Confessor, the small witenagemot of the Anglo-Saxon kings, which has under the influence of feudal ideas sustained a change rather nominal than constitutional, and which gradually tends to devolve upon the king and his more immediate household the central administration of justice in cases calling for such administration. From another point the whole central administration is viewed as the operation of the personal omnipotence of the king as conqueror and supreme administrator³. Each of these theories contains a great truth: the Norman kings were despotic in fact; their highest attempts at organised government advance in the direction of law no further than that stage which has been more than once described as the stage of routine. The system of routine by which they worked was primarily the system on which they had governed Normandy; the court of the duke was reproduced in principle, as it was in the persons who constituted it, in the court of the king. The English administrative system was also so far advanced under Edward the Confessor that the transformation of the ancient witenagemot into the great court and council was—after the great change of actors caused by the substitution of Norman for native lords and prelates,—possible without any still more violent innovation. But there are other facts to be considered besides theories conceived à priori. We possess a large stock of Anglo-Saxon records; laws and charters which shed a great deal of broken light on every department of the life of our forefathers. The constitutional history of Normandy, and the legal history of the whole of that kingdom of which Normandy was a nominal province, is, during the century and a half that intervenes between the extinction of the Karolingian power and the reign of Lewis VI, illustrated only in a very slight degree by fragments of legislation and scattered charters. The most ancient text-books of Norman law are later than the reign of Henry II, both in composition and in materials¹. No one at the present day would contend that the legal reforms of Henry II were drawn from the Grand Cōtūmier of Normandy, any more than that they were the result of the lessons of his great-uncle King David of Scotland. Yet it would be almost as rash to maintain that the similarities of Norman and later English law are to be ascribed solely to the fact that both were developed under the force of Henry I and under the genius of Henry II. If, again, we ascribe to Norman sources all that is Karolingian in the measures of the Norman and Angevin kings, we are underrating the probable and almost demonstrable influence which the association of the West-Saxon dynasty with the Karoling, Saxon, and Franconian courts must have produced on native custom. Under the circumstances it might seem almost the safest plan to abstain from attempting a conclusion. But this is scarcely possible.

¹ Brunner, in his Entstehung der Schwurgericht, and also in Holtzendorf's Encyclopädie.

² Gneist, Verwaltungs. i. 228 sq.

Scarceness of Norman records.

Difficulty of tracing the connexion of Norman and Karolingian
institutions.

The regular action of the central power of the kingdom

¹ Brunner, in an Excursus contained in his work, Das Anglonormannische Erbfolgesystem, gives a careful account of the existing origines of Norman law. These are to be found in two books: (1) Statuta et consuetudines Normanniae, printed in French by Marnier in his Établissements et Cōtūmes, Assises et Arrêts de l'Exchiquier de Normandie (Paris, 1839); and in Latin by Warnkönig in the Staats- und Rechts-Geschichte, vol. ii. This compilation, as Brunner shows, contains two works, (a) a Tractatus de brevibus et recognitionibus, drawn up soon after 1218; and (β) a Très ancienne cōtūme de Normandie, which belongs to the justiciarship of William Fitz-Ralph, about 1190-1200. (2) The second book is the Grand Cōtūmier of Normandy, the older form of which appears to be the Latin Somma de legibus consuetudinum Normanniae, which is found in J. P. de Ludewig's Reliquiae Manuscriptorum, vol. vii. pp. 149-418. The date of this work, which Brunner shows to be an original composition, and not founded on the preceding, as Warnkönig and Marnier supposed, falls between 1270 and 1275. Brunner's arguments on the Inquest by Jury are taken from charters of much earlier date.

Growth of the Exchequer in England
and in Normandy.

becomes known to us, as we have seen, first in the proceedings of the Exchequer. The English Exchequer appears first early in the reign of Henry I: the Norman Exchequer appears first under Henry II. There is nothing in the name to determine whether it was originally given to the court in England or in Normandy. The method of accounting in the English Exchequer is based on the English coinage, that of the Norman on the French: both England and Normandy must have had fiscal audits long before the Conquest; the systems of account, almost all the processes of the two courts, are different. Yet the results have necessarily a resemblance; the officers of the one were occasionally trained in the work of the other, and when reforms were needed in the one, a change of administrators was easy; the Treasury of Caen could lend an abbot to the Exchequer of Westminster, or the Exchequer of Westminster could lend a baron to revise the accounts of Caen. The same exigencies, so long as the rulers of England and Normandy were the same, would be met by much the same measures. There is no evidence but that of tradition for deriving the English Exchequer from Normandy: there is far more antecedent probability that whatever the Norman Exchequer has in common with the English was derived from the latter. Yet the English Exchequer was organised by Norman ministers: the Domesday Survey was carried out by Normans: Ranulf Flambard and Roger of Salisbury were both natives of the neighbourhood of Caen. If there is no Norman roll of the reign of Henry I, there is but one English roll: in the latter case all but one have perished, so that no one can safely maintain that in the former case none ever existed. Yet at the time at which the English fiscal system was developed, during the reign of William Rufus and in the early years of Henry I, the two countries were not under the same ruler.

The two Exchequers grow side by side.

Probable conclusion.

The conclusion seems to depend on a balance of probabilities: it is most probable that in both countries there was a fiscal court or audit, that the two were developed and more fully organised under the same superintendence, and each may have borrowed from the other: but there is no historical proof, and no historical necessity to assume that the one was an offshoot or a transplantation of the other. The importance of the name is only secondary; it matters little whether the chequered cloth were first used at Westminster or at Caen. It appears only in those countries which are connected with Normandy after the Conquest and with the Norman kings of England, so that from this point of view the English origin seems most probable. The existence of a Sicilian Exchequer is accounted for on one hypothesis as well as on the other; but the administration of the Wiscards, so far as it was Norman at all, was modelled on the Norman administration of England, and was carried out in some measure by ministers of English birth¹.

Name of Exchequer.

The history of the Curia Regis, in its judicial aspect, is, as we have seen, even more complicated. The Anglo-Saxon kings heard causes in person: the judgment of the king was the last resort of the litigant who had failed to obtain justice in the hundred and the shire. He had also a court in which the disputes of his immediate dependents were settled, the 'thening-manna-gemot,' the existence of which is proved, but no more than its existence². The Norman duke had his feudal court of vassals like every other feudal lord, and a tribunal of supreme judicature which may or may not have been personally identical with the court of vassals. The royal judicature in England was in the reigns of the Conqueror and William Rufus exercised either by the king or justiciar in person on the great festivals, or by special commission in the shire-moot. The question then is this, Was the Curia Regis as developed under Henry I the Curia Ducis of Normandy? or was it the king himself acting as judge with the council of his witan or a portion of them? or was it not rather a tribunal in a stage of growth, springing from a combination of the two older systems, and tending to become something very different from either?

Growth of the idea of the *Curia
Regis*.

The report of the court held on Bishop William of S. Carileph, after the rebellion of 1088³, supplies us with convincing proof

¹ See above, p. 350. note 2.

² Ibid. p. 186. note 3.

³ 'De injusta vexatione Willelmi episcopi primi': printed first by Bedford in an appendix to his edition of Simeon of Durham, pp. 343-375; and afterwards in the Monasticon, vol. i. pp. 244-250.

Trial of the bishop of Durham in the Curia
Regis.

that the last is the true account of the matter. The bishop had acted traitorously, and the king's officers had seized his estates; he demanded restitution; the king insisted that he should purge himself of his treason. The bishop pleaded his right to be tried as a bishop, but offered to defend himself from the charge of having broken his oath of fealty. The parties met at Salisbury, where all the bishops, earls, barons, and royal officers assembled. Lanfranc refused to listen to the bishop's plea, and he was appealed of treason by Hugh de Beaumont on the king's part. After much deliberation, every stage of which is recorded, the bishop still insisting on his right¹, Lanfranc declares that he must first answer the king's demand: 'We are not judging you in the matter of your bishopric but of your fee, and so we judged the bishop of Bayeux before the king's father concerning his fee; nor did the king in that plea call him bishop, but brother and earl².' The bishop struggles against this and appeals to Rome. The court then deliberates on the sentence, which is finally pronounced by Hugh de Beaumont, in the name of the king's court and the barons³: as the bishop will not answer the charge brought against him, he forfeits his fee. The record is drawn up by a friend of the bishop, and is very long; but these details are sufficient to prove that the court in which the trial was held was the witenagemot acting as a feudal court of peers.

Development of the Curia Regis
under
Henry I.

The Curia Regis of Henry I was a regulated and modified form of that of William Rufus, as that of Henry II was an organised development of that of Henry I. The trial of Henry

¹ At one point the bishop of Durham is sent out of court whilst the barons deliberate whether he should be restored to his possessions or acquit himself to the king first. The archbishop of York states the result of the consultation: 'Domine episcope, dominus noster archiepiscopus et regis Curia vobis iudicat quod rectitudinem regi facere debeatis antequam de vestro feodo revestiat.' Bedford, p. 359.

² 'Nos non de episcopio, sed de tuo te feodo iudicamus, et hoc modo iudicavimus Bajocensem episcopum ante patrem hujus regis de feodo suo; nec rex vocabat eum episcopum in placito illo, sed fratrem et comitem.' p. 361.

³ 'Domine episcope, regis curia et barones isti vobis pro justo iudicant, quando sibi vos respondere non vultis de hiis de quibus vos per me appellavit, sed de placito suo invitatis eum Romanum, quod vos feodum vestrum inde forisfacitis.' The bishop demurs: Hugh answers, 'Ego et compares mei parati sumus iudicium nostrum in hac curia confirmare.' p. 362.

of Essex early in the reign of Henry II, and that of Robert of Belesme in the reign of Henry I, are links in a series which proves the fundamental identity of the earliest and latest forms.

But although we may assert an English element in the Curia Regis, and confidently deny its exclusively Norman origin, it must be granted that very much of the new forms of process was foreign. Whether Lanfranc brought it from Pavia, or William inherited it from the Norman dukes, we can scarcely on existing evidence decide. Lanfranc had been an eminent lawyer¹ before he became a monk, and his Norman home at Caen was the central seat of the ducal administration. However they were introduced, the great development of the system of writs, and especially the custom of inquest by sworn recognitors, are features of Norman jurisprudence which must be traced ultimately to Karolingian usage. The provincial visitations of the royal judges, which under Henry II grow into a regular system of judicial eyres, are less certainly Norman. They may be of Karolingian origin as an expedient of government; but the historical connexion between the judges of Henry I and those of Charles the Great may be traced perhaps with as much probability on English as on Norman ground². If the Capitularies of Charles the Bald include the territory which was afterwards Normandy in the plan for the operation of the imperial missi,

The process of the Curia Regis was foreign: especially the system of writs.

Itinerant judicature of Frank origin.

Itinerant judicature under Alfred:

¹ 'Nam, ut fertur, pater ejus de ordine illorum qui jura et leges civitatis asservabant fuit.' Vita Lanfranci, c. 1. 'Saecularium legum peritiam ad patriae suae morem intentione laica fervidus edidit. Adolescentulus orator veteranos adversantes in actionibus causarum frequenter praecipitavit, torrente facundia apposite dicendo senes superavit. In ipsa aetate sententias promere statuit quas gratanter jurisperiti, aut judices aut praetores civitatis, acceptabant.' Ord. Vit. iv. c. 6.

² Lappenberg, ed. Thorpe, iii. p. 4. The argument of Brunner (Schwurgericht, pp. 152 sq.) for the priority of the itinerant justices of Normandy to those of England will scarcely be regarded as convincing. The reference to the 'Ancient Custom of Normandy,' which belongs to the last decade of the twelfth century, for proof that once or twice a year three or four sworn barons or knights held assizes in each Norman viscounty at a period earlier than the judicial reforms of Henry II, is unsatisfactory in the extreme: and the documentary examples are of still later date. There is the strongest probability that Henry II was as great a legal innovator in Normandy as he was in England. Brunner's use of this argument does not however in the least derogate from the convincing authority of the main argument of his book, which proves the descent of the Norman and English Inquest by Jury from the Karolingian Inquisitio.

there is sufficient evidence that a measure of the same sort was taken in England as early as the days of Alfred. But in this point as well as in the others it seems far more natural to suppose that similar circumstances suggested similar institutions, than that the latter were historically connected. The judicial visitations of the judges of Henry I were really rather circuits of the royal officers than special commissions. The special commissions of the Norman period, such as was the tribunal at Pennenden, already more than once referred to, were, as we have seen, attempts to combine the inquisitorial process of the Norman Curia with the local machinery of the Anglo-Saxon shire.

and under the Norman
kings.

New nomenclature of the Norman period, not a conclusive argument
of Norman innovation.

Much of the nomenclature of the Norman system is of course French; and the influence of the nomenclature in modifying the character of the offices and processes which it denotes must always be allowed for. The terms justiciar, account, feoffment, amercement, forfeiture, tallage, homage, chattels, assize, seisin, summons, and innumerable others are derived from the Norman usage of Latin as the language of records; and the Latin of the Norman charters is not the Latin of the Anglo-Saxon charters¹. The story that William the Conqueror forbade the use of the native tongue in the courts of law, notwithstanding the high authority of the fourteenth-century schoolman on which it rests, is no doubt a fabrication²; the popular courts transacted their business in English, and the kings issued their charters in English as well as Latin. Richard I is the first king of whom no English document is preserved³, and our first French record.

The language of legal proceedings.

¹ Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 127.

² 'Narrant historie quod cum^o Willelmus dux Normannorum regnum Angliæ conquisivisset, deliberavit quomodo linguam Saxoniam posset destrucere, et Angliam et Normanniam in idioma concordare; et ideo ordinavit quod nullus in curia regis placitaret nisi in Gallico, et iterum quod puer quilibet ponendus ad litteras addiceret Gallicam et per Gallicam Latinam, quæ duo usque hodie observantur;' Robert Holkot (ob. 1349), in his lectures on the Book of Wisdom, lect. xi.; cited by Selden in his notes on Fortescue. See too Fortescue, de Laudibus, &c., ch. 48. The authority of the pseudo-Ingulf is worthless.

³ The English grants of Stephen and Henry II to Canterbury are still preserved. See Mon. Angl. i. 111; MS. Lambeth 1212; Hickes, The-saurus, præf. p. xvi. The first French Record is a charter of 1215 of Stephen Langton, preserved on the Charter Rolls, p. 209.

belongs to the reign of John. But by far the great majority of the writs and other legal records must have been kept in Latin, as those of the Exchequer certainly were. The question then, so far as it is of significance at all, concerns the thing rather than the name: it will be found on careful examination that very many of the Norman-Latin names are merely translations of the Anglo-Saxon, not into the corresponding dialectic forms, but into the forms which represented the ideas which to the Norman mind they most nearly resembled. The Norman translated the word shire, not by sectio or even provincia, but by comitatus; the word scir-gerefa, not by praepositus provinciae, but by vicecomes; the gemot is far more frequently the curia than the conventus; the miseriordia and amercement have their exact correlatives in the Anglo-Saxon laws. The proper feudal terminology stands on a different footing: the oath of fealty in Norman law was different in matter and form from the Anglo-Saxon hyld-ath; the heriot was not the relief; the tallage rested on a different principle from the Danegeld; yet, under the combining process that was necessary to the Norman king, the one might be prudently taken to represent the other, the obligation and the burden being much the same under either name. The analogy of the changes introduced by S. Osmund into the liturgy of the Church may suffice to show how greatly, under the circumstances of the Conquest, such innovations are magnified in the popular estimation: the mere revision of the service-books is represented as the introduction of a new rite; the institution of a new cantus provokes a monastic revolution. The fact, however, that the Norman influences introduced at the Conquest are so liable to be exaggerated if they are judged on a superficial view, must not lead us to underrate them. They were strong and penetrating rather than ostentatiously prominent. The careful study of the institutions of this period reveals the fact that not only in England but in Normandy it was a season of growth and transition; and it is far more consonant with historical probability to suppose that the development of two states so closely connected proceeded, if not by the same, still by equal steps, than that the one borrowed its Norman translation of English terms.

Novelties of feudal terminology.

Analogy of ritual with law.

Transitional character of the period.

whole polity from the other: for that England in the twelfth century continued to borrow from Normandy the system of the tenth, whilst Normandy remained stationary, neither developing her own nor imitating her neighbour's growth, seems altogether inconceivable. The absence of records throws us back upon hypothesis, but no sound criticism will allow us to see in the Norman Côûtumier of the thirteenth century the model of the legal measures taken in England by the Conqueror and his sons.

Comparison of constitutional with political history.

The conclusion that is suggested by the survey of the administrative machinery of the period corresponds almost exactly with that which is drawn from the political history. The royal policy is a policy of combination, whereby the strongest and safest elements in two nations were so united as to support one sovereign and irresponsible lord; the alliance between the king and the English is reflected in the measures taken to strengthen the Curia Regis and to protect the popular courts. It is the first stage in the process of amalgamation; a process which Henry I probably never contemplated as possible, but which Stephen's reign with all its troubles helped to begin, and which that of Henry II made practically safe. The age of routine dependent on the will of a despot passes by almost perceptible stages into the age of law secured by the organisation of a people which has begun at least to realise its unity and identity.

CHAPTER XII.

HENRY II AND HIS SONS.

135. General features of the period.—136. Henry II, his character and training.—137. His accession and first measures.—138. The years 1158-1163.—139. The contest with Becket.—140. Constitutions of Clarendon.—141. The Assize of Clarendon.—142. The year 1170.—143. The years 1171-1173.—144. The rebellion of 1173-4.—145. Reforms after the rebellion.—146. Latter years of Henry II.—147. Summary of the reign.—148. Richard I.—149. William Longchamp.—150. Administration of Walter of Coutances and Hubert Walter.—151. Accession of John.—152. Loss of Normandy.—153. Quarrel with the Church.—154. Quarrel with the barons.—155. The Great Charter.

135. The sixty years that followed the death of Stephen comprise a period of English history which has a special importance. It is a period of constant growth, although the growth is far from being regular or uniform. The chain of events that connects the peace of Wallingford and the charter of Runnymede is traceable link by link. The nation which at the beginning of the period is scarcely conscious of its unity, is able, at the end of it, to state its claims to civil liberty and self-government as a coherent organised society. Norman and Englishman are now one, with a far more real identity than was produced by joint ownership of the land or joint subjection to one sovereign. England has been enabled, by the fortunate incapacity of John, to cut herself free from Normandy; and the division of interest between the two races has ceased. The royal power has curbed the feudal spirit and reduced the system to its proper insignificance. The royal power having reached its climax, has forced on the people trained under it the knowledge that it in its turn must be curbed, and that they

General features of the reigns of Henry II, Richard, and John.

Growth of the royal power through the people,

have the strength to curb it. The church, the baronage, and the people have found by different ways their true and common interest. This has not been done without struggles that have seemed at certain times to be internecine. The people, the baronage, and the church have been severally crushed, reformed, revived, and reorganised. More than once the balance of forces has been readjusted. The crown has humbled the baronage with the help of the people, and the church with the help of the baronage. Each in turn has been made to strengthen the royal power, and has been taught in the process to know its own strength. By law the people have been raised from the dust, the baronage forced to obedience, the clergy deprived of the immunities that were destroying their national character and counteracting their spiritual work. The three estates, trained in and by royal law, have learned how law can be applied to the very power that forced the lesson upon them. What the king has reformed and reorganised in order to gain a firm and real basis for his own power, has discovered its own strength and the strength of law, and has determined to give its service and sacrifices no longer without conditions. The history is to be worked out in some detail.

who thereby learn their own strength.

Individual impression made by
Henry II.

Henry II is the first of the three great kings who have left on the constitution indelible marks of their own individuality. What he reorganised Edward I defined and completed. The Tudor policy, which is impersonated in Henry VIII, tested to the utmost the soundness of the fabric: the constitution stood the shock, and the Stewarts paid the cost of the experiment. Each of the three sovereigns had a strong idiosyncrasy, and in each case the state of things on which he acted was such as to make the impression of personal character distinct and permanent.

Henry II
at his accession.

136. Henry II at his accession found the kingdom in a state of dissolution: his only advantage was the absolute exhaustion of all the forces which had produced that dissolution. The task before him was one which might have appalled an experienced legislator, and Henry was little more than twenty-one years old. He did not succeed to the inheritance of a band of veteran counsellors; the men with whom he had to work were the survivors of the race that had caused the anarchy. He was a young man, of keen bright intellect, patient, laborious, methodical; ambitious within certain well-defined limits, tenacious of power, ingenious even to minuteness in expedients, prompt and energetic in execution; at once unscrupulous and cautious. These characteristics mark also the later stages of his career, even when, disappointed of his dearest hopes and mortified in his tenderest affections, he gave way to violent passion and degrading licence; for his private vices made no mark on his public career, and he continued to the last a most industrious, active, and business-like king. There was nothing in him of the hero, and of the patriot scarcely more than an almost instinctive knowledge of the needs of his people, a knowledge which can hardly ever be said to be the result of sympathy. Thus much all the historians who have described him join in allowing; although they form very different estimates of his merit as a ruler, and of the objects of his policy. These objects seem to have been mainly the consolidation of his power, in England the strengthening and equalising of the royal administration, on the Continent the retention and thorough union of the numerous and variously constituted provinces which by marriage or inheritance had come into his hands. The English nation may gratefully recognise his merit as a ruler in the vastness of the benefits that resulted from the labours even of a selfish life.

His character in its earlier, and later development.

His political aims.

Henry II was born at Le Mans on the 5th of March, 1133¹, when his grandfather was despairing of an heir. When quite an infant, he received the fealty and homage of the barons as their future king. He was the child of parents singularly ill-matched: his father was of the weak, unprincipled, and impulsive type into which the strong and astute nature of the Angevin house sank in its lowest development; his mother a Norman lady who had all the strong characteristics of her race, and had too early exchanged the religious training which would have curbed them for the position of the spoiled child-wife of the cold-

He was born in 1133.

His parents.

¹ Chron. Andegavense, in Labbe's Bibliotheca Manuscriptorum, i. 277; Ordericus Vitalis, lib. x. c. 1. R. de Monte, A.D. 1133.

The Empress
Matilda.

blooded despotic emperor. As empress she had enjoyed the power and splendour of her position too heartily to endure the rule of a husband so personally insignificant as Geoffrey of Anjou, or to submit to the restraints of a policy which would have been desperate but for the craft and energy of Robert of Gloucester. Yet in spite of her imperious behaviour and her want of self-control, Matilda was a woman of considerable ability; in her old age she was a safe and sagacious counsellor; and some part at least of her son's education must be put to her credit. Henry was brought to England when he was eight years old to be trained in arms¹; at the age of sixteen he was knighted by his great-uncle David of Scotland²; in 1151 he received the duchy of Normandy, and soon after succeeded his father in the county of Anjou; the next year he married Eleanor, and added Poitou and Guienne to his dominions; at the age of twenty he undertook the recovery of England, brought Stephen, partly by war and partly by negotiation, to terms which insured his own succession, and in less than a year after the pacification succeeded to the English throne.

Henry
comes to England in 1141: becomes duke in 1151, and king in 1154.

He could not have had much legal education before his accession.

An education so disturbed and so curtailed can hardly have contained much legal or constitutional teaching, and Henry's own peculiar genius for such lore could scarcely have been as yet developed; but by the urgency with which he forced Stephen to take in hand the necessary reforms, he showed at least a consciousness of the importance of the task, even if we may not venture to ascribe to him an actual share in the draught of the scheme of reform. That Henry acquired at the Scottish court any real acquaintance with the principles or forms of legal knowledge, that in his titular office of seneschal of France³ he really discharged any duties of a judicial character, or that he acted as justiciar in England during the latter years of Stephen, are theories alike improbable, and indeed opposed to historical evidence. The court of King David might have furnished training for either a warrior or a monk, but not for a lawyer or a constitutional king; in France Henry had scarcely spent more time than can be accounted for by the business of his succession and marriage; and in England he had remained only a few weeks after the pacification. He had in his wife and mother two counsellors of ability and experience, but his own genius for government must have been innate; and next to his genius the most important element in the creation of his characteristic policy must be looked for in his choice of advisers. Of these the first must have been Earl Ranulf of Chester, with whom as duke of Normandy he had made a close alliance in 1152, but who died before his accession; the earl of Leicester, Robert de Beaumont, Archbishop Theobald who had been firmly attached to the interests of the empress throughout the later years of the struggle; Bishop Henry of Winchester; Nigel of Ely who represented the family and the official training of Roger of Salisbury the justiciar of Henry I.; and Richard de Lucy, who had charge of the castle of Windsor and the Tower of London at the peace¹, who had possibly acted as justiciar during the last year of Stephen, and who filled the office for the first twenty-five years of Henry's reign. In a subordinate capacity was Thomas Becket of London, the pupil of Theobald and future archbishop and martyr. None of these, except Nigel and Thomas, had as yet given great proofs of administrative skill; the bishop of Winchester, who had had the fairest opportunity, had made the most signal failure. There must have been in Henry himself some gift that called forth or detected the ability of his servants.

¹ W. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. iii. § 70.

² Hen. Hunt. fol. 226.

³ The count of Anjou was hereditary seneschal of France; R. de Monte, A. D. 1177; but the office was almost always executed by a deputy. Giraldus Cambrensis mentions Geoffrey as seneschal, de Inst. Princ. lib. iii. c. 28.

Henry's
choice of counsellors.

137. Stephen died on the 25th of October, 1154, and Henry landed in England on the 8th of December². Nothing can show more clearly the exhaustion of society than the fact that the interregnum of two months was peaceful. Archbishop Theobald seems to have taken the helm of state, and notwithstanding the

Interregnum after Stephen's
death.

¹ Foedera, i. 18. The Tower of London and Windsor Castle were peculiarly in the custody of the justiciar; and he also signed the royal writs, as we find Richard de Lucy signing the charter of Henry II. The charter of Stephen however, in which he is addressed as justiciar, does not necessarily imply that he was chief justiciar. Madox, Formulare Angl. p. 40.

² Gervase, cc. 1375, 1376.

Coronation
of Henry.

His charter.

The mercenaries banished.

Restoration
of the Exchequer.

presence of Stephen's mercenary troops, which were yet undismitted, no man laid hands on his neighbour¹. After receiving the fealty of the chief barons at Winchester the duke of Normandy hastened to London, where he was elected and² crowned on the 19th of December, and issued a charter of liberties as brief and comprehensive as that of Stephen had been. He grants and confirms all the gifts, liberties, and customs that his grandfather had granted, promises the abolition of all evil customs that he had abolished, and enjoins that the church, his earls, barons, and all his men, shall have and hold, freely and quietly, well, in peace and wholly, of him and his heirs, to them and their heirs, all the liberties and free customs that King Henry I had granted and secured by his charter³. The reference to the charter of Henry is as marked as the omission of all mention of Stephen. The charter is attested by Richard de Lucy, who therefore was probably in the office of justiciar. On Christmas Day the king held his court at Bermondsey, and having debated with the barons on the measures necessary to the state of the kingdom, directed the expulsion of the mercenaries and the demolition of the adulterine castles⁴. William of Ypres consequently departed with his Fleming soldiers, and the demolition of the fortified houses was speedily begun. The bishop of Ely was recalled to the Exchequer⁵; Thomas Becket was made chancellor⁶, and the official dignity of the court was replaced on its old footing. Whether at this assembly new sheriffs were appointed, or that measure had been already taken before Stephen's death, is uncertain; the persons who are found in the office, so soon as the regular Exchequer accounts furnish us with authentic names, are generally barons of great local importance. In Devonshire

¹ Gervase, c. 1375.

² 'Ab omnibus electus est;' R. de Monte, A.D. 1154.

³ Statutes of the realm, Charters, p. 4; Select Charters, p. 128.

⁴ 'In nativitate Domini tenuit rex curiam suam apud Beremundesciam ubi cum principibus suis de statu regni et pace reformanda tractans, proposuit animo alienigenas gentes de regno propellere et munitiunculas pessimas per totam Angliam solotenus dissipare.' Gervase, c. 1377; R. de Monte, A.D. 1155.

⁵ Dialogus de Scaccario, Prolog. i. c. 8.

⁶ Gervase, c. 1377, states that Thomas was made chancellor at the accession.

and Wiltshire, the earls of the county, and in Herefordshire the claimant of the earldom, appear as sheriffs; Richard de Lucy accounts for Essex and Hertfordshire; but as a rule the sheriffs seem to be persons of local importance only, and chosen from what may be called the second rank of the baronage. The earls must have felt that they were in a critical position; Henry was bound to annul the titular creations of Stephen, and it was by no means certain within what limits the promise would be construed¹. We have no record of actual displacement; it may however have taken place at the time of the coronation; some at least of the fiscal earls retained their dignity; the earldoms of Bedford, Somerset, York, and perhaps a few others, drop out of the list; those of Essex and Wilts remain. Some had already made their peace with the king; some, like Aubrey de Vere, obtained a new charter for their dignity: this part of the social reconstruction was despatched without much complaint or difficulty².

The new
sheriffs.

Displacement of the new earls.

Not so the more substantial part of the work. The great nobles were not unwilling to see the humiliation of their smaller neighbours, but very loath to surrender the royal demesne, and especially the castles that had been placed in their hands by the two contending parties³. The command of the king was

Resumption of royal demesne.

¹ 'Rex Henricus coepit revocare in jus proprium urbes, castella, villas quae ad coronam regni pertinebant, castella noviter facta destruendo, et expellendo de regno maxime Flandrenses, et deponendo quosdam imaginarios et pseudo-comites quibus rex Stephanus omnia pene ad fiscum pertinentia minus caute distribuerat.' R. de Monte, A.D. 1155. The earldom of Kent, assigned on insufficient authority to William of Ypres, came to an end on his departure; and the earldom of York is heard of no more until Richard I bestowed it on his nephew Otto. The earl of Hereford, Roger, died in the first year of Henry, after having obtained a confirmation of his earldom; but his brother Walter did not succeed; it was however given to his great-grandson Henry de Bohun many years after. Of the earldoms of Bedford and Somerset no more is heard.

² The following passage of the Polycraticus probably refers to the transient character of the new dignities, although some of the persons mentioned in it were not of Stephen's promoting: 'Ubi sunt, ut de domesticis loquar, Gaufridus, Milo, Ranulfus, Alanus, Simon, Gillebertus, non tam comites regni quam hostes publici? Ubi Willelmus Sarisberiensis?' Joh. Salisb. Polycr. viii. 21.

³ The right of the duke of Normandy to garrison the castles of the barons has been mentioned already, and Henry's exercise of the right is an important illustration of his action on this occasion. In 1161 he occupied and garrisoned the castles of the count of Meulan and others; in 1166 of castles.

Resumption

Resistance of the great barons.

Henry takes the castles
in 1155.

summary and comprehensive; the royal estates, by whatever charters of the late king they were conferred, must be restored; the royal castles, however obtained, must be surrendered. Charters were produced and services pleaded in vain¹. A very few only were able to offer any real resistance. This came, as might be expected, from both sides. The count of Aumâle, who had won the battle of the Standard, who was a near kinsman of both kings, who had been generally faithful to Stephen, and was almost sovereign of the north, declined to surrender Scarborough. Roger of Hereford the son of Miles, who had been one of the great supporters of the empress, fortified the castles of Hereford and Gloucester against the king. Hugh Mortimer, who since the fall of the house of Montgomery had been the most powerful man on the Welsh march, prepared for open revolt. The Scots too showed no readiness in restoring Northumberland and Cumberland, which King David had undertaken to hold in trust for Henry.

The king lost no time in negotiation; in January 1155 he went northwards, and compelled the count of Aumâle to surrender Scarborough²: on his return he visited Nottingham, where the news of his approach frightened into a monastery the great baron of the Peak, William Peverell, who had been accused of attempting to poison the earl of Chester³. Early in March Henry was again in London, where he held a great council, renewed the general peace, and confirmed the old customs⁴, but declared his intention of extinguishing every element of disorder those of the count of Ponthieu and Alençon; in 1165 he seized the castles of the Lusignans in Poitou, and those of the Leonois in Brittany in 1171. He also in 1171 resumed the ducal demesnes which had been alienated since the death of Henry I. See R. de Monte under these dates.

¹ W. Newb. ii. c. 2.

² W. Newb. ii. c. 3; Gervase, c. 1377.

³ Gervase, c. 1377; R. de Monte, A.D. 1155. William Peverell's crime had been committed and his punishment determined on long before this. Henry had promised his fiefs to the earl of Chester, in case of his proved guilt, in 1152, in which year the earl died. Foedera, i. 16.

⁴ 'In sequenti Quadragesima congregavit generale concilium apud Londoniam et renovavit pacem et leges et consuetudines per Angliam ab antiquis temporibus constitutas.' Chron. de Bello, p. 72. 'Convocatis universis fere regni primoribus coepit rex rationem ponere cum eis qui adhuc tenebant praesidia regii juris; erat enim fixa in animo ipsius sententia omnem rebellionum materiam extirpare et suspicionum causas submovere.' Gervase, c. 1377.

and of bringing the contumacious barons to account. The manifesto was no sooner issued than it was enforced; the terrors of the king's approach wrought wonders; before the middle of the month Roger of Hereford had made his formal submission¹, and Hugh Mortimer, with his three castles of Wigmore, Cleobury, and Bridgnorth, alone held out. Before proceeding against him Henry held another great assembly, on April 10, at Wallingford², where he exacted the oaths of the bishops and barons to the succession of his son William, and in case of his death to Henry his second son. The subjugation of the border proved no easy task. Bridgnorth, which had been fortified fifty years before by Robert of Belesme, tasked the skill of the royal forces, and Henry was obliged to call out the whole military power of England before it was brought to submission³. Hugh Mortimer made his peace in July⁴. Before the end of his first year Henry had thus disarmed the feudal party, restored the regular administration of the country, banished the mercenaries, destroyed the castles, and showed an intention of ruling through the means, if not under the control, of his national council. In September he held another council at Winchester, in which he discussed the project of conquering Ireland as a provision for his brother William of Anjou⁵, and he wound up the business of the year by a solemn gathering at Westminster at Christmas⁶. The history of the year furnishes abundant illustration of the energy and capacity of a king of two-and-twenty.

He reduces Roger of Hereford.

Oaths taken to the heir.

Submission of Hugh Mortimer.

Proposed Conquest of Ireland.

The year 1156 was spent by Henry on the Continent. He was accompanied by his chancellor Becket, who had already become his most intimate friend and most influential adviser⁷. The chief object of the expedition was to secure Normandy and to bring to submission the king's brother Geoffrey, who had Expedition to France in 1156.

¹ March 13th. Gervase, c. 1378.

² 'Factus est conventus generalis praesulum et principum totius Angliae apud Walingefordiam.' Gervase, c. 1378; R. de Monte, A.D. 1155.

³ Chron. de Bello, p. 75; R. de Monte, A.D. 1155.

⁴ 'Mense Julio, nonis ejusdem;' R. de Monte.

⁵ The empress objected and the design was given up for the present. R. de Monte.

⁶ Chron. de Bello, p. 76.

⁷ Gervase, c. 1378.

claims on Anjou under his father's will which Henry denied. England was left under the management of the justiciars. The year is marked by no event of importance, but it furnishes us with the first of an unbroken series of Exchequer Rolls, from which we learn much as to the reconstruction of the administrative system. The Pipe Roll of the second year of Henry II¹ exhibits the account for the year ending at Michaelmas, 1156: no sheriff appears for the northern counties, which are still in the hands of the Scots; the diminished amount of revenue shows that the treasury was but slowly recovering from the exhaustion of the last reign, not more than £22,000 being raised in the gross from the whole kingdom. A general visitation of the country had not been yet attempted, but the constable, Henry of Essex, had heard pleas in eight of the southern counties, in two of them, Essex and Kent, in company with the chancellor, who for the first time appears in the character of a judge. The general taxation is of much the same sort as in the roll of Henry I, but the term scutage, now first employed, indicates that the assessment of the knights' fees was coming into use; and as it is mainly in reference to the spiritual baronies that the word occurs, it follows that the liability of these estates to the public duties was not confined to military defence. The practice was, as we learn from John of Salisbury, opposed by Archbishop Theobald², but it was perhaps advised by the chancellor, who did not until a much later period betray any sympathy with the cause of clerical immunities.

Revenue of 1156.

Itinerant justices in 1156.

Scutage in 1156.

Henry's acts
in 1157.

138. Henry returned to England on the 7th of April, 1157, and immediately found his hands full of work. Some few of the royal castles had been allowed to remain in the hands of the barons who were half trusted, in order perhaps to avoid provoking them to rebel. The son of the late king, William count of Mortain, Warenne and Surrey, whose rights had been secured at the peace, now placed in the king's hands all the castles that he possessed both in England and Normandy, and received in return the patrimony of his father and mother¹. Hugh Bigod, the veteran intriguer, who had yet again to signalise himself as a rebel, surrendered his castles²; and king Malcolm of Scotland restored the northern counties. The king made a pilgrimage to S. Edmund's, where he wore his crown on Whitsunday and held a great court³; and directly after began to prepare for his first expedition to Wales. In contemplation of this undertaking he assembled the whole baronage at Northampton on the 19th of July⁴; and having received the ambassadors of Frederick Barbarossa, and done some legal business, he proceeded into the west. The force necessary for the expedition was raised by an arrangement new at least in England—every two knights joined to furnish a third; so that a third of the whole body took part in the expedition⁵. The war was short, and not brilliant. The constable, Henry of Essex, was charged with cowardice in letting fall the royal standard; and the king returned, scarcely claiming the fame of victory, to meet the king of Scots in the Peak⁶. In that meeting it is probable that the final surrender of Northumberland and Cumberland was made, and Malcolm received, as the inheritance of his grandmother, the daughter of Waltheof, the county of Huntingdon. Henry wore his crown that Christmas at Lincoln, not however venturing into the cathedral, for this was forbidden by a superstition already of old standing, but attending mass in the church of S. Mary Wigford⁷. The year is not marked as one of great judicial activity.

¹ Printed by Hunter with the Rolls of the 3rd and 4th years, in 1844.

² John of Salisbury (cp. 128) mentions this scutage as levied to enable Henry to make war on his brother: 'Verum interim scutagium remittere non potest, et a quibusdam exactionibus abstinere, quoniam fratris gratia male sarta nequidquam coit.'

Restoration
of the northern counties.

Expedition
to Wales.

Coronation
at Lincoln.

Six months of 1158 were spent in England; at Easter the king wore his crown at Worcester⁸. In the summer he went 1158.

The year

¹ R. de Monte, A.D. 1157.

² Ibid.

³ Chron. de Bello, pp. 84, 85; Pipe Roll, p. 107.

⁴ 'Convocati sunt ad eum præsules et principes regni, abbates nonnulli, alique inferioris ordinis personae.' Gervase, cc. 1378, 1380; Radewic, ap. Urstis, p. 325.

⁵ 'Circa festivitatem S. Johannis Baptistae rex Henricus praeparavit maximum expeditionem ita ut duo milites de tota Anglia tertium pararent ad opprimendum Gualenses terra et mari.' R. de Monte, A.D. 1157.

⁶ Pipe Roll, pp. 90, 152; R. de Monte, A.D. 1157.

⁷ Pipe Roll, p. 136; W. Newb. ii. c. 9; Hoveden, i. 216.

⁸ Hoveden, i. 216; Pipe Roll, p. 175.

Expedition
to France in 1158.

into Cumberland, where he knighted William of Warenne on Midsummer Day¹; and in August he went to France, where he secured the inheritance of his brother Geoffrey who was just dead, and negotiated the marriage of his eldest son with a daughter of Lewis VII. Early in the next year he betrothed his second son Richard to a daughter of the count of Barcelona, and formed a plan for enforcing the claim of his wife on the county of Toulouse².

The war of Toulouse,
in 1159.

Henry's foreign wars affect our subject only as being the causes which prompted some of those financial measures which illustrate his genius for organisation. And amongst them the war of Toulouse is perhaps the most important: for it is the epoch at which the institution of scutage, as a pecuniary commutation for personal service in the host, is fixed by the common consent of lawyers and historians. The king's position was a somewhat difficult one. It was scarcely fair to call on the military tenants of England and Normandy to fight as a matter of duty for the aggrandisement of the estates of the duke of Aquitaine. The English baronage might indeed rejoice in the opportunity of signalling themselves before so splendid a king and in a new land; but not so the bulk of the knightly force. Still less could the national force of the country be armed in such a cause. Henry was willing to fight with mercenaries, if England and Normandy would provide him with the funds: such a force would be far more manageable during the campaign, and less dangerous when it was over. A precedent was found in the ancient fyrdwite, the fine paid by the Anglo-Saxon warrior who failed to follow his king to the field³. But instead of being a punishment, it was now regarded as a privilege; those tenants of the crown who did not choose to go to war, paid a tax of two marks on the knight's fee⁴. With this, and a very

Scutage in
commuta-
tion of service.

¹ R. de Monte; Hoveden, i. 216; Chron. Mailros. p. 168; Pipe Roll, pp. 119, 175.

² R. de Monte, A.D. 1158, 1159.

³ Above, p. 190.

⁴ A scutage of two marks on the knight's fee is accounted for in the Rolls of the fifth year. According to Alexander Swerford, the author of the Liber Ruber, it was for an expedition to Wales; Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 436: but no such expedition was made. Gervase, c. 1381, says that the large accumulation of treasure from other sources, amounting, according to the contemporary writers, to £180,000, Henry undertook the subjugation of Toulouse. The whole court accompanied him: the king of Scots, the first of the tenants-in-chief, William of Boulogne, son of the late king, and the chancellor Becket, are especially mentioned. The expedition lasted for three months, and, although marked by some brilliant exploits, was unsuccessful. Henry did not take Toulouse, although he reduced most of the territory to submission. He would not bear arms against Lewis VII¹, who was his feudal

Expedition
to Toulouse, 1159.

king exacted £180,000 by way of scutage from England this year. The sum is impossible, and is probably made by multiplying the supposed number of knights' fees (60,000) by the sum of sixty shillings, which was the amount levied on the knight's fee in Normandy. R. de Monte, A.D. 1159. But the shillings are Angevin, i.e. worth one-fourth of the English; and the knights' fees were very far from being 60,000. See above, p. 432. Becket's enemies alleged that he advised the impost, and his friends regarded his subsequent troubles as a judgment on that account. See Gilbert Foliot, ep. 194; Joh. Salisb. ep. 145. There is no doubt about the character of this scutage. John of Salisbury says: 'Tolosam bello aggressurus, omnibus contra antiquum morem et debitam libertatem indixit ecclesiis, ut pro arbitrio ejus satraparum suorum conferrent in censum,' ep. 145: he regards the chancellor as accountable for it.

¹ Robert de Monte simply says, 'urbem tamen Tolosam noluit obsidere, deferens honorem Ludovico.' The Draco Normannicus gives more details, which are worthy of note:—

'Rex velut orator legiones convocat, adsunt
Et regni proceres, militiaeque duces.

* * * * *
Orditur, narrat, confirmat, sicque refutat,
Claudit, et ex istis quatuor illa regit;
An dominum regem clausum subvertat et urbem,
An vivum capiat, consul et ipsa ruat;
Urgeat an clausos muris ad deditiorem,
Exspectet potius hanc sine rege capi?

* * * * *
Consultit inde duces, quaerit, deliberat, ex his Quatuor utilius quid sibi quidve suis.
Quidlibet ex primis tribus his vis militis audax
Expetit, hortatur, id feritate cupit.
Ingenium procerum simul experientia rerum
Ut quartum teneat consultit illud agat;
Regibus Anglorum facinus miserabile regem Frangere Francorum, deditiōne premi.
Clausis parcendum, pietatem solvere victis,
Urbem ne repleat planctibus, igne, nece.
Consilio procerum rex regi parcat et urbi,
Pars patriae fuerat jamque subacta sibi.'

lord, and with whom he was at peace, although Lewis was actively supporting the count of Toulouse against him, and the Norman lords were fighting on their own border. This war was however followed by a quarrel between the two kings, which detained Henry at a distance from England until the month of January, 1163.

Long absence of Henry from England.

Quiet administration during the years 1158-1163.

During this long period the country was administered by the justices, the queen or the young Henry occasionally presiding in the court or at the councils: the rolls of account show that the business of justice and taxation went on without difficulties, and the historians detail little more than the succession of bishops and abbots. The most important of these was the election of the chancellor to the see of Canterbury, which took place in the presence of the justiciar, in May 1162; the electors on this occasion being the bishops of the province. This event closes the ministerial career of Becket, and forms an epoch in the reign of Henry, which serves to mark off one period of his political activity.

Completion of the scheme of reform.

Up to this time his labours had been confined mainly to the work of restoration. The scheme adopted at Wallingford had been carried out strictly: the castles had been demolished or taken into the royal hands, the mercenaries dismissed, the fiscal earldoms abolished; the royal estates had been as far as was possible restored to cultivation, farmhouses and palaces had alike been rebuilt¹; the courts of justice had been in full activity, and severe sentences had everywhere been executed upon the malefactors who had enjoyed impunity for many years: in particular the coiners of false or debased money had been rigidly punished. The institution of scutage had shown that the king needed an increased revenue, and that he knew how to raise it; and the measures taken for levying a force against the Welsh in 1157, and for the war of Toulouse, showed that, young as

¹ R. de Monte marks the year 1161 as a period of building. Among other erections, 'domum leprosorum juxta Cadomum mirabilem aedificavit: aulam et cameras ante turrin Rothomagi nihilominus renovavit, et non solum in Normannia sed etiam in regno Angliae, ducatu Aquitaniae, comitatu Andegaviae, Cenomanniae, Turonensi, castella, mansiones regias, vel nova aedificavit, vel vetera emendavit.'

Henry was, he had a plan and policy of his own. Nothing in fact could have been wiser than to disarm that feudal party from which he had most to fear, by accepting their money instead of leaning on their armed support. It is not to be supposed that during these years Henry showed no signs of that ingenuity in the development of legal institutions which especially marks the next period of the reign. William of Newburgh mentions, among his very first acts, the careful provision made for provincial as well as for central judicature¹. We learn from the lives of S. Thomas that the chancellor himself was constantly employed in hearing causes², and so great was the interest which Henry took in such matters that, on one occasion during the constant litigation in which the abbey of Battle was involved, the ordinary form of charter being insufficient for the emergency, the king himself drew up the document required³. It is almost certain then that some part of the legal reforms of the reign had been set on foot already, although the text of no formal document of the kind is now extant. The references made in the Constitutions of Clarendon to the system of recognitions and juries of presentment, seem to justify us in inferring that, whether or no these customs are rightly described as belonging to the reign of Henry I, there is the utmost probability that they had been recognised as part of the ordinary course of law since the beginning of the reign of Henry II, although not in the complete form which was given them in his later acts. In Normandy he had been active in the same way. In the beginning of the year 1160, having held his Christmas court at Falaise, he had ordained that no dean should accuse any man without the evidence of neighbours who bore a good character; and that in the treatment of all causes, the magistrates of the several districts at their monthly courts of the feudal party.

Disarming

Improvements in judicial procedure.

Similar reform in Normandy.

¹ 'Ordinatisque in eunctis regni finibus juris et legum ministris qui vel improborum audaciam coererent, vel interpellantibus secundum causarum merita justitiam exhiberent . . . Quoties autem, iudicibus mollius agentibus, provincialium queruoniis pulsabatur, provisionis regiae remedium adhibebat.' W. Newb. ii. c. i.

² Roger of Pontigny, Vita S. Thom. (ed. Giles), i. 102.

³ Chron. de Bello, p. 165.

Law
reforms.

should determine nothing without the witness of the neighbours, 'should do injustice to no man, inflict nothing to the prejudice of any, should maintain the peace, and punish all robbers summarily; and that the churches should enjoy their own in peace'.¹ It is improbable that England should not have felt the same innovating policy; but in the absence of distinct record it cannot be proved. And accordingly it is impossible to say with certainty that any of the known reforms of the reign were the work of the chancellor, whose influence during these early years was supreme with the king.

The year
1163.

139. As soon however as Henry returned to England after five years' absence, in January 1163, he began to apply to public business even more zealously than before. Early in March he is found in council, hearing the wearisome cause of Richard de Anesty, at London²; at the end of the month, at Windsor, he presided at the trial in which Henry of Essex the Constable was appealed for treason by Robert de Montfort, and having been defeated in trial by battle, forfeited his great inheritance³. After a hurried expedition into Wales, he was on the 1st of July at Woodstock, where the king of Scots and the princes and lords of Wales did homage to the heir, and where the king's first great trouble, the quarrel with Becket, began⁴.

History of Becket.

This famous person, who had been selected by Archbishop Theobald as the fittest adviser of the young king, was endowed with many brilliant and serviceable gifts. He was an able man of business, versatile, politic; liberal even to magnificence; well skilled in the laws of England, and not deficient in the accom-

¹ R. de Monte, A.D. 1160; Bouquet, xiii. 304. 'Rex Anglorum Henricus ad Natale Domini fuit apud Falesiam et leges instituit ut nullus decanus aliquam personam accusaret sine testimonio vicinorum circum manentium qui bonae vitae fama laudabiles haberentur. De causis similiter quorumlibet ventilandis instituit ut, cum iudices singularum provinciarum singulis mensibus ad minus simul convenirent, sine testimonio vicinorum nihil judicarent, injuriam nemini facerent, praedictum non irrogarent, pacem tenerent, latrones cunctos statim punirent, quaeque quiete tenerent ecclesiae sua jura possiderent.'

² Palgrave, Commonwealth, p. xxii.

³ Ibid.; R. de Monte, A.D. 1163. See also the Chronicle of Jocelin of Brakelond (ed. Camden Soc. pp. 50-52).

⁴ R. Diceto, c. 536.

plishments of either clerk or knight. His singular career illustrates at once the state of the clergy at the time and his own power of adapting himself, apparently with a good conscience, to each of the three great schools of public life in turn. The clergy of the Norman reigns may be arranged under three classes: there is the man of the thoroughly secular type, like Roger of Salisbury, a minister of state and a statesman, who has received high preferment in the Church as a reward for official services; there is the professional ecclesiastic, like Henry of Winchester, who looks to the interests of the Church primarily, whose public course is dictated by regard for clerical objects, who aims at a mediatorial position in the conflicts of the State, and who has close relations with the great ecclesiastical centre at Rome; and there is, thirdly, the man who, not less patriotic than the first and not less ecclesiastical than the second, acts on and lives up to higher principles of action, and seeks first and last what seems to him to be the glory of God. This last class is represented to some extent by Anselm; it is not numerous, and in an age of monastic sanctity and pretension is especially exposed to the intrusion of false brethren, such as the fanatic who is ambitious of martyrdom, or the hypocrite who will endure the risks of persecution provided he obtains the honour of popularity. Thomas Becket lived through all three phases, and friends and enemies to the present day debate to which of the two divisions of the last class his life and death assign him. His promotion to Canterbury put an end to the first act of his career. Until then he had been the chancellor, the lawyer, judge, financier, captain, and secretary of state. Now he became the primate, the champion of the clergy, the agent or patron of the Pope, whom he probably had persuaded Henry to recognise; the assertor of the rights of his Church and of his own constitutional position as first independent adviser of the Crown. The date at which he resigned the chancery is un-
Becket a representative man of three schools.
His alienation from the king.

certain, but it seems clear that, before Henry's return from France, he had made himself enemies among his former associates by demanding from them restitution of estates belonging to the see of Canterbury which, as he maintained, they held unjustly, and resentment.

Henry's

by otherwise asserting the temporal claims of his see¹. Henry was no doubt hurt by the resignation of the chancellor, but was scarcely prepared to find his late minister placing himself in an attitude of opposition which had no precedent in the history of the last hundred years. Anselm's quarrels arose from spiritual questions. Those of Thomas began on a purely secular point.

Dispute at Woodstock
on the revenue of 1163.

The account given by the contemporary writers of this first dispute is very obscure: it concerned however some question of taxation in which the king was anxious to make a change beneficial to the royal revenue. Every hide of land, we are told², paid to the sheriff two shillings annually, in consideration of his services in the administration and defence of the shire. This sum the king wished to have enrolled as part of the royal revenue, intending probably to reduce, as he afterwards did, the power of the sheriffs, or to remunerate them from some other fund. A tax so described can hardly have been anything else than the Danegeld, which was an impost of two shillings on the hide, and was collected by the sheriffs, being possibly compounded for at a certain rate, and paid by them into the Exchequer. As the Danegeld from this very year 1163 ceases to appear as a distinct item of account in the Pipe Rolls, it is impossible to avoid connecting the two ideas, even if we may not identify them. Whether the king's object in making this proposition was to collect the Danegeld in its full amount, putting an end to the nominal assessment which had been long in use, and so depriving the sheriffs of such profit as they made from it, or whether he had some other end in view, it is impossible now to determine; and consequently it is difficult to understand the position taken by the archbishop. 'We will not,' he is recorded to have said, 'my lord king, saving your good pleasure, give this money as revenue; but if the sheriffs and servants and ministers of the shires will perform their duties as they should, and maintain and defend our dependants, we will not be behindhand in contributing to their aid.' The king in anger answered, 'By the eyes of God, it shall be given as revenue, and it shall be entered in the king's accounts ; and you have no right to contradict ; no man wishes to oppress your men against your will.' Becket replied, ' My lord king, by the reverence of the eyes by which you have sworn, it shall not be given from my land, and from the rights of the Church not a penny !' We are not told further of the immediate result : but the king and his minister never met again as friends. This is, however the details may be understood, the first case of any opposition to the king's will in the matter of taxation which is recorded in our national history ; and it would seem to have been, formally at least, successful.

¹ Gervase, c. 1384.

² Grim, Vita S. Thom. i. 21; Roger of Pontigny, i. 113; Garnier, p. 65; Will. Cantuar. ii. 5.

Three months after, in October, in the council of Westminster, a fresh constitutional quarrel broke out. Ever since the Conqueror had divided the temporal and spiritual courts of justice, the treatment of criminal clerks had been a matter of difficulty ; the lay tribunals were prevented by the ecclesiastical ones from enforcing justice, and the ecclesiastical ones were able only to inflict spiritual penalties. The reasonable compromise which had been propounded by the Conqueror himself, in the injunction that the lay officials should enforce the judgments of the bishops ; had been rendered inefficacious by the jealousies of the two estates ; and the result was that in many cases grossly criminal acts of clerks escaped unpunished, and gross criminals eluded the penalty of their crimes by declaring themselves clerks. The fact that the king took up the question at this moment seems to show that he was already undertaking the reform of the criminal law which he carried into effect three years after. He proposed that the anomalous state of things should cease ; that clerical criminals should be tried in the ordinary courts of the country ; if they were convicted or confessed, they should be degraded by the bishops and delivered over to the executioners for condign punishment ³. Becket resisted ; it was sufficient that the criminal should be degraded ; if he offended again, he opposition to the king on a matter of taxation.

Becket's

Council of Westminster.

Dispute about the criminalous clerks.

¹ Grim. i. 22.

² See above, p. 283. If the excommunicated person was obdurate for forty days, the king issued a writ to the sheriff to seize him and compel him to satisfy the church. Rot. Cl. ii. 166.

³ Hoveden, i. 219 ; Gervase, c. 1384 ; Grim. i. 22 sq. ; R. Pontigny, i. 115 sq. ; Anon. Lambeth, ii. 88.

Henry complains of the extortion of the ecclesiastical courts.

Open quarrel.

Council at Clarendon.

Constitutions of Clarendon.

offended as a layman, and the king might take him; but the first punishment was sufficient for the first offence. The king on the same occasion complained heavily of the exactions of the ecclesiastical courts, and proposed to the assembled bishops that they should promise to abide by the customs which regulated those courts and the rights of the clergy generally, as they had been allowed in the days of his grandfather. The archbishop saw that to concede this unreservedly would be to place the whole of the clergy at the king's mercy: he prevailed on the bishops to assent 'saving their order,' and the king, irritated by the opposition, left the assembly in anger. Immediately after he ordered the archbishop to resign the honours of Eye and Berkhamsted which had been committed to him as chancellor¹.

After two or three unsatisfactory interviews with Becket, the king called together at Clarendon, in January 1164, the whole body of the bishops and barons². Again the archbishop was bidden to accept the customs in use under Henry I; and again he declined doing anything unconditionally. Then the king ordered that they should be reduced to writing, having been first ascertained by recognition. The recognitors, according to the formal record, were the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, and most noble and ancient men of the kingdom; according to the archbishop, Richard de Lucy the justiciar and Jocelin de Bailleul³, a French lawyer of whom little else is known, were the real authors of the document, which was presented as the result of the inquiry, and which has become famous under the name of the 'Constitutions of Clarendon.'

140. The Constitutions of Clarendon are sixteen in number, and purport to be, as may be inferred from their production, a codification of the usages of Henry I on the disputed points. They concern questions of advowson and presentation, churches in the king's gift, the trial of clerks, the security to be taken of

¹ Herbert of Bosham, iii. 111. He had held them since 1156, and probably from his first appointment as chancellor. Pipe Roll 2 Hen. II.

² 'Ex mandato regis, concurrentibus episcopis et proceribus.' R. Diceto, c. 536. Cf. Gervase, c. 1385; 'generale concilium;' W. Fitz-Stephen, i. 215.

³ Robertson, Becket, p. 97.

the excommunicated, the trial of laymen for spiritual offences, the excommunication of tenants-in-chief, the licence of the clergy to go abroad, ecclesiastical appeals which are not to go further than the archbishop without the consent of the king; questions of the title to ecclesiastical estates, the baronial duties of the prelates, the election to bishoprics and abbacies, the right of the king to the goods of felons deposited under the protection of the Church, and the ordination of villeins¹. Such of these as are of importance to our subject may be noticed elsewhere: it is enough at present to remark that, while some of the Constitutions only state in legal form the customs which had been adopted by the Conqueror and his sons, others of them seem to be developments or expansions of such customs in forms and with applications that belong to a much more advanced state of the law. The baronial status of the bishops is unreservedly asserted, the existence of the Curia Regis as a tribunal of regular resort, the right of the bishops to sit with the other barons in the Curia until a question of blood occurs, the use of juries of twelve men of the vicinity for criminal causes and for recognition of claims to land, all these are stated in such a way as to show that the jurisprudence of which they were a part was known to the country at large. Accordingly, the institution of the Great Assize—the edict by which the king empowered the litigant who wished to avoid the trial by battle to obtain a recognition of his right by inquest of jury—must be supposed to have been issued at an earlier period of the reign: and the use of the jury of accusation, which is mentioned in the Laws of Ethelred but only indistinctly traceable later, must have been revived before the year 1164. And if this be so, the Constitutions of Clarendon assume a character which the party statements of Becket's biographers have not allowed them. They are no mere engine of tyranny, or secular spite against a churchman: they are really a part of a great scheme of administrative reform, by which the debateable ground between the spiritual and temporal powers can be brought within the reach of common

Contents of the Constitutions.

Their importance as illustrating the progress of Henry's schemes for the reform of law.

¹ Gervase, cc. 1386, 1387; Select Charters, pp. 129-134.

The Consti-
tutions of Clarendon part of the general scheme.

justice, and the lawlessness arising from professional jealousies abolished. That they were really this, and not an occasional weapon of controversy, may be further inferred from the rapidity with which they were drawn up, the completeness of their form, and the fact that, notwithstanding the storm that followed, they formed the groundwork of the later customary practice in all such matters.

Becket's
reception of them.

To Becket however and his followers they presented themselves in no such light. The archbishop had come the year before from the council of Tours¹ in an excited state of mind, of which the council at Woodstock saw the first evidence. He best of all men must have known the beneficial effects which the kingdom at large had experienced from the king's legal measures. Yet he declared them to be incompatible with the freedom of the clergy. At last, moved by the entreaties of his brethren, whom the king's threats had frightened, he declared his acceptance of the Constitutions: but with so much reluctance and with so many circumstances on which no consistent testimony is attainable, that the impression given at the time was that he was temporising, if not dealing deceitfully. He sent immediately to ask the forgiveness of the pope, as having betrayed the interests of the Church².

Fatal
quarrel.

From this moment the intrigues of the archbishop's enemies, intrigues for which his own conduct had given the opportunity, although it afforded no justification, left him no rest. In vain he appealed to the king: Henry was too deeply wounded to forgive, and was too much determined on his own policy of reform to think of yielding; and the courtiers were resolved that no reconciliation should take place. In the following October a council was called at Northampton³, to which the ¹ May 19, 1163. Gervase, c. 1384.

² Robertson, Becket, pp. 101-103.

³ 'Convenerunt illuc episcopi, comites, barones totius regni, mandato regis urgente.' R. Dic. c. 537. 'Solemne statuens celebrare concilium, omnes qui de rege tenerent in capite mandari fecit; citatus est et archiepiscopus.' Grim. i. 39. 'Generale concilium.' W. Fitz-Steph. i. 218. 'Episcopus et abbates, comites etiam et proceres, et omnes officiales suos, omnesque omnino qui alicujus essent auctoritatis vel nominis.' Roger of Pontigny, i. 132.

archbishop was summoned, not, as was the custom, by the first summons issued specially to him as the first counsellor of the crown, but by a common summons addressed to the sheriff of Kent and ordering him to cite the archbishop to answer the claims of John the Marshal¹. At that council his ruin was completed: he was overwhelmed by the king's demand that he should produce the accounts of the chancery, and by the charges of his enemies. In despair of justice, in fear of his life, or in the new ambition of finishing the third phase of his career by exile or martyrdom, he fled from Northampton and soon after took refuge in France, where, partly by threats of spiritual punishment, partly by intrigues, and partly by invoking the legal interference of a pope who had little sympathy with his sufferings, he conducted a struggle which fills the chronicles of the next six years.

Council of Northampton, October, 1164.

Becket goes into exile.

During the greatest part of this time Henry also was absent from England. He paid a hurried visit to Normandy in 1165, and on his return made his third expedition to Wales. Early in 1166 he held a council of the clergy at Oxford², and a great assembly of the bishops and baronage at Clarendon³. He had just negotiated a marriage for his eldest daughter with Henry the Lion Duke of Saxony, who was now in close alliance with Frederick Barbarossa, and was supposed to be intending to join the party of the antipope. Harassed by the attacks of Becket, in want of money for the dowry of his daughter, invited by the emperor to join the schismatic party, committed to it by his own envoys, and drawn back from such a gross mistake by Earl Robert of Leicester the justiciar, who refused the kiss of peace to the Henry's movements, 1164-1166.

¹ W. Fitz-Stephen, i. 220.

² R. Diceto, c. 539; Ann. Theokesb. (ed. Luard), p. 49; W. Newb. ii. c. 13. This council is sometimes misdated, as if it belonged to 1160 or 1161. But the king was abroad in those years, and the direct evidence of Ralph de Diceto is amply sufficient to fix the year.

³ This assembly is mentioned by Grim, and Roger of Pontigny, as one in which an oath was exacted from the bishops that they would not appeal to the pope. Vit. S. Thom. i. 55, 156. The Pipe Rolls for the year mention the king's residence at Clarendon, and give several payments made for wine, carriage, fish, etc.; as well as for wax to seal the summonses, for the conduct of approvers, and for the wages of the summoners. See Bened. Pet. ii. pref. lxi.

archbishop of Cologne when acting as the imperial ambassador¹, Henry showed himself still the master of the situation. It is to this period that we owe the Assize of Clarendon, which remodelled the provincial administration of justice, and the valuable series of documents which are contained in the Black Book of the Exchequer. Immediately after the council of Clarendon the king went to France, where he was employed in the acquisition of Brittany and in counteracting the intrigues of Becket until March, 1170. In these years he lost some of his oldest counsellors; the empress and Geoffrey de Mandeville in 1167, Earl Robert of Leicester in 1168, and Bishop Nigel of Ely in 1169. He had however now gained sufficient experience in affairs to be independent of his ministers—he never again submitted to the advice of a friend such as Becket had been; and in the family of the old ministers of the Exchequer he found a number of trained clerks who, without aspiring to influential places in the government, were skilful and experienced in every department of ministerial work. Bishop Nigel had left a son for whom he had purchased the reversion of his own office of treasurer, Richard Fitz-Neal, the author of the Dialogus de Scaccario, afterwards bishop of London. Another of his clerks, probably a kinsman, earned an unhappy notoriety during the Becket quarrel as Richard of Ilchester²; he was a man of consummate skill in diplomacy as well as finance, acted as justiciar of Normandy, and was constantly employed as a justice and baron of the Exchequer at home. The office of chancellor was not filled up during Becket's life, John of Oxford, another of his personal opponents, acting as protonotary, vice-chancellor or keeper of the seal. The office of justiciar was retained by Richard de Lucy, whose fidelity to the king, notwithstanding his

The Assize of Clarendon, 1166.

The king chooses new ministers.

¹ R. Diceto, c. 539.

² Richard of Ilchester was a writer or clerk in the Curia and Exchequer from the beginning of the reign of Henry II; Pipe Roll, pp. 30, 31, 98. He became archdeacon of Poitiers before 1164, and was made bishop of Winchester in 1174. His illegitimate son, Herbert bishop of Salisbury, was called Pauper or le Poor, a name which belonged peculiarly to the family of Roger of Salisbury the justiciar. So that it is most probable that Richard was a kinsman of Nigel, whose son, the bishop of London, speaks of him with great respect in the Dialogus de Scaccario. He was a kinsman also of Gilbert Foliot; S. T. C. V. 291.

devotion to the memory of Becket¹, and his frank determination, where he could, to assert the rights of the nation, earned him the honourable title of Richard de Lucy the Loyal².

141. The credit of having drawn up the Assize of Clarendon³ must be divided between the king and his advisers. Whether or no it owes some part of its importance to the loss of the legal enactments that had preceded it, it is the most important document of the nature of law, or edict, that has appeared since the Conquest; and whether it be regarded in its bearing on legal history, or in its ultimate constitutional results, it has the greatest interest. The council in which it was passed is described as consisting of the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and barons of all England; Becket however was not present, and the assembly probably, among its minor acts, issued some sentence against him and his relations. The Assize however contains no mention of him. It is arranged in twenty-two articles, which were furnished to the judges about to make a general provincial visitation⁴. Of these the first six describe the manner in which the presentment of criminals to the courts of the justices or the sheriff is henceforth to be made. Inquest is to be held, and juries of twelve men of the hundred, and four men of the township, are to present all persons accused of felony by public report; these are to go to the ordeal, and to fare as that test may determine. By the other articles all men are

The Assize of Clarendon.

Its contents.

The jury of presentment.

¹ He founded the abbey of Lesnes in Kent in honour of the martyr, and became a canon there after his resignation. Ben. Pet. i. 238; Mon. Angl. vi. 456.

² Jordan Fantosme (ed. Michel), p. 70.

³ The Assize of Clarendon was long known only through the Assize of Northampton, published ten years later: it was first printed by Sir F. Palgrave, Commonwealth, pp. clxvi-clxxi. It will be found, edited from a better MS., in Select Charters, pp. 134-139; also in my edition of Benedict of Peterborough, vol. ii. app. pp. cxlix-cliv; Hoveden, ii. cii-cv, 248-252. It has not unnaturally been confused with the Constitutions of Clarendon; and even Gervase, who was a contemporary, describes the Assize of Northampton as a reenactment of the act of Clarendon: 'Pro cujus execrandis institutis beatus martyr Thomas Cantuariensis usque in septennium exulavit.' c. 1433. The Assize and the Constitutions have nothing in common.

⁴ This Assize seems to be referred to in the Dialogus de Scaccario, ii. c. 10: as 'arctior assisa quam rex propter sceleratos constituit;' and 'Regia constitutio quae est pro bono pacis.' Ibid.

Articles of inquiry under the Assize.

directed to attend the county courts, and to join, if required, in these presentments¹; no franchise is to exclude the justices, and no one may entertain a stranger for whom he will not be responsible before them; an acknowledgment made before the hundred court cannot be withdrawn before the justices²; even the result of the ordeal is not to save from banishment the man of bad character who has been presented by the inquest; one sheriff is to assist another in the pursuit and capture of fugitives. The sessions of the justices are to be held in full county court. Two curious articles touching the ecclesiastical relations of the State follow; no convent or college is to receive any of the mean people into their body without good testimony as to character, and the heretics condemned at the recent council of Oxford are to be treated as outlaws. The Assize is to hold good so long as the king shall please.

Its importance as a legal monument.

In this document we may observe several marks of the permanence of the old common law of the country. Not only is the agency of the shire-moot and hundred-moot—the four best men of the township, and the lord with his steward—applied to the carrying out of the edict, but the very language of the ancient laws touching strangers and fugitive felons is repeated³. The inquest itself may be native or Norman, but there is no doubt as to the character of the machinery by which it is to be carried out. In the article which directs the admission of the justices into every franchise may be detected one sign of the anti-feudal policy which the king had all his life to maintain.

It is carried out by a judicial cyre.

The visitation was carried out in the spring and summer of 1166; two justices, the earl of Essex and Richard de Lucy, travelled over the whole country⁴, and the proceeds of their investigations swell the accounts of the Pipe Roll of the year to an unusual size. The enormous receipts under the heads of ¹ 'Homines de Tichesoura debent v. marcas quia noluerunt jurare assisam regis.' Pipe Roll of 1166.

² Compare this with Glanvill, lib. viii. c. 9. It seems to be the first mention of the distinction of a court of record from one not of record.

³ Compare with the clause about strangers, the Laws of Edward the Confessor, c. 23; Canute, Sec. 28; William I, i. 48; Henry I, 8, § 5.

⁴ In eighteen counties assizes were held by Richard de Lucy, who was accompanied by the earl of Essex in seventeen out of the number.

placita¹, the chattels of those who failed in the ordeal², fines exacted from the men who refused to swear under the king's assize³, the goods of those hanged under the Assize of Clarendon⁴, the expenses of the gaols which the Assize ordered to be built or to be put in good repair⁵, mark the accounts of this and several succeeding years. These entries, which have nothing corresponding with them in the rolls of the earlier years, seem to suggest the conclusion that the act from which they resulted was really a great measure of innovation; an attempt to invigorate the local administration of justice, and the initiative measure of a newly-developed principle of judicial process; a distinct step forwards in the policy of bringing the royal jurisdiction into close connexion with the popular courts, and thus training the nation to the concentration of the powers of the people in the representative parliaments of later ages.

Strict enforcement.

The immediate results of the Assize were by no means transient; the visitation of 1166 was followed by an itinerant survey of the forests in 1167, and in 1168 by a thorough circuit of the shires⁶, held by the barons of the Exchequer mainly for the purpose of collecting the aid which Henry demanded for the marriage of his eldest daughter. It is not improbable that the discussion of this aid took place in the council of Clarendon in 1166⁷, for Henry was not in England between that date and the time when the money was collected; but it is possible that it was taken as a matter of course under the recognised feudal principle Subsequent measures of provincial jurisdiction.

¹ Some extracts will be found in Madox, Hist. Exch. pp. 235, 236.

² 'De catallis fugitivorum et eorum qui perierunt in iudicio aquae.' Roll of 1166: this entry occurs in a large number of counties.

³ See above, p. 469: cf. p. 397 above.

⁴ 'De catallis fugitivorum et suspensorum per assisam de Clarendon.' Roll of 1169.

⁵ The expenses of gaols at Canterbury, Rochester, Huntingdon, Cambridge, Sarum, Malmesbury, Aylesbury, and Oxford are accounted for in the Roll of 1166.

⁶ Alan de Nevill held the forest courts in 1167; in 1168 the barons who took the aid were Richard of Ilchester, Reginald of Warene, William Basset, and Guy the dean of Waltham; besides these, Richard de Lucy acted in Yorkshire and Cumberland, Henry Fitz-Gerold in Kent, and William Fitz-John in Dorset and Somerset. Roll of 1168.

⁷ The purchase of a hutch, 'Una luchia ad custodiendas cartas baronum de militibus' (Roll of 1166), would seem to fix the date of the documents preserved in the Liber Niger; Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 400.

The aid of 1108.

in such cases. The assessment was one mark on the knight's fee¹; and the number of knights' fees on which it was assessed was certified by the landholders themselves. The collection of the money occupied the barons for two years², and, as appears from the action of the next year, did not satisfy the king, whilst it called forth great complaints on the part of the people. The visitation of the barons was used for judicial as well as financial purposes, the sheriffs had great opportunities of enforcing justice as well as of making perquisites, and the exaction following so close on the severe assize of 1166 led men not unreasonably to regard the mechanism employed for the repression of crime as one of a series of expedients for increasing the receipts of the Exchequer. The murmurs of the people reached the king in Normandy; and he had by this time other reasons for paying a visit to England.

Complaints
of the people.

Proposal to crown the heir, in 1170.

142. He was now thoroughly weary of the Becket controversy, and the pertinacious underhand hostility of Lewis VII. He had succeeded in compelling the Bretons to submit to Geoffrey his third son, whom he had married to the heiress of Count Conan; and he was anxious to obtain for his son Henry the right to govern England as viceroy or sharer in the rights of the crown, which could be conferred only by the rite of coronation. With this object in view he returned in March, 1170, and held a great court at Easter at Windsor, and another immediately after at London. In this second assembly, which coincided probably with the Easter session of the Exchequer, he, by an extraordinary act of authority, removed all the sheriffs of the kingdom from their offices, and issued a commission of inquiry into their receipts, which was to report to him on the 14th of June, the day fixed for the coronation of the younger Henry³. The commission of inquiry, the text of which is extant, contains thirteen articles, which specify both the matters to be investigated and the particular method by which the information is to sheriffs.

Inquest of

¹ Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 398.

² The same officers acted as in 1168, with the addition of John Cumin, afterwards archbishop of Dublin, and Gervase of Cornhill.

³ Bened. Pet. i. 5.

be obtained. The barons to whom it is intrusted are to take the oaths of all the barons, knights, and freeholders of each county, and to receive their evidence as to the receipts of the sheriffs and the whole staff of their servants, of the bishops and the whole host of their temporal officers, of all the special administrators of the royal demesne, of the itinerant officers of the Exchequer, and of all others who have had the opportunity of touching the public money: in particular, inquiry is to be made into the execution of the Assize of Clarendon, whether it has been justly carried out, and whether the officers employed in it have taken bribes or hush-money; into the collection of the aid pur fille marier, and into the profits of the forests: a supplementary article directs inquiry into the cases in which homage due to the king and his son has not been paid¹. The great amount of business which thus accrued could not be dispatched in so short a time by the same staff of officers; the inquest was taken by twelve 'Barons errant,' clerk and lay, in the counties nearest London, and by similar large commissions in the more distant shires; they were probably composed mainly of the baronage of the district, who would naturally scrutinize with some jealousy the proceedings of both the sheriffs and the judges². The result was apparently the acquittal of the officials: whether or no this was obtained by purchase³, no further proceedings were taken against them, but the sheriffs were not restored to their sheriffdoms, and had no further opportunity given them of making their office a stepping-stone to greater wealth

Use of the jury.

Articles of inquest.

Removal of the sheriffs.

¹ Gervase, c. 1410; Bened. Pet. ii. clvi sq.; Select Charters, pp. 140 sq. On the points of likeness between this document and the instructions given to the Karolingian Missi, see below, chap. xiii. p. 613.

² Gervase gives the names of the commissioners for the counties of Kent, Surrey, Middlesex, Berkshire, Oxford, Buckingham, and Bedford:—the abbots of S. Augustine's and Chertsey; the earl of Clare, William of Avranches, Manasser of Dammartin, Gerold Fitz-Ralph, Gilbert de Pinkeni, William Fitz-Helton, William Fitz-Neal, William Fitz-Martin, Ralph of the Hospital, and Ralph de Dene. In Warwickshire and Leicestershire Walter de Insula and Eustace Fitz-Stephen acted 'de Inquisitione Vicecomitum Angliæ.' Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 97.

³ William Basset, who had been sheriff of Leicestershire, owed in the 19th year of Henry II 100 marks 'pro fine quem fecit cum rege de jurata facta super eum de Inquisitione Vicecomitum Angliæ.' Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 97.

New
sheriffs.

and position¹. Henry placed in their vacant magistracies the officers of the Exchequer whom he knew and trusted ; adopting in this respect the plan of his grandfather, who had used his judges for sheriffs, although he avoided throwing too many of the counties into any single hand : the Curia Regis and the shire thus are brought together closer than ever, whilst a blow is struck at the local influence of the feudal lords.

Coronation
of the young king.

The Whitsuntide of 1170 was however marked by a more critical event than the inquest of sheriffs. The heir was crowned as Henry III ; the ceremony was performed not by Thomas of Canterbury, but by Roger of York, and the wife of the young king was not crowned with him. This act, which was intended by Henry as a sign and seal of power, was a most unfortunate mistake. He had, not unnaturally, supposed that it would strengthen the supreme authority to have in each division of his dominions a sufficient representative of royal majesty² : he found that he had placed a dangerous weapon in the hands of an undutiful son : the minor irregularities of the coronation-day roused his enemies to frenzy ; Thomas Becket asserted that the rights of Canterbury, of the English Church, of Christianity itself, were outraged by Archbishop Roger's intrusion ; and Lewis VII, hurt at the neglect of his daughter, and backed by the support of the family of Champagne, who combined careful orthodoxy with intense hatred of the house of Anjou, urged the pope to put the kingdom under interdict. Before these invitations took effect, Henry, alarmed as he might well be, hastened into France, reconciled his long quarrel with the archbishop, and authorised his return. Becket returned in December, excommunicated the opposing bishops, provoked the king to utter his angry and hasty wish to be rid of him, and expiated his imprudent and unchristian violence by a cruel death, on the 29th of December, 1170.

It produces a crisis in the Becket quarrel.

Murder of the archbishop.

¹ The Chronicle of Benedict, i. 5, says that some of the sheriffs were shortly after replaced ; but an examination of the lists of the sheriffs, given in the thirtieth Report of the Deputy-Keeper, shows that it was done in very few cases, and that none of the sheriffs now removed were employed again, except those who were members of the Curia Regis, as Ranulf Glanvill and William Basset.

² Benedict, i. 132.

He was at once hailed as a martyr by Lewis VII and the count of Chàmpagne; the monks of Canterbury were ready to accept him as their patron saint after death, although they had cared little about him during his life: the tide of miracle began to flow immediately, and with it the tide of treason and disaffection around the person of the king.

143. Henry's anger and horror at the murder of the archbishop—an act which showed in its perpetrators not only great brutality, but a profound disregard for the king's reputation and for the public safety—urged him to apply at once in self-defence to Rome. That done, he must keep out of the way of the hostile legation which had been dispatched to Normandy. He collected his forces in the duchy, crossed to England in August, 1171, and thence to Ireland, where he remained, receiving the homages of the bishops and princes of that divided country, until he heard that the legates who were sent to absolve him had arrived in Normandy. This was in March, 1172. On receiving the news he returned as rapidly as he had come, made his submission to the papal representatives, clearing himself by oath of all complicity in the death of Becket, renouncing the Constitutions of Clarendon, and swearing adhesion to Alexander III against the antipope. The submission was completed at Avranches in September¹. As one portion of the pacification, the younger Henry was crowned a second time, on this occasion in company with his wife, at Winchester instead of Westminster, and by the archbishop of Rouen instead of the archbishop of York². The long storm seemed to have ended in a profound calm. The king found time to demand a scutage from those barons who had not joined him in his Irish expedition³, and set to work with characteristic elasticity on a scheme for a marriage of his youngest son John with the heiress of Maurienne.

144. But the momentary quiet was preparatory to the real Rebellion.

¹ See Benedict, i. 31, 32; Hoveden, ii. 35-39; and p. 561 below.

² Bened. i. 31. The queen was anointed as well as crowned: the young king was crowned only.

³ Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 438: 'De scutagio militum qui non abierunt in Hiberniam nec denarios nec milites pro se miserunt.'

Causes of the rebellion of 1173.

burst of the storm, which had been long gathering in regions far more dangerous to Henry's power than the council-chamber of the pope. The long strain of the Becket quarrel had worn out his patience, and the humiliation which attended the visit of the legates placed him before his barons in a position which no English sovereign had yet filled. He had become irritable and exacting, had alienated his wife, and failed to secure the love of his children. His very measures of reform had arrayed against him the many whose interests were affected by his reforms. A conspiracy against his life, contrived by Adam de Port, was discovered¹. The feudal spirit was ready for its opportunity, which Lewis VII was eager to make. The old men who remembered Stephen's time were passing away, and the young ones were looking forward to the rule of a new generation. The Maurienne negotiation was the spark that set the mass of disaffection in flame. The king's proposition, that a proper provision should be made for John, was opposed by his eldest son: he demanded a substantive share in the administration of the government; he would have England or Normandy to himself, or at least some territory of his own where he and his wife might be a real king and queen². That he was prompted by Lewis VII and encouraged by promises of the lords of Normandy, England, and Anjou, the historian of the time distinctly asserts³; and the result gives some probability to the statement, although it is not probable that in England an actual conspiracy of any wide extent was on foot. At Midlent, 1173, the young Henry fled from his father, and went at once to Lewis. The king immediately suspected treason, and set the castles of Normandy in a condition of defence. No time was lost on either side. Lewis called a council at Paris, in which he proposed to assist the young king to dethrone his father, and found a ready assent from the counts of Flanders, Boulogne, and Blois: the king of Scots, his brother David, and Hugh Bigod the earl of Norfolk, also undertook to support him, and received the promise of extensive honours to be

The young king refuses John a provision.

League against
Henry II.

¹ Adam would not stand his trial, and was outlawed, but restored a few years after; Bened. i. 35. He joined the rebels in 1173; J. Fantosme, p. 62.

² Bened. i. 41.

³ Ibid. p. 42.

bestowed if the rebellion were successful¹. Each of the allies had a different ground of offence: the count of Boulogne had a claim on Mortain—he had married the daughter of Stephen, and Henry had tried to purchase his rights over the Norman county; the counts of Blois and Flanders, besides their ancestral hatred to Normandy and their pious indignation on behalf of the martyr, had each his own private grudge; Henry had spared no man's interest in his determination to round off his territorial boundaries.

The war broke out in June; and the news of the invasion of Normandy provoked an immediate rebellion in England. The English earls had watched with disgust Henry's progressive measures for the extinction of feudal power. Their castles had been taken from them, their franchises invaded, their military service exacted or money taken in commutation: every advantage that the feudal obligation gave to the king he had used, but he had allowed them no liberty of tyranny in return. The most influential amongst them had still very great interests in Normandy: the Earl of Leicester had the great fief of Breteuil; the earl of Chester was hereditary viscount of Avranches and Bayeux; William of Aumâle, the son of that Stephen who had been set up as a competitor against William Rufus, had both his lordship of Holderness and his great Norman county. Others had the fancied wrongs of a century to avenge; the Bigods and the Mowbrays, who had risen on the ruins of earlier feudatories, longed to realise their strength and consolidate their local power; the king of Scots, William the Lion, and his brother David, united the grudges of jealous neighbourhood with those of national dislike and feudal discontent. The English rebellion comprised nearly all that portion of the baronage which inherited the traditions of the Conquest and the ancient Norman spirit. It was a Norman rebellion on English soil. They hated Henry as count of Anjou not less heartily than they feared him as king of England.

Henry's
enemies in France.

Outbreak of war in June, 1173.

Henry's enemies in England.

The English
war was a rebellion
of the Normans.

¹ Bened. i. 44, 45; Jordan Fantosme (Surtees Society), pp. 2-6, 15. The latter writer, who was a contemporary, describes a debate held by the king of Scots before waging war in 'sun plenier parlement,' an early use of the word; p. 14.

War in France.

The war of 1173 began in France. The count of Flanders invaded Normandy from the north, and took Amâle and its count, too easily for the credit of the latter; Lewis invaded it from the south-east, and besieged Verneuil; the earl of Chester at the same time raised Brittany in revolt. Henry, who had an army of 10,000 Brabançon mercenaries in his pay¹, marched to the relief of Verneuil, and drove Lewis out of the country: he then moved with the utmost rapidity on Brittany, and took the earl of Chester, with a host of Breton nobles, prisoners at Dol. This energetic defence induced Lewis and the disobedient sons to propose peace; but in the intervals of negotiation Henry made the best use of his time; he brought Vendôme to submission, and had completely humbled his enemies before Christmas.

Henry's
victories.

War in England.

The faithful
earls.

In England the struggle began later, and was practically decided without the king's personal intervention. The government was still in the hands of Richard de Lucy: of the great earls, William de Mandeville of Essex was faithful; so also were William of Arundel the husband of Queen Adeliza, Reginald of Cornwall the king's uncle, and Hamelin of Warenne the king's brother; so too were Strongbow the conqueror of Ireland, and the earls of Salisbury, Warwick, and Northampton, but these earls were by no means a match in power or position for those of Chester, Leicester, and Derby². The earl of Gloucester, the king's cousin, tried to avoid taking part in the struggle. All the bishops on both sides the water were faithful, except Arnulf of Lisieux and Hugh of Durham, who tried to temporise³. Two of the faithful earls, those of Essex and Arundel, were with the king in France; and the defence of the country fell chiefly on the justiciar, who, on hearing that the war had broken out in Normandy, determined to strike the first blow. In July, accompanied by the earl of Cornwall, he besieged Leicester, where the officers of the earl had set up the standard of revolt, and burned the town, but failed

Proceedings
of the justiciar
in 1173.

¹ Benedict, i. 51.

² The list of the king's supporters is given in one of the MSS. of Benedict (vol. i. p. 51).

³ Jord. Fantosme, pp. 26, 73.

to take the castle. Leaving a force to continue the siege, the justiciar, this time in company with Humfrey Bohun the constable, advanced on Berwick, where they were detained until September, when the earl of Leicester with his wife and a large force of Flemings landed in Norfolk, and was welcomed by Hugh Bigod. On this news the justiciar hastened southwards and, having been joined by the earls of Cornwall and Arundel, defeated and took prisoner the earl and countess at Fornham, where more than 10,000 of the Flemish mercenaries were slain. The prisoners were sent to the king, who now had in his own hands the two of his enemies who were most dangerous to him ¹.

War in the north.

Capture of the earl of Leicester.

The contest however was not over. Early in 1174 the king of Scots invaded Northumberland, sent his brother David to the relief of Leicester, and reduced the border fortresses one by one to surrender. Roger Mowbray who held the castles of Thirsk, Malessart, and Axholm, and the earl of Ferrers who had fortified Tutbury and Duffield, co-operated with the earl of Leicester's knights and with Hugh Bigod, who was ravaging his own county with another Flemish army. Norwich and Nottingham were burned by the rebels, and Northampton, in spite of the gallant defence of the townsmen, was plundered ². The justiciar was detained in middle England, apparently uncertain against which of the enemies he should march first ³, and employed himself in besieging Huntingdon: he could not leave the country unsettled behind him; the king of Scots might be in Northumberland, but the younger Henry and Philip of Flanders with a great fleet were waiting for a fair wind at Gravelines; the king had his hands full in Poitou; the count of Bar had landed with mercenaries at Hartlepool, and it was uncertain which side the great Hugh de Puiset, bishop of Durham, and the most magnificent lord of the whole north country, was about to take ⁴.

Invasion of the north in 1174.

Conduct of Hugh Bigod

Threatened invasion from Flanders.

¹ Benedict, i. 58-62; Jordan Fantosme, pp. 45-50.

² J. Fantosme. pp. 53 sq.

³ Ibid. pp. 38, 40.

⁴ Benedict, i. 64, 65.

Fidelity of the York-shiremen.

Capture of the king of Scots.

Prowess of the bishop-elect of Lincoln.

Arrival of
the king.
Aug. 7, 1174.

Submission of the rebels.

Peace,
Sept. 30.

secured by the fidelity of the people. The barons of Yorkshire and the whole force of the county rallied round the sheriff, Robert Stuteville; Archbishop Roger sent his vassals under his constable, Robert de Thilli; Ranulf Glanvill, William de Vesey, and Bernard of Balliol brought up their knights; and the assembled army overtook King William at Alnwick, took him by surprise, and captured him with the leading men of his court. In Lincolnshire, Geoffrey, the king's natural son, the bishop-elect of Lincoln, collected the army of the shire and took Axholm; he then marched into Yorkshire, where, his force increasing as he proceeded, he captured the other castles of the Mowbrays¹. In the meantime the king himself had arrived. Immediately on landing he went on pilgrimage to Canterbury, where he arrived on the day that the king of Scots was captured: at the head of his Brabançons he hastened to London, and thence to Huntingdon, which surrendered immediately. From Huntingdon he moved against Hugh Bigod, in whom now the rebellion centred. The veteran conspirator saw that the contest was hopeless; without a battle he made his submission to the king at Seleham, and surrendered his castles: a week after the bishop of Durham arrived, and by a like submission and surrender obtained permission for his nephew, the count of Bar, to leave the kingdom with his forces: the same day the constables of the earl of Leicester, Roger Mowbray and the earl Ferrers, surrendered their fortresses, and the struggle was over in England. The king returned hastily to relieve Rouen which his son was besieging, but his short stay had been enough to prove that the opportunity of his enemies was over. Peace was made in September².

The importance of this struggle, the last which the feudal baronage undertook in arms against the royal power, may excuse some amount of detail³. The result in France may testify to the skill and energy of Henry: the result in England

¹ Benedict, i. 65-69.

² Ibid. 72-79.

³ 'Seignurs, en la meie fei, merveille est mult grant
Par quei li suen demene le vunt si demenant,
Le plus honorable e le plus conquerant Que fust en nule terre puis le tens Moysant, testifies chiefly to the constitutional hold which he had obtained on the body of the nation, on the Church, and on the newer, less thoroughly Norman, portion of the baronage. The great earls had indeed conducted their revolt as if they had never intended to be successful. They had had no settled plan, no watchword, no cry by which they could attract the people. They trod in the very footsteps of the rebel earls under William Rufus and Henry I, and they shared in their evil fortune, more happy than they in that they had to deal with a more politic and more merciful conqueror. The bishops had stood firmly on the king's side, with the exception of Hugh de Puiset, whose temporising policy had redounded to his own confusion. The free men of town and country had been faithful at a great cost. Norwich, Nottingham, and Northampton had paid dearly for their fidelity, for the earls, where they had the power, burned and ravaged the towns with twofold satisfaction. The shires had contributed their force willingly, and had done good work. The baronage which had sprung up since the beginning of the century from the families promoted and enriched by Henry I, which in many cases were free from the influence of Norman connexion,—possessing no Norman lands, and unaffected by Norman prepossessions, which was learning the benefit of law and social security, and being amalgamated day by day in sympathy and hopes with the bulk of the English people,—the baronage too had shown both faith and gratitude. The administration itself, the justiciar and his subordinates, had proved equal to the strain: there was no treason among the ministers; and if they had shown some symptoms of weakness, it was owing to the sudden and bewildering character of the revolt.

The result of the struggle to be attributed chiefly to the faithfulness of the English people.

Henry's victory was so complete that he could afford to be generous¹; he saw that his true policy was not to revenge himself by executions and confiscations, but, whilst he turned Henry's clemency.

Fors sule ient li reis Charle, ki poesté fud grant
Par les dudze cumpaignuns Olivier e Rodlant.'

JORDAN FANTOSME, p. 6.

¹ Dialogus de Scaccario, ii. c. 2: 'Contra numerosam hostium multitudinem solius Divinae gratiae magnitudo subvenit, et quasi pugnante pro se Domino, sic in brevi pene rebelles omnes obtinuit ut longe fortius quam prius, ex eo quo infirmari debuit, confirmaretur in regno.

Politic clemency.

his enemies into friends by his mercy, to disarm them effectually. He kept a tight hand on their castles, many of which he dismantled¹; he probably exacted considerable sums by way of ransom; but he shed no blood and seized no inheritances.

Henry stays
in England
during 1175
and 1176.

145. He took further advantage of his practical supremacy in the country to go on with the work of organisation which he had begun; and one result of the rebellion was his more continuous residence in England. After his return from France in 1175 he stayed two whole years in the country; holding constant councils and enforcing fresh measures of consolidation. He had now filled up the episcopal sees that had been vacant since the Becket quarrel; Richard of Ilchester and John of Oxford had become bishops of Winchester and Norwich: the chancellorship, which had long been in abeyance or in commission, was given to Ralph de Warneville, treasurer of York, who lived in Normandy and discharged his duties by means of a vice-chancellor, Walter of Contances². The reality of the king's reconciliation with the Church was exhibited by his attendance with his son at an ecclesiastical council held by the new archbishop, Richard of Dover, at Westminster, the week after his arrival, in May 1175. That Whitsuntide he held his royal court at Reading³, where he compelled the earl of Gloucester to surrender the castle of Bristol, and showed his consciousness of his own strength by severely enforcing the forest-law against the barons. After a conference with the Welsh princes at Gloucester⁴, in which he forced them and the border

. . . Tam enormis sceleris inceptoribus inaudita pepercit misericordia, ut eorum pauci rerum suarum, nulli vero status sui vel corporum dispendia sustinerent.

¹ Will. Newb. ii. c. 38. The series of measures touching the castles runs over several years. Orders were given for dismantling them immediately after the war; R. Diceto, c. 585. These were carried out in 1176; Bened. i. 121, 124, 126 (see below, pp. 484, 485). On the restoration of the earls in 1177 their castles were still retained in the king's hands (Bened. i. 134, 135). The same year all the royal castles in the north changed their officers (Bened. i. 160), and shortly after (ibid. i. 178) the council advised the king to keep in hand those of the bishop of Durham.

² R. Dic. c. 567. He held it till 1181, when the king gave it to his son Geoffrey.

³ 'Curiam et festum regium.' Bened. i. 91, 92.

⁴ 'Magnum tenuerunt concilium apud Gloucestriam.' Bened. i. 92.

barons to swear peace, he held a great council at Woodstock ¹, Councils of 1175. where he filled up the vacant abbacies, and issued an edict by which the persons who had been lately in arms against him were forbidden to come to court without a summons; no one was to remain at the court between sunset and sunrise without permission; and no one on this side the Severn was to wear arms as a part of his ordinary habit; men had gone about with bows and arrows and sharp knives too long ². Thence he went at Lichfield, to Lichfield, where he hanged four knights for the murder of a forester: thence to Nottingham, where he held a great visita- at Notting- tion of the forests, and, notwithstanding the expostulation of the justiciar, exacted large sums as fines for the waste of the vert and venison, which he had himself during the war authorised his supporters to destroy ³. This conduct, which was in itself unjustifiable, was probably provoked by the extravagance with which the permission had been used. He next went to at York, York, to receive the submission of the Scots and the homage promised by the king at the peace of Falaise. In October he at Windsor. held a great council at Windsor ⁴, and concluded a treaty with the king of Connaught. Immediately after Christmas he called Assize of North- a great council at Northampton, in which he renewed and am- ampton. plified the Assize of Clarendon ⁵.

The state of the kingdom since the death of Becket had been so unsettled, that the measures which the inquest into the conduct of the sheriffs was intended to promote must necessarily have been suspended: but the administration had not for one moment been disturbed in its ordinary course. The Taxes of 1172 and 1173. king had exacted the scutage for the Irish expedition in 1172, and in 1173 six detachments of Exchequer officers had taken a tallage throughout the country, and held courts of justice at

¹ 'Magnum coram praedictis regibus celebraverunt [episcopi] concilium.' Bened. i. 93.

² Ibid.: 'In ipso autem concilio praecepit rex publico edicto,' &c.

³ Ibid. p. 94.

⁴ Ibid. p. 101: 'Congregatis apud Windeshovers . . . archiepiscopo Cantuariensi et episcopis Angliae et comitibus et baronibus terrae suae.'

⁵ 'Magnum concilium de statutis regni.' Bened. i. 107. 'Coram episcopis, comitibus, baronibus, militibus et aliis hominibus suis.' R. Diceto, c. 588.

Visitation
of 1175.

the same time¹. The next year, a year of war, left no time for judicial business, but in 1175 the shires were visited by justices again. Each year's account presents a different arrangement of circuits, or a different staff of judges. The Assize of Northampton placed this jurisdiction on a more permanent footing.

Assize of Northampton.

The Assize of Northampton was issued in January, 1176², and formed, like that of Clarendon, a body of instructions for the itinerant justices. It contains thirteen articles, many of them marked by a severity which contrasts unfavourably with the character of the earlier document, but which was no doubt called for by the condition in which the country had been left

New instructions of the itinerant justices.

by the late war. The punishment of felons is made more cruel than before; stringent measures are directed against fugitives and outlaws, and the manner of presenting the report of the inquest is defined in nearly the same language. But the influence of the commission of 1170 is traceable; the sheriffs are not now associated with the justices as the persons to whom the report is to be made, and a particular inquiry is ordered into the receipts of the king's bailiffs. Other articles have special reference to the recent rebellion; every man, be he earl, baron, knight, freeholder, or villein, is to take the oath of fealty, or to be arrested as the king's enemy; the castles, the destruction of which had been ordered, are to be really destroyed; and report is to be made to the king as to the performance of the duty of castle-guard by those who are liable to it. Nor was the visitation confined to criminal jurisdiction; the judges were to take recognitions of novel disseisin, and to hear every sort of plea that was cognisable under royal writ touching fiefs of half a knight's fee or less. In their fiscal capacity they were to examine into the escheats, wardships, crown lands and churches. The fourth article directs that, in the case of the death of a freeholder, the rights of his family, his will and his debts, are to be provided for before the relief is paid to his lord: and that questions arising as to the nature of his tenure are to be decided by a recognition of twelve men. This clause is probably the text

Political
articles.

Civil jurisdiction.

¹ Pipe Rolls of the several years; Madox, Hist. Exch. pp. 84 sq.

² Bened. i. 107 sq.; Hoveden, ii. 89 sq.; Select Charters, pp. 143 sq.

of the law on which the assize of Mort d'ancester as a part of the regular process was founded. The execution of the assize of Northampton was committed to six detachments, each consisting of three judges¹; to each detachment a cluster of counties or circuit was assigned: of the eighteen judges, eight were barons acting as sheriffs at the time, and in most cases one of the three was sheriff of one of the counties in his circuit. The lists of sheriffs show a considerable change of officials in the year following the assize, with the marked result of throwing the sheriffdom more entirely into the hands of the court.

The years 1176 and 1177 were occupied with constant councils, in which all sorts of business were transacted: the disputes between the two archbishops furnished occupation for more than one²; the marriage of the king's daughter with the king of Sicily was considered in another³; in a great council at Winchester, on Michaelmas-day, 1176, the king took all the castles of the kingdom into his hands, not even sparing those of the faithful Richard de Lucy⁴; and in a court held at Westminster, November 12⁵, he received the ambassadors of both emperors, and several minor princes. In 1177, as in 1176, Northampton was the place chosen for the January council⁶; in a court held in February at Winchester, the king directed a new inquest into the conduct of the royal bailiffs, and issued summonses for a general feudal levy⁷; at the beginning of Lent

Division of
the country into six circuits.

Councils of 1176 and 1177.

Inquest into receipts.

¹ The names of the judges are given in the Chronicle of Benedict, i. 107, 108.

² There was a council of clergy, March 14, at Westminster to meet the Roman legate; there the two archbishops quarrelled; on the 15th of August a council of bishops, earls, and barons met to settle the strife; Bened. i. 112, 118.

³ On the arrival of the Sicilian ambassadors Henry called together the archbishops, bishops, earls, and sapientiores of the kingdom on the 25th of May; the subject was discussed and 'habito tractatu communi' the proposal was accepted. R. Diceto, c. 590; Bened. i. 116.

⁴ Bened. i. 124; R. Diceto, c. 594.

⁵ R. Diceto, c. 595.

⁶ 'Magnum celebravit concilium cum episcopis, comitibus et baronibus suis.' Bened. i. 132.

⁷ The sheriffs were to report at the Easter Exchequer: 'Praeterea ibidem per consilia familiarium suorum mandavit omnibus comitibus et baronibus et militibus regni qui de eo in capite tenebant, quod omni occasione remota essent bene parati equis et armis apud Londonias in octavis clausi Paschae

Spanish award in 1177.

a great assembly was held in London, in which Henry arbitrated between the kings of Castille and Navarre with the advice of his court¹; in May the king held a council at Geddington to treat 'of the peace and stability of the realm,' and another at Oxford to witness the nomination of John as king of Ireland, and the partition of that country among the barons who had joined in the adventure of the conquest². The next month at Winchester all the tenants-in-chief were called together to hear the king's purpose of going to Normandy, and to prepare to accompany him³. A great expedition was contemplated, but the necessity for war was averted for the time, and the forces returned home, spared from the danger of affording a precedent for foreign service in time to come. But although the army was not needed in Normandy the king's presence was indispensable, and in August he left England for a year; during which the country enjoyed profound quiet.

Feudal levy for an expedition to France.

Henry
leaves.

He returns
in July, 1178.

He returned in the following July, and, as usual, signalled his presence by some energetic reforms. This time his zeal took the shape of an attack on the Curia Regis. He had heard that the measures of the justices had been oppressive, that their number was far too great: eighteen judges are said by the chronicler to have been acting at once; possibly the eighteen who had gone on circuit in 1176. Without actually dismissing these, the king, by the advice of his council, chose five of his own immediate servants, two clerks and three laymen, before whom he ordered all the complaints of his people to be brought,

His changes in the Curia
Regis.

secuturi cum inde in Normanniam et moraturi secum per unum annum in partibus transmarinis ad custamentum eorum.' Bened. i. 138.

¹ 'Mandavit archiepiscopis, episcopis, comitibus et baronibus totius Angliæ quod essent ad eum apud Landonias Dominica proxima post caput jejunii; habiturus enim erat illorum consilia de quodam judicio faciendo inter duos reges Hispaniæ.' Bened. i. 139. 'Venerunt tot abbates, tot decani, tot archidiaconi quot sub numero non cadebant. Venerunt etiam illic comites et barones regni quorum non est numerus.' Ibid. 145. 'Archiepiscopus Cantuariensis et episcopi Angliæ qui aderant et comites et barones regni . . . adjudicaverunt.' Ibid. 151.

² Bened. i. 160, 162.

³ 'Venerunt etiam illic ad eum comites et barones et milites regni sui per summonitionem suam. . . Congregatis itaque omnibus in urbe Wintoniæ rex per consilium eorum transfretationem suam distulit.' Bened. i. 178. The king himself sailed August 17; Bened. i. 190; and returned July 15, 1178; ibid. 207.

reserving the harder cases for his own hearing as before, to be decided with the council of the wise¹. In this measure is traced the foundation of the Court of King's Bench as a separate committee of the Curia Regis; whilst the power of hearing appeals, as now reserved to the king, marks an important step in the development of the judicial system out of which the equitable and appellate jurisdictions sprang. The immediate effect of this measure is uncertain, for the two following years produced greater changes, both personal and official.

The germ of the King's Bench, and jurisdiction of the Council.

Soon after Easter, 1179, Richard de Lucy, who had been chief justiciar for twenty-five years, and who had been faithful to the king and just to the people during the whole time, resigned his office, and retired to the monastery of Lesnes, which he had founded². Henry took advantage of the event to remodel the provincial administration: in a great council held at Windsor, setting aside the arrangement of six circuits so lately devised, he divided England into four districts, East, West, Midland, and North. To each of these five judges were assigned, one bishop, one or two chaplains or clerks, and three or four laymen. The northern circuit had no bishop, but six judges, one of whom was Ranulf Glanvill. Of the whole body only eight had been before employed in a judicial capacity, and most of the new justices are traceable as succeeding in process of time to sheriffdoms and other high offices³. The report of the commission was made to the king in August, but the accounts appear in the roll of 1180. Ralph de Diceto explains the measure as an attempt on the king's part to use the bishops of Winchester, Norwich, and Ely as checks on the lay officials, or at least so to blend lay and clerical influences in the arrangement as to secure equitable treatment for the litigants⁴. The expedient seems scarcely to have been successful: it was not repeated; Ranulf Glanvill, the great lawyer, was almost immediately after appointed to the place which Richard

Richard de Lucy resigns in 1179.

New division and distribution of judicial work.

Three bishops among the judges.

¹ Bened. i. 207. See below, p. 601.

² Bened. i. 238. 'Tunc rex congregatis episcopis et comitibus et proceribus regni . . . communi eorum consilio, coram rege filio suo divisit in quatuor partes Angliam.' Ibid.

³ Bened. i. 238, 239.

⁴ R. Diceto, cc. 605, 606.

Ranulf
Glanvill
justiciar,
1180.

de Lucy had held¹, and under his administration the king's long and varied experiments came to an end. It is probable that, in faithful discharge of duty, and an inventive or adaptative genius for legal proceedings, he came up to his master's ideal of a good judge.

Latter years
of Henry II.

146. The remaining years of Henry furnish little that is of constitutional importance. He paid during the time four long visits² to England, and on each occasion left the impress of his presence. In 1180 he ordered a new coinage, the second coinage of the reign; for the promise made at the treaty of Wallingford had been redeemed in 1158³. In 1181 he issued the Assize of Arms, by which he directed the whole of the freemen of the country to provide themselves with armour according to their means, and the inquiry by oath of legal juries to determine the liability of each⁴. The same year he made

New coinage
in 1180.

Assize of Arms in 1181.

¹ Hoveden, ii. 215.

² The dates are as follows:—In April, 1180, the king went to Normandy; he returned July 27, 1181. He left again March 3, 1182; returning June 10, 1184. He left again April 16, 1185, and returned April 27, 1186. Leaving next February 17, 1187, he returned January 30, 1188. His final departure from England took place July 10, 1188, and he died July 6, 1189.

³ See above, p. 334. The offences of the coiners had called forth some very severe measures on the part of Henry I, who by his charter had promised to secure the purity of the coinage. William of Malmesbury (Hist. Nov. ii. § 34) mentions the depreciation of the coin as an act of Stephen, and the private coinage of the barons was one of the points noted by William of Newburgh at the same period (above, p. 328). Henry had very early taken measures to restore the coin to its due weight, and had ordered a common coinage for the whole country to be struck, which alone was to be taken at the Exchequer; Dialogus i. c. 3. In the Pipe Roll of the second year of the reign are some notices of the punishment of fraudulent moneyers; but the first mention of the 'commutatio monetæ' is in 1158. The new coinage of 1180 was received by the people with suspicion (W. Newb. iii. c. 5); but the severe measures against the moneyers were again necessary. An assize was issued by which the payment of the old coin was declared unlawful after Martinmas, and the new coinage, struck under the management of Philip Aymar, a native of Touraine, was thus forced into circulation. Unluckily Philip was found conniving at the frauds of the moneyers; the minor offenders were punished, but he was pardoned, and escaped to France. Ralph Niger lays the blame on the king and the archbishop of Canterbury: 'Being himself corrupted by Archbishop Richard, he suffered the coin to be corrupted, and nevertheless hanged the corrupters of it;' Ralph Niger (ed. Anstruther), p. 168. Cf. R. Diceto, c. 611; Gervase, c. 1457; Madox, Hist. Exch. 189 sq.; Benedict, ii. pref. pp. ci-civ.

⁴ Benedict, i. 278 sq.; Hoveden, ii. 261; Select Charters, pp. 146-149.

his son Geoffrey chancellor. In 1184 he promulgated the Assize of Woodstock, a code of forest ordinances, which were very stringent, but somewhat less inhuman than the customs of his grandfather¹. In 1186 he filled up the vacant churches, objecting in a significant way to the election of the officers of his court to the bishoprics, and thus delaying the promotion of Richard the Treasurer, Godfrey de Lucy, Herbert the Poor, and other rising men². The same year he assembled an army for an expedition to Galloway, but at Carlisle he received the homage of the rebellious lords, and returned home, taking a scutage of his barons³. In 1188, after the shock of the capture of Jerusalem, he obtained from a great national council at Geddington⁴ a promise of a tithe to be contributed towards the Crusade, for the assessment and collection of which his favourite plan of inquest by jury was again employed. But although these acts have an importance of their own, the real interest of this period of Henry's life lies outside of England,

Assize of the Forest in 1184.

Scutage of Galloway in 1180.

Saladin Tithe in 1188.

¹ Benedict, i. 323, 324; Hoveden, ii. 243; Select Charters, pp. 149-152.

² Benedict, i. 346: 'Rex . . . electioni de illis factae consentire noluit, respondens illos satis divites esse, et se de caetero nunquam daturum episcopatum alicui pro amore, vel consanguinitate, vel consilio, vel prece, vel pretio, sed illis quos elegerit sibi Dominus.'

³ Benedict, i. 348; Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 441.

⁴ 'Convocatis archiepiscopo et episcopis et comitibus et baronibus regni.' Benedict ii. 33. The ordinance is in Benedict, ii. 30; Hoveden, ii. 335; Select Charters, pp. 152, 153. The councils of the later years which have not been mentioned in the above notes, were as follows:—

In 1184 Ranulf Glanvill held a council to deliberate on the pope's demand of an aid from the clergy; Bened. i. 311. The king returned to England on the 10th of June, and held a council with the bishops and monks, at Reading, Aug. 5; at Windsor, Oct. 23; and at London, Dec. 2; R. Diceto, c. 619.

In 1185 the king held a council of bishops, abbots, earls, and barons on the 17th of March, at Clerkenwell, to discuss a crusade; Bened. i. 336; R. Diceto, c. 626. At the Easter court he knighted John, and gave the county of Huntingdon to the king of Scots. On April 16 he went abroad.

In 1186, having returned April 27, he met the bishops and clergy at Eynsham, May 25; the council, which was held for the election of bishops, sat for eight days; R. Diceto, 631: and a similar assembly was held at Marlborough, Sept. 14. At Christmas, at Guildford, a very solemn court was held, and the grand-serjeanties usual at the coronations were performed; Bened. ii. 3.

In 1187, on Feb. 17, the king went abroad; he returned Jan. 30. 1188.

In 1188, on Feb. 11, he held the council at Geddington; on the 10th of July he went abroad, and never returned.

War in France.

Changes among the
earls.

in his contest with his disobedient sons and King Philip of France. During these struggles the English baronage, as a rule, was faithful: but had the great earls even wished to renew their pretensions, they were too tightly bound by the royal policy of precaution or by personal gratitude. Hugh Bigod had closed his uneasy career in 1177: the earl of Chester had been restored to the royal favour and made useful in Ireland the same year; he died in 1181: the earl of Leicester had recovered his estates, with the exception of the castles, in 1177, and continued faithful; although, when the young king rebelled in 1183, it was thought necessary to imprison him as well as his wife¹, to keep them out of mischief: and the same precaution was taken with respect to the earl of Gloucester and others: Roger Mowbray went on a crusade in 1186.

Rebellion of
the king's sons in 1183.

There is no trace of any sympathy felt in England for the revolt of the king's sons in 1183; and if there had been any such feeling, the short duration of the struggle, which closed at the death of the young king in June, would have prevented its manifestation: but the war was really confined to the Poictevin provinces. The rebellious son, on whom much empty sentiment has been wasted, was a showy and ambitious man, possessed of popular accomplishments, and professing sympathy with the baronial party which his father was constantly employed in repressing². He had some gifts that his father wanted, or did not take the pains to exhibit; and either by these, or as a result of his father's unpopularity, won from the annalists of the time the character of a popular favourite. His conduct however was that of an unprincipled, ungrateful son, a faithless brother, and a contemptible politician;

Character of the younger
Henry.

¹ Bened. i. 294. The importance of the countess, who is almost always mentioned as present where her husband was, is worth notice. She was Petronilla, the heiress of the family of Grantmesnil. The earl's mother was daughter of Ralph Guader, by the daughter of William Fitz-Osbern: he and his wife thus represented three families which attributed their downfall to the policy of the Conqueror and his sons.

² This appears especially in Aquitaine, where he was regarded as a martyr, and where it was said that miracles were wrought at his tomb. See the extracts from the sermon of Thomas Agnellus, in Hoveden, ii. pref. p. lvii.

he was in fact a puppet in the hands of his father-in-law, of his mother, or of the feudal party in England, Normandy, and Aquitaine.

The contest with Richard, which occupied the last year of the king's life was watched by the English with even less anxiety; for they had little fear of the issue, and knew very little about Richard. The sudden, profound, and fatal discomfiture of the king took the nation, as it took the whole western world, by surprise¹.

Quietness of England during the king's last troubles.

The internal administration of these years was regular and peaceful. Year after year the judicial and financial officers make their circuits and produce their accounts: both judicial and financial receipts accumulate; and the gross income of the last years of the reign reached the sum of £48,000². Ranulf Glauvill also during this time drew up or superintended the composition of the Liber de Legibus Angliae, on which our knowledge of the Curia Regis in its earliest form depends: to a somewhat earlier period belongs the Dialogus de Scaccario of Richard Fitz-Neal³, and the recension of the English laws which also is ascribed to Glauvill⁴. It is possible that all three works⁵ were drawn up at the king's command, to put on record the methods of proceeding which had depended too much hitherto on oral and hereditary tradition.

Judicial and financial progress.

Henry died on the 6th of July, 1189, having to the last week of his life refused to allow to Richard the recognition of the barons as his successor, and possibly, in his irritable and exhausted condition, nursing some idea of disposing of his kingdom, as the Conqueror had done, in favour of his younger son⁶.

Henry's death.

¹ Hoveden, ii. pref. pp. lix-lxxii.

² Pipe Roll of the 1st of Richard I, i. e. the year ending at Michaelmas, 1189; a month after Richard's coronation.

³ It was begun in 1176, but contains notices of events as late as 1178.

⁴ Hoveden, ii. 218 sq.

⁵ The Dialogus is dedicated to the king: 'Rex illustris, mundanorum principum maxime.' Praef.: Select Charters, p. 161.

⁶ The story of Giraldus (De Inst. Pr. lib. iii. c. 2), that he intended to annul his marriage with Eleanor and exclude all her children from the succession, is no doubt a fabrication: the same writer attributes to Archbishop Geoffrey the thought of surviving his brothers, and putting in a claim to the throne notwithstanding his illegitimacy. (V. Galfridi, Ang. Sae. ii. 383.)

The discovery of John's treachery rendered this of course impossible, and that discovery broke his heart.

Summary of Henry's
reign.

147. The examination of the administrative measures of Henry in the order of their adoption, is necessary to enable us to realise at once the development of his policy, and the condition of affairs which compelled it. Nor, although in the investigation much detail is needed which at first sight seems irrelevant to the later or to the more essential history of the Constitution, is the minute inquiry to be set aside as superfluous. Henry II was, it is true, far more than an inventor of legal forms or of the machinery of taxation. He was one of the greatest politicians of his time; a man of such wide influence, great estates, and numerous connexions, that the whole of the foreign relations of England during the middle ages may be traced directly and distinctly to the results of his alliances and his enmities. He was regarded by the Emperor Frederick, by the kings of Spain and Sicily, by the rising republics of Lombardy, by the half-savage dynasts of Norway, and by the fainting realm of Palestine as a friend and a patron to be secured at any cost. He refused the crowns of Jerusalem and Sicily; he refused to recognise the antipope at a moment when the whole influence of the papacy was being employed to embarrass and distress him. His career is full of romantic episodes, and of really great physical exploits.

His greatness on the Continent.

He is chiefly distinguished as a legislator and administrator.

Yet the consent of the historians of the time makes him, first and foremost, a legislator and administrator. Ralph Niger, his enemy¹, tells how year after year he wore out men's patience with his annual assizes; how he set up an upstart nobility; how he abolished the ancient laws, set aside charters, overthrew municipalities, thirsted for gold, overwhelmed all society with his scutages, his recognitions, and such like. Ralph de Diceto explains how necessary a constant adaptation and readjustment of means was to secure in any degree the pure administration of justice, and lauds the promptness with which he discarded unsatisfactory measures to make way for new experiments¹. William of Newburgh² and Peter of Blois³ praise him for the Anglia constanter adiscebant, cognatos quoque suos quasi aspides exosos habuit. . . . Nullo quaestu satiatas, abolitis legibus antiquis, singulis annis novas leges quas assisas vocavit edidit. Danegeldum avitum innovavit. . . . Corruptus a Ricardo archiepiscopo monetam corrumpi permisit, corruptores tandem suspendio decedere compellens. Avibus coeli, piscibus fluminum, bestiis terrae immunitatem dedit et sata pauperum loca pascuae fecit. Causam fidei laesae et advocacionis ecclesiarum in curia decidi constituit. Tributarius exteris, in domesticos praedo, scutagiis, recognitionibus et variis angariarum alluvionibus fere omnes depressit. Omne jus poli jure fori demutavit. Scripta authentica omnium enervavit, libertatibus omnium insidians, quasi e specula, solotenus egit innoxiorum municipia. Filias miserae conditionis, corruptas et oppressas, copulans clarissimis, haereditas omnes mechanicas creavit. . . . Haereditates retinuit aut vendidit. . . . In causis differendis cavillantissimus ut saepe jus venderet.' R. Niger (ed. Anstruther), pp. 167-169.

¹ 'Nactus autem regnum Anglorum servos, spurios, caligatos, cubili, mensae, regno praefecit et ex iis quaestores, praetores, proconsules, tribunos, municipes, forestarios super provincias constituit: illustres ignominii oneratos, sed caeteris rebus vacuos, patrimonii omnino privavit vel subdole portionibus detractis deerustando sensim adnihilavit. Ex cubiculariis et aulae nugatoribus episcopos, abbates, factos auctoritate propria ad officium apparitorum revocavit, et quem praesulem crearat a praeside, in praesidatum recreavit ex praesule. . . . Nulli infra metas forestae habitanti in lucis propriis aut virgas colligendi, aut sylvestria et in via in agriculturam agendi, potestatem concessit sine forestariis. Legem quoque de forestis inauditam dedit, qua delicti alieni innumes perpetuo multabuntur. . . . Illustribus uxores ducere, filias nuptui dare, praeter regis conscientiam inhibuit et transgressores tanquam reos laesae majestatis punivit. Haeredes omnium quos avus suus extulerat et qui ei in subigenda

¹ 'Rex pater Anglorum his plurimum quaerens prodesse qui minimum possunt . . . de communi salute magis et magis sollicitus . . . intentissimus ad justitiam singulis exhibendum . . . animum a proposito non immutans circa personas mutabiles immutabilem semper saepe mutavit sententiam.' R. Dic. c. 605; Select Charters, p. 125.

² 'Fuit enim in illo regni fastigio tuendae et fovendae pacis publicae studiosissimus, in portando gladium ad vindictam malefactorum. . . . Nullum grave regno Anglorum vel terris suis transmarinis onus unquam imposuit . . . tributum more aliorum principum . . . ecclesiis . . . nunquam indixit.' W. Newb. lib. iii. c. 26. See too John of Salisbury, Polycrat. lib. vi. c. 18.

³ 'Non enim sicut alii reges in palatio suo jacet, sed per provincias currens explorat facta omnium, illos potissimum judicans quos constituit iudices aliorum. Nemo est argutior in consiliis, in eloquio torrentior. . . . Quoties enim potest a curis et sollicitudinibus respirare, secreta se occupat lectione aut in cuneo clericorum aliquem modum quaestionis laborat evolvere. . . . Apud dominum regem Anglorum quotidiana ejus schola est, litteratissimorum conversatio jugis et discussio quaestionum. . . . Rex noster pacifex, victoriosus in bellis, gloriosus in pace, super omnia hujus mundi desiderabilia zelatur et procurat pacem populi sui. . . . Nullus mansuetior est afflictis, nullus affabilior pauperibus, nullus importabilior est superbis; quam enim divinitatis imagine semper studuit opprimere fastuosos, oppressos erigere et adversus superbiae tumorem continuas persecutiones et exitiales molestias suscitare. . . .' Pet. Bles. Epp. (ed. Busaeus), ep. 66. Giraldus Cambrensis, like Ralph Niger, takes the opposite view: 'Fuerat enim et ab initio et usque ad finem nobilitatis oppressor, jus et injuriam,

His politic
government.

very measures that Ralph Niger condemns; his exactions were far less than those of his successors; he was most careful of the public peace; he bore the sword for the punishment of evil-doers, but to the peace of the good; he conserved the rights and liberties of the churches; he never imposed any heavy tax on either England or his continental estates, or grieved the Church with undue exactions: his legal activity was especially meritorious after the storm of anarchy which preceded. In every description of his character the same features recur, whether as matters of laudation or of abuse.

How far was he an original legislator?

The question already asked recurs, How many of the innovating expedients of his policy were his own? Some parts of it bear a startling resemblance to the legislation of the Frank emperors, his institution of scutage, his assize of arms, his inquest of sheriffs, the whole machinery of the jury which he developed and adapted to so many different sorts of business,—almost all that is distinctive of his genius is formed upon Karolingian models, the very existence of which within the circle of his studies or of his experience we are at a loss to account for.

General
revival of legal study.

It is probable that international studies in the universities had attained already an important place; that the revised study of the Roman law¹ had invited men to the more comprehensive fasque nefasque pro commodo pensans' (De Inst. Pr. ii. c. 3); 'acer in indomitos, clemens in subactos, durus in domesticos, effusus in extraneos; largus in publico, pareus in privato. . . . Auctor pacis diligentissimus et observator. . . . humilitatis amator et superbiae calcator. . . . zelo justitiæ sed non ex scientia regni sacerdotiique jura conjungens vel confundens potius. . . .' (Ibid. c. 29.)

¹ 'Magister Vacarius gente Longobardus, vir honestus et juris peritus, cum leges Romanas anno ab Incarnatione Domini 1149 in Anglia discipulos doceret, et multi tam divites quam pauperes ad eum discendi confluerent, suggestione pauperum de Codice et Digesta excerptos novem libros composuit qui sufficient ad omnes legum lites quæ in scholis frequentari solent decidendas, si quis eos perfecte noverit.' R. de Monte, A.D. 1149. 'Tunc leges et causidici in Angliam primo vocati sunt quorum primus erat magister Vacarius. Hic in Oxenfordia legem docuit;' Gervase, c. 1665. He was silenced by Stephen: 'Rex quidam Angliæ Stephanus allatis legibus Italiæ in Angliam publico edicto prohibuit;' Roger Bacon, Opus Minus (cited by Selden in his notes on Fortescue, p. 39). 'Tempore regis Stephani a regno jussæ sunt leges Romanæ quas in Britanniam domus venerabilis patris Theobaldi Britanniarum primatis asciverat; ne quis etiam libros retineret edicto regio prohibitum est et Vacario nostro indictum silentium;' John Salish. Polycr. viii. c. 22. Glanvill's preface to his book on the laws is adapted from the Institutes

examination of neighbouring jurisprudence. But whilst the Roman law met with a cold reception in England, and whilst the minutiae of feudal legislation as it was then growing up gained admission only at a later period, and were under Henry repressed rather than encouraged, we here and there come across glimpses of the imperial system which had died out on the soil from which it sprang. The illustration of this phaenomenon will come in its own place.

148. Richard had no opposition to fear in any of his father's dominions, and he was already in possession of his mother's inheritance; but he had to make terms with Philip his late ally, who from the moment of his succession saw in him only his father's son and his own hereditary enemy. In England the public peace was maintained by the queen, who, acting in conjunction with the justiciar, put forth a proclamation in her own name directing the release of prisoners and claiming the allegiance of the whole nation for her son¹. The archbishop who had been in France at the time of Henry's death, was sent home to prepare for the coronation. As soon as Richard had concluded his treaty with Philip, and received investiture as duke of Normandy, he crossed over to England. From his first arrival it was clear that his mind was set upon the Crusade, and his whole policy directed to providing funds and making the necessary arrangements for the kingdom during his own absence. He began by seizing his father's treasures, which amounted to a fabulous sum²; he called Ranulf Glanvill to a strict account, and imprisoned him until he had paid a heavy ransom³ and resigned the justiciarship; he disposed in marriage

Roman law discouraged in England.

Accession of Richard

He is invested as duke, and comes to England.

Glanvill displaced.

of Justinian; many extracts from the civil and canon law are found in the so-called Leges Henrici Primi; and before the end of the reign of Henry II the procedure of the Roman civil law had become well known by the English canonists, although its influence was not allowed much to affect the common law of the kingdom. See the case of the monks of Canterbury, drawn up by a civilian, in Epistolae Cantuarienses, pp. 520 sq.

¹ Bened. ii. 74, 75.

² More than nine hundred thousand pounds, Bened. ii. 77; more than one hundred thousand marks, Hoveden, iii. 8: the former estimate seems much too high and the latter too low.

³ R. Devizes, p. 7. According to this writer, Glanvill paid a ransom of £15,000.

He makes a progress and is crowned Sept. 3, 1189.

of most of the royal wards, and in a magnificent progress through the west of England wiled away the three weeks which intervened between his landing and the coronation. The latter event took place on the 3rd of September, in such splendour and minute formality as to form a precedent for all subsequent ceremonies of the sort. But although every detail of the ancient rite was preserved and amplified,—the crowning and anointing, the solemn oath of the king and the consequent homage and fealty of bishops and barons,—whilst the form of election, although not specially mentioned by the historians, was no doubt performed; no charter of liberties was issued, as had been done at the last three coronations. Richard was frankly accepted by the people as well as by the barons as his father's heir; nor was there during the whole of his reign any attempt made by any one in the kingdom, except John, to overthrow, either in name or in substance, his royal authority. After the coronation he continued his royal progress, visiting the most famous English sanctuaries. On the 16th of September he brought together a great council at Pipewell in Northamptonshire¹, where he gave away the vacant bishoprics, appointed a new ministry, and raised a large sum of money by the sale of charters of confirmation. Shortly after he changed the sheriffs in almost every county². The acquisition of treasure seems to have been the chief object of these measures; for although the offices were transferred to different holders, the same persons remained in authority. Richard had no desire to disgrace his father's friends, and had very few of his own to supply their places. He stayed two months longer in the country, and after selling to the Scots their freedom from the obligation which his father had extorted, left for Palestine on the 11th of December.

Council of Pipewell.

Ways of raising money.

Release of Scotland.

Richard's policy.

Richard was not at this period of his life an accomplished politician. He had two distinct objects to provide for before he went—the maintenance of the administration of the kingdom in faithful hands, and the securing of his brother John in his

¹ Bened. ii. 85.

² R. Devizes, p. 8; Bened. ii. 90. The latter historian places the resignation of Glanvill at this point.

reluctant allegiance. The means he took for these ends were inadequate. John was indulged with a considerable gift of revenue and authority : besides the great Gloucester inheritance which he received with his wife, he was put in possession of so many counties and royal honours as seriously to impoverish the crown¹, while the only restraint imposed on him was the retention of some of his castles in the hands of the government, and an oath by which he undertook to absent himself for three years from England. From this oath John was released before Richard left France ; but his ambition was further tantalised by the recognition of Arthur of Brittany as heir to Richard. The king seems to have trusted mainly to his mother's influence to keep his brother out of mischief. The other object was to be provided for by the choice of ministers. A chancellor the king had already found in William Longchamp, a clerk of Norman extraction, who had been in the service of his brother Geoffrey, and whom he promoted at Pipewell to the see of Ely. The justiciarship was bestowed on William Mandeville, earl of Essex and count of Aumâle, who had been unswervingly faithful to Henry ; a share of the power, probably the administration of the northern counties, being reserved for Hugh de Puiset, the aged bishop of Durham. The arrangement however was broken up by the death of the earl soon after his appointment, and England was left nominally in charge of Bishop Hugh², although the chancellor and several of the justices were associated with him as colleagues. The bishop of Durham had paid heavily for his honours ; he had bought the justiciarship and the earldom of Northumberland³ ; the chancellor too had paid for the chancery £3,000⁴, although he was the king's most

His provision for John.

The new ministry.

William Mandeville.

Hugh de Puiset.

¹ He had the county of Mortain in Normandy, the honour of the earldom of Gloucester, the castles and honours of Marlborough, Lancaster, Ludgershall, the Peak, and Bolsover ; the town and honour of Nottingham, and the honours of Wallingford and Tickhill without the castles ; the counties of Derby, Devon, Dorset, Somerset, and Cornwall. See Hoveden, iii. pref. p. xxv.

² Bened. ii. 101.

³ He gave 2,000 marks for the county ; and for the justiciarship a large sum which is described in Benedict (ii. 91) as 1,000 marks ; but Richard of Devizes fixes the whole sum wrung from him at £10,000 ; p. 8.

⁴ Reginald the Lombard had bidden £4,000. R. Devizes, p. 9.

Struggle between the Bishops of Durham and Ely.

trusted friend. Scarcely however had Richard left England when the two bishops quarrelled at the Exchequer. Both had recourse to the king in Normandy, and in March a new appointment was made; William Longchamp became chief justiciar, and to Bishop Hugh the jurisdiction of the north was again entrusted¹. But on the return of the latter to England he was arrested by his colleague, no doubt under the king's orders, and kept in forced retirement as long as the power of the chancellor was maintained².

Career of Longchamp.

149. Longchamp was now both justiciar and chancellor: in the June following he was made papal legate³, and, as the archbishop of Canterbury had gone on crusade, whilst Geoffrey of York, the king's half-brother, was unconsecrated and in disgrace, he was supreme in both Church and State. He took full advantage of his opportunities, lived in pomp and luxury, obtained great wardships and rich marriages for his relations, sold judicial sentences, exacted money by every possible title from every possible payer, and offended both the baronage and his own colleagues in the government. But he was faithful to his master; and his public policy, as distinct from his personal behaviour, was intelligent and energetic. His rule kept the kingdom in peace so long as Eleanor, whether in France or in England, was able to keep John in order. On her departure to Italy, whither she had to convey Richard's betrothed wife, John took the opportunity of overthrowing his brother's minister and securing to himself a prospect of constitutional succession to the defeat of the pretensions of Arthur.

He maintains peace until Eleanor's departure to Sicily.

Quarrel about Gerard Cunville.

In the spring of 1191 Longchamp was attempting to get into the king's hands some of the castles⁴ whose owners or governors he suspected of treason: one of these, Gerard Cam-

¹ Bened. ii. 106.

² Bened. ii. 109, 110; R. Diceto, c. 655. The king gave him full powers by letter dated at Bayonne, June 6: 'Mandamus vobis et praccipimus quod sicut de nobis consulitis et sicut vos ipsos et omnia vestra diligitis, sitis omnino intendentes dilecto et fideli cancellario nostro Elyensi episcopo super omnibus quae ad nos spectant, et pro ipso faciatis sicut pro nobismet ipsis faceritis, de omnibus quae vobis ex parte nostra dixerit.'

³ R. Diceto, c. 655.

⁴ Gloucester (R. Devizes, p. 13), Wigmore (ibid. p. 30).

ville, the sheriff of Lincolnshire, was a friend of John, who took up arms in his favour. Twice during the summer war seemed imminent; but as Richard had already been informed of the unpopularity of his representative, and as the barons and prelates cared little for either John or Longchamp, the actual use of force was avoided, and means were taken, by arbitration, of preserving the balance of power between the two¹. Before the second occasion however presented itself, the king's envoy, Walter of Coutances, archbishop of Rouen, had arrived from Messina with mysterious instructions, to act on the king's part as circumstances should dictate. He took a share in the second truce which was concluded at Winchester in July, and which placed the principal royal castles in the hands of safe men, bishops and barons, who were all inclined to support Richard's authority, although they differed as to the policy of securing John's succession. In September however a new difficulty arose: the archbishop of York returned from Tours, where he had been consecrated, alleging that he as well as John had been released from his oath to stay away from England. Immediately on landing he was arrested by Longchamp's order, and treated with unnecessary ignominy. He at once appealed to John, who on this occasion found the sympathy of the barons and bishops on his side. The chancellor, speedily discovering his error, disavowed the action of his servants and released Geoffrey, but he had given his enemies their opportunity. A council of the barons² was called at London, and John laid the case before them: a conference was proposed near Windsor, but the chancellor failed to present himself. Excommunicated by the bishops and deserted by his colleagues, he hastened to London and shut himself up in the Tower. John, who was now triumphant, brought together a great council at S. Paul's³, and there, before the barons, bishops, and citizens of London, accused Longchamp.

Civil war imminent.

Truce at Winchester, July 1191.

Arrest of Archbishop Geoffrey.

Council of the barons.

Longchamp accused, Oct. 8.

¹ On the sequence of these events see Hoveden, iii. pref. pp. lviii. sq. The first truce was arranged April 25, 1191, at Winchester, before the archbishop of Rouen arrived; the second, in which he took part, on the 28th of July.

² Bened. ii. 212.

³ 'Fere omnes episcopi et comites et barones Angliac, et cives Lund niae cum illis.' Bened. ii. 213.

The Archbishop of Rouen claims the justiciarship.

Then the archbishop of Rouen produced a commission signed by Richard at Messina in the preceding February, appointing him supreme justiciar, with William Marshall, Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, Hugh Bardulf, and William Briwere as coadjutors¹. The nomination was welcomed with delight; the archbishop had been vice-chancellor to Henry II, and was known to be an honest man of business, with no ambition to be a statesman. John was hailed as summus rector totius regni, but he saw himself deprived of the fruit of his victory over the chancellor, and acquiesced for a time with a good grace. Longchamp, after a protest somewhat more dignified than was to be expected, surrendered his castles, and was allowed to escape to the Continent, where he excommunicated his enemies and intrigued for his return. He contrived to purchase the consent of John and Eleanor, but was repelled by the firm attitude of the baronage², who were alike disinclined to submit to his dictation and to afford John a new opportunity. Eleanor soon after returned to England, and, although constantly harassed by the underhand conduct of Philip and by the treachery of John, she contrived to maintain the peace of the kingdom until the news of Richard's capture reached her in February 1193.

Flight of Longchamp.

Return of Eleanor, Feb. 1192.

Constitutional importance of the crisis.

The deposition of Longchamp, although it scarcely merits the constitutional importance which is sometimes given to it, has a certain significance. It shows the hold which legal system had on the barons; irregular as was the proceeding of John, and inexplicable as was the policy of the archbishop of Rouen, the assembly at S. Paul's acted as a council of the kingdom, heard the charges brought against the minister, and defined the terms of his submission; debated on and determined in favour of the archbishop's nomination. Their action was in substance unconstitutional; there was as yet neither law nor custom that gave them a voice in the appointment or deposition of the justiciar, nor could they even assemble constitutionally without a summons, which the existing justiciar would never have issued.

¹ Bened. ii. 213; Hoveden, iii. pref. p. lxi. p. 96; R. Diceto, c. 659; Gir. Camb. V. Galfr. Ang. Sac. ii. 396.

² Bened. ii. 239, 257; R. Devizes, p. 57.

Yet they acted on that critical principle which more than once in our later history has been called into play, where constitutional safeguards have proved insufficient to secure the national welfare; and the result justified their boldness: they acted as if in substance, though not in strict form, they represented the nation itself.

150. The government of Walter of Coutances subsisted, although with some difficulty, during the rebellion of John in 1193 and the rigorous measures taken for the raising the king's ransom,—being sustained by the presence of Eleanor, the adhesion of the barons, and the general good-will of the nation. The ransom, as one of the three ordinary feudal aids, scarcely required from the national council more than a formal recognition of liability; but the amount was too great to be raised by a mere scutage on knights' fees. The sum required was £100,000; double the whole revenue of the crown¹. The national assent was taken for granted; and the justiciars propounded a somewhat complicated scheme: an aid was taken on the principle of scutage, twenty shillings on the knight's fee; it was supplemented by a tallage, hidage, and earueage, which brought under contribution the rest of the land of the country: the wool of the Gilbertines and Cistercians was also demanded, and the treasures of the churches, their plate and jewels: but the heaviest impost was the exaction of one-fourth of revenue or goods from every person in the realm, a most important and dangerous precedent, although justified on this occasion by the greatness of the necessity. The result proved inadequate, although sufficient

The Archbishop of Rouen justiciar, 1191-93.

Ransom of the king.

Means taken for raising the money.

¹ A meeting was held at Oxford on the 28th of February, 1193; messengers were sent in April from the king to all archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, clerks, and freeholders, asking for an aid, but not specifying the amount required. The same month the king wrote to his mother and the justices, saying that the sum required was 70,000 marks; thereupon the queen and justices, by a public edict, ordered the payment of a fourth of moveables, a scutage of 20s. on the knight's fee, and the seizure of the wool of the Cistercians and the treasures of the churches. The sum ultimately fixed was 150,000 marks. Hoveden, iii. 208-217. See Hoveden, iv. pref. pp. lxxxii-lxxxv; W. Newb. iv. c. 38. Ralph de Diceto says that the arrangement for raising the money 'statutum est communi assensu,' c. 670; but this does not necessarily imply any deliberation in the national council, nor is there any distinct proof that such an assembly was held. But the chronicles are not very full on the subject.

Hubert
Walter
justiciar.

money was raised to secure the release of the king. But before this was done the archbishop of Rouen resigned the justiciarship, being succeeded by Hubert Walter, archbishop of Canterbury, at Christmas 1193¹.

Previous career of Hubert.

Hubert Walter was an old servant of the court, the nephew and pupil of Ranulf Glanvill, and a constant attendant on Henry II. Richard had at the beginning of his reign given him the bishopric of Salisbury, and had taken him with him to Palestine, where he exhibited the due admixture of religious zeal, charity, and prowess that befitted the prelate on pilgrimage. He had acted as chaplain, as captain, as treasurer, and as ambassador. On the failure of the crusade Hubert had led back the English army, had visited his master in captivity, and had been sent home by him to raise the ransom, and to be made archbishop. He had proved his right to Richard's confidence by the energy he had shown in the cause; and his appointment as justiciar was almost immediately followed by a complete victory over John, whose rebellion on the news of Richard's release he quelled by the prompt use of spiritual as well as temporal arms: in one week he obtained from the clergy a sentence of excommunication and from the assembled barons a declaration of outlawry against him, and he was engaged in the reduction of the castles when Richard landed.

His victory over John,
Feb. 1194.

Richard's second visit to England
in 1194.

Richard's second visit bore a strong resemblance to his first. It was occupied mainly with attempts to raise still more money; an object easily made consistent with a show of judicial severity and a politic caution against the treachery of John. After the surrender of the last of John's castles, a great court and council was held at Nottingham, attended by the queen mother, both the archbishops, and several bishops and earls². The business lasted four days, from the 30th of March to the 2nd of April. On the first day Richard removed the sheriffs of Lincolnshire and Yorkshire, and put up the offices for sale. Yorkshire fell to Archbishop Geoffrey, whose bid of an immediate payment of 3,000 marks and 100 marks of increment

Great
council of Nottingham.

¹ R. Diceto, c. 671.

² Hoveden, iii. 240 sq.; Select Charters, pp. 245 sq.

was accepted in preference to the lower offer of the chancellor, who proposed 1,500 marks for Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, and Northamptonshire, with an annual increment of 100 marks from each. On the second day the king demanded from his court a sentence of outlawry against his brother John, and Hugh of Nunant bishop of Coventry, who had been his chief adviser. The court determined that they should be summoned; and in case of their non-appearance within forty days, John was to be banished, and Hugh to be tried as a bishop by the bishops, and as a sheriff by the lay judges. The third day, the 1st of April, was devoted to finance: Richard asked for a carucage,—two shillings on each carucate of land,—a third part of the service of the knights, and the wool of the Cistercians. For the latter item he accepted a pecuniary fine. On the last day of the council he devoted himself to hearing the complaints made against his brother Geoffrey the archbishop of York, and to the trial of Gerard Camville. The archbishop refused to answer, and Gerard, after summarily denying the charges laid against him, gave security for a trial by battle. The king before the assembly broke up announced his intention of being crowned at Winchester on the Sunday after Easter. The political meaning of the several measures taken on this occasion is probably this: Richard recognised distinctly the fidelity of the chancellor, and thought it necessary to displace all the officers who had shown any sympathy with John. But he was not prepared to continue to Longchamp the confidence which he by his imprudence had so dangerously abused. The sheriffs, as we learn from the Rolls¹, were nearly all displaced; and in particular William Briwere, Hugh Bardulf, Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, William Marshall, Gilbert Pipard, and others who had taken a prominent part in the removal of Longchamp, were transferred to other counties, as if the king, although he could not dispense with their services, wished to show his disapproval of their conduct in the matter. Richard however was never vindictive, and would condone any injury for a substantial fine.

Sale of offices.

John and his friends sentenced.

Financial measures.

Accusation of Archbishop Geoffrey and Gerard Camville.

Removal of the sheriffs.

¹ Thirtieth Report of the Deputy-Keeper of the Records.

Richard's
second coronation,
Apr. 17, 1194.

His second coronation was understood to have an important significance. He had by his captivity in Germany, if not, as was alleged, by a formal surrender of the kingdom of England to the emperor to be received again as a fief, impaired or compromised his dignity as a crowned king¹. The Winchester coronation was not intended to be a reconsecration, but a solemn assertion that the royal dignity had undergone no diminution. The ceremony of anointing was not repeated, nor was the imposition of the crown a part of the public rite. Richard went in procession from his chamber to the cathedral, and there received the archbishop's blessing². The occasion resembles the crown-wearing festivals of the Norman kings, and was a revival of the custom which had not been observed since Henry II wore his crown at Worcester in 1158. The few remaining days of the king's stay in England were occupied in arranging the quarrel of the chancellor with Archbishop Geoffrey, and in negotiation with the king of Scots. Hugh de Puiset surrendered the county of Northumberland, and William the Lion offered the king 15,000 marks for the succession. Richard would have accepted the bid, but would not surrender the castles, and this disgraceful negotiation fell to the ground³. On the 12th of May the king sailed for Normandy, where he was almost immediately reconciled with John, and soon after restored to him the county of Mortain, the earldom of Gloucester, and the honour of Eye, giving him a pension of eight thousand pounds Angevin in lieu of his other estates and dignities⁴. No more is heard from this time of Arthur's rights as heir to the crown; the immediate danger of Richard's death was over, and it was by no means unlikely that he might have children. For the remainder of the reign, those persons whose rivalry constitutes the interest of the early years fall into insignificance; Richard himself and his chancellor leave the kingdom to return no more; Hugh de Puiset dies shortly after; the archbishop

Negotiations with the King of Scots.

Richard leaves England, and is reconciled with John.

¹ See the next chapter of this work, p. 561.

² See R. Coggeshale, p. 138; Gervase, 1586, 1587. Hoveden, iii. 247.

³ Ibid. 249.

⁴ Ibid. 286.

of Rouen returns to his province; John intrigues in secret; and Archbishop Geoffrey, whose calamities fill the annals of the time, scarcely comes as yet within the ken of constitutional history.

Temporary
peace.

The kingdom was practically for the remainder of the reign under the rule of Hubert Walter, who became papal legate in 1195, and acted as justiciar until 1198. The period, as might be expected from the character and training of the minister, was devoted mainly to the expansion and modification of the plans by which Henry II had extended at once the profits and the operations of justice. The constant appeals of Richard for money gave the archbishop constant opportunities of developing the machinery by which money could be procured, with as little oppression and as much benefit to the State as were compatible with the incessant demand¹. Immediately after the king's departure a visitation by the justices was held in September 1194, under a commission of the most extensive character. By the articles of this 'iter'² the constitution of the grand jury of the county is defined; four knights are to be chosen in the county court, these are to select on oath two knights from each hundred, and these two, also on oath, are to add by co-optation ten more for the jury of the hundred; a long list of pleas of the Crown and other agenda of the judges is furnished, which is comprehensive enough to cover all occasions of quarrel and complaint since the beginning of the reign. The sheriffs are forbidden to act as justices in their own shires. The election of officers to keep the pleas of the Crown, which is ordered by another article, is the origin of the office of coroner, another limitation of the importance of the sheriffs. The justices are empowered to hear recognitions by great assize, where lands are concerned up to the amount of five pounds of annual value: the Jews and their

Administration of Hubert
Walter.

The Iter of 1194.

Articles of the Iter.

¹ Ralph of Coggeshale says of him: 'Crudelia edicta in quantum potuit repressit et delinivit, afflictorum miseratus calamitatem et exactoriam detestans servitutem;' p. 162.

² Hoveden, iii. 262-267; Select Charters, pp. 250-255; Gervase, c. 1588, 1590. Gervase gives an account of the session of these justitiarum errantes at Canterbury: they were Oger Fitz-Oger, Geoffrey of Sundridge, and Hugh of Dudington: Henry of Cornhill was the sheriff. They tried pleas under the Assize of Clarendon.

Feudal and other articles of inquiry.

persecutors, the dead crusaders, the friends, debts and malversations of John are to be brought into account. Inquiry is to be made into the king's feudal claims, wards, escheats, farms, and churches: and the financial work of the judges is to be completed by the exaction of a tallage from all cities, boroughs, and demesnes of the king. It was further intended that a general inquest into the conduct and receipts of the sheriffs, such as had taken place in 1170, should form part of the business, but the archbishop, thinking the work of the judges sufficient already, cancelled for the time that article of the commission. This visitation, which comprehends almost all the points of administrative importance which mark the preceding reign, constitutes a stage in the development of the principles of election and representation. The choice of the coroner, and the form prescribed for the election of the grand jury, whether this act originated them or merely marked their growth, are phaenomena of no small significance.

Importance of this Iter.

Oppressive acts of Richard.

Whilst this measure was in contemplation Richard was busily employed in his French provinces in forcing his bailiffs and other officers to account for their receipts and to redeem their offices. Amongst other oppressive acts he took the seal from his unscrupulous but faithful chancellor, and, having ordered a new one to be made, proclaimed the nullity of all charters which had been sealed with the old one¹. He also issued licences for the holding of tournaments, which were expected to bring in a considerable revenue. One act of justice was however done; the chalices of the churches which had surrendered their plate for the royal ransom were replaced by the king's special command¹.

His new seal.

Licences for tournaments.

¹ Hoveden, iii. 267; R. Coggeshale, p. 162. Richard's first seal was lost when the vice-chancellor was drowned between Rhodes and Cyprus in 1195; but it was recovered with his dead body. The seal that was now broken must have been the one which the chancellor had used during the king's absence. Richard however, when he was at Messina, had allowed his seal to be set to various grants for which he took money, but which he never intended to confirm. Therefore probably he found it convenient now to have a new seal in lieu of both the former ones, although he threw the blame of the transactions annulled upon the chancellor. The importance of the seal is already very great. Archbishop Geoffrey was credibly accused of sealing writs with the seal of Henry II after the king's death.

The following year was one of peace and consequent activity. The tallage of 1194 was followed by a scutage in 1195, levied on those tenants-in-chief who had not accompanied the king to Normandy. This is the second scutage of the reign; the first was taken in the king's first year on the pretence of an expedition to Wales². The justiciar, immediately on the reception of his legatine commission, in June, proceeded to York, where he held a great court of the most ample description for four days. On the first he directed his servants to hear pleas of the Crown and assizes, whilst he himself and his officials held a spiritual court and heard pleas of Christianity; on the second he acted as legate and visited S. Mary's abbey; on the third and fourth he held a provincial council, which passed fifteen important ecclesiastical canons³. One document of interest was issued the same year; a proclamation of an oath of the peace, which was to be taken by all persons above the age of fifteen. They swore, according to the old law of Canute, not to be thieves or robbers, or receivers of such, and to fulfil their duty of pursuing the thief when the hue and cry is raised⁴. The enforcement of the edict was committed to knights assigned for the purpose; this is probably the origin of the office of conservator of the peace, out of which, in the reign of Edward III, the existing functions of the justices of the peace were developed; and the record thus forms an interesting link of connexion between the Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence and modern usage.

The steady judicial and financial pressure had its usual effect. The archbishop was unable to satisfy the king, and he offended the people. He had constant difficulties with his subordinates, and the Church, which should have been his especial care, was

¹ Hoveden, iii. 290.

² Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 444. The tax raised on the knight's fee for the king's ransom was called an aid, and not a scutage: a proof that the latter term was now becoming restricted to the payment made in commutation of service.

³ Hoveden, iii. 293-298; Gervase, 1589; W. Newb. v. c. 12.

⁴ See the Laws of Canute, ii. 21; Hoveden, iii. 299; Select Charters, pp. 255, 256, and p. 206, above.

Proceedings of the year 1195.

Hubert at York as justiciar and legate, June 12-15.

The oath of the peace.

Effect of pecuniary exactions.

Intended inquiry into the Exchequer, frustrated.

Hubert offers to resign.

Riot of William Fitz Osbert.

disturbed by quarrels which he had not time to attend to. Early in 1196, Richard, impatient at the delay of the inquiry which he had directed in 1194 to be made into the receipts of the royal officers, sent over two of his confidential servants, Philip of Poitiers the bishop-elect of Durham, and the abbot of Caen, to conduct the investigation¹. The purpose was defeated by the death of the abbot, but the archbishop seems to have regarded the mission as a sign of the king's distrust. He offered to resign the justiciarship; and with some difficulty prevailed on the king to accept the offer: but before the resignation was completed he saw reason to withdraw it, and, having represented to the king the enormous sums which had been raised during his administration, continued two years longer in office². Almost at the same moment the discontent felt by the poorer citizens of London at the way in which the taxes were collected broke into open revolt. William Fitz-Osbert, who was an old crusader and apparently a hot-headed politician, took the lead in the rising. The poorer citizens complained that the whole burden fell upon them: the tallages were collected by poll, 'per capita;' William insisted that they should be assessed in proportion to the property of the payers. Unfortunately for the citizens, their leader by his violence brought down upon him the vengeance of the archbishop, and having fallen a victim in the strife, was regarded by the one party as a felon and by the other as a martyr³. We do not learn that the Londoners received any benefit from the outbreak. The monks of Canterbury however, who hated the archbishop, took advantage of the fact that the blood of the rioter had been shed at the command of the justiciar in their peculiar church of S. Mary le Bow, and added a fresh accusation to the list of charges on account of which Innocent III ultimately ordered Hubert to resign his secular office. A third scutage was levied in this year. In 1197 the justiciar issued an assize intended to secure the uniformity of weights and measures in all parts of the kingdom. This proposition was unable to make way against the usages of the nation: the amount of traffic was not yet so great or so generally diffused as to make it indispensable, and the severity of some of the penalties induced the judges to set it aside early in the reign of John. But it had considerable importance in itself, and formed the basis of one of the articles of the Great Charter¹.

¹ Hoveden, iv. 5; W. Newb. v. c. 19.

² Hoveden, iv. 12, 13.

³ Hoveden, iv. 5; R. Diceto, c. 691; W. Newb. v. c. 20; Gervase, c. 1591. Hoveden, unless he is speaking ironically, applauds the conduct of William Fitz-Osbert: Ralph de Diceto, the dean of S. Paul's, who was an eye-witness, speaks of him as a mere demagogue. William of Newburgh gives a long account of the events, and treats him judicially. He was a disreputable man who, having failed to obtain the king's consent to a piece of private spite, made political capital out of a real grievance of the people. The whole story is worked out by Palgrave in the preface to the Rotuli Curie Regis.

Scutage of 1196.

Assize of Measures.

The history of the next year, 1198, furnishes two events of great importance. In a council of the barons held at Oxford, the archbishop laid before them a demand made by the king that they should provide him a force for his war in Normandy; three hundred knights were to be furnished, each to receive three English shillings every day and to serve for a year. There can be no doubt that the demand was unprecedented, whether we consider the greatness of the amount, £16,425, or the definiteness of the proposition. But neither point caused the actual objection. The bishop of Lincoln, S. Hugh of Avalon, the Carthusian friend of Henry II, declared that he would not assent to the grant. In vain the archbishop, and the treasurer the bishop of London, pleaded the royal necessities; the independent prelate declared that the lands of his church were bound to render military service within England and there only: he had, he said, fought the battle of his church for thirteen years; this impost he would not pay; rather than do so, he would go back to his home in Burgundy. To the archbishop's further discomfiture, the example of S. Hugh was followed by Bishop Herbert of Salisbury, who had had the regular ministerial training and was closely connected with the ruling officers of the Exchequer. The opposition was so far successful that the archbishop withdrew the proposal, and shortly after resigned². This event is a landmark of constitutional history:

In 1198 the king's demand for money is refused; opposition of S. Hugh of Lincoln, and Herbert of Salisbury.

Resignation of the justiciar.

¹ Hoveden, iv. 33, 34, 172.

² Hoveden, iv. 40; Vita S. Hugonis, p. 248; Select Charters, pp. 247, 248.

for the second time a constitutional opposition to a royal demand for money is made, and made successfully. It would perhaps be too great an anticipation of modern usages to suppose that the resignation of the minister was caused by his defeat.

The scheme for collecting the carucage of 1198.

The other remarkable matter of the year is the imposition of a carucage—a tax of five shillings on each carucate or hundred acres of land. This was the Danegeld revived in a new and much more stringent form; and, in order to carry out the plan, a new survey on the principle of Domesday was requisite. Even from this the justiciar did not shrink. A knight and a clerk were sent out into each county, to report on the 31st of May on the extent, liability, and tenure of the land to be taxed: these officers were, in conjunction with the sheriff in each county, to call before them the members of the county court, the stewards of barons, lords and bailiffs, the reeve and four men of each township, whether free or villein, and two knights for every hundred: an oath was to be taken from all parties, that they would speak the truth, and declare how many carucates, or what wainage for ploughs, there were in each township. Even the words of the Domesday commission were repeated. The account was registered in four rolls: three kept by the knight, the clerk, and the sheriff, and one divided among the stewards of the barons whose interests it concerned. The money was collected by two knights and the bailiff of each hundred, who accounted for it to the sheriff; and the sheriff accounted for it at the Exchequer¹. The inquiry, which so forcibly recalls that of 1086, has a significance which does not belong to the great precedent, unless we regard the machinery of the oath taken by the representatives of the townships and hundreds in the two commissions in contrary lights. It may be questioned whether the jurors of 1086 or those of 1198 had greater freedom and responsibility: but we look on the former as part of an institution then for the first time adapted to the administration of the English government; whilst the latter appear as part of a system the disciplinary force of which had nearly completed its work: the plan adopted in the Assize of Arms and in the ordinance of the Saladin tithe is now applied to the assessment of real property; the principle of representation is gradually enlarging its sphere of work, and the process now used for the calculation will before long be applied to the granting of the tax, and ultimately to the determination of its expenditure.

A new Domesday Inquest.

¹ Hoveden, iv. 46 sq.

Its importance.

This demand of carucage is by no means the last constitutional act of the reign. It is not known whether the survey was really carried out. The resignation of the archbishop took place a few weeks after the day fixed for the report¹; and the tax was not collected without difficulty. The religious houses having demurred to the payment, the king directed a proclamation to be made by which the clergy were practically outlawed: if any man injured a clerk or regular he was not to be forced to compensate him; but if the clerk or regular were the aggressor, he must be brought to justice. The threat was sufficient to bring the monks to submission, and they purchased a reconciliation².

The religious are compelled to pay the tax.

Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the successor of Hubert, who came into office on the 11th of July, 1198, began his career as minister by a severe forest visitation, in the conducting of which he reissued and enlarged the Assize of Woodstock³. He also directed a new 'iter' of the justices on nearly as large a scale as that of 1194⁴. The agenda of this 'iter' contain a direction for the elections of the nominators of the Great Assize to be made before the justices: a proof that these functionaries were not now appointed by the sheriffs, but elected by the suitors of the county court. The Forest Assize also directs that the whole body of the suitors of that assembly shall attend at the sessions of the forest justices⁵. These two measures, together with the severe treatment of the clergy just mentioned, seem to mark the character of the new justiciar as austere and even oppressive. Richard no doubt found in him a servant whose conscience was less strict than Hubert's, and whose position as a layman and an earl was less assailable than that of the archbishop. His real importance as a public man belongs to the next reign.

Geoffrey
Fitz-Peter
justiciar.

Iter of 1198.

Severity of the government.

¹ Hoveden, iv. 47, 48.

⁴ Ibid. 61.

² Ibid. 66.

⁵ Ibid. 63.

³ Ibid. 63.

Richard
dies, Apr. 6, 1199.

The laborious and quarrelsome career of Richard came to an end in April, 1199. His subjects, fortunately for themselves, saw very little of him during the ten years of his reign. They heard much of his exploits, and reconciled themselves in the best way they could to his continual exactions. Under his ministers they had good peace, although they paid for it heavily : but the very means that were taken to tax them trained them and set them thinking. The ministers themselves recognised the rising tendency to self-government in such measures as those we have described. To Richard the tendency would be probably unintelligible. He was a bad king : his great exploits, his military skill, his splendour and extravagance, his poetical tastes, his adventurous spirit, do not serve to cloak his entire want of sympathy, or even consideration, for his people. He was no Englishman, but it does not follow that he gave to Normandy, Anjou, or Aquitaine the love or care that he denied to his kingdom. His ambition was that of a mere warrior : he would fight for anything whatever, but he would sell everything that was worth fighting for. The glory that he sought was that of victory rather than conquest. Some part of his reputation rests on the possession of qualities which the English had no opportunity of testing : they were proud of a king whose exploits awakened the wonder of Christendom, they murmured against ministers whose mediation broke the force of an oppression which would otherwise have crushed them. Otherwise the latter years of the reign were years of progress in wealth and in the comfort which arises from security : a little respite before the tyranny that was coming. The reign of Richard is marked by no outbreak of feudal insubordination : had there been any such, the strength of the administration would have been sufficient to crush it. But the great nobles were, like the king himself, partly engaged abroad ; those of them who were left at home had learned the lesson of submission ; they saw themselves surrounded by a new body of equals, sprung from and working with the ministerial families, and they were assimilating themselves to this new nobility in forming hopes and ambitions more truly national. The feeling towards union that was working in character.

His

His reputation.

Comparative peace of England.

Quietness of
the barons.

society generally was affecting the barons not less than the people whom they were to lead on to liberty.

151. The death of Richard was so sudden, and the order of the kingdom so complete at the time, that John, who had received the fealty of the barons by his brother's order¹, might have secured the throne without difficulty before the country generally knew that it was vacant. Instead of doing this he allowed an interregnum of six weeks. Secure, as it would seem, of England, he spent the time in taking possession of the treasures of Richard, and attempting to obtain the continental provinces on which Arthur, as the son of his elder brother, had a half-acknowledged claim. Whilst he was receiving the surrender of the castles of Anjou and Maine and the investiture of the duchy of Normandy, Archbishop Hubert and William Marshall were doing their best to strengthen his position in England². John's six weeks' delay in France gave to the discontented barons an opportunity of reviewing their grievances. The traditional principle, that when the king dies the peace dies with him, was now in full force: seventy years were to elapse before it was superseded by the doctrine of the immediate succession of the heir, expressed later in the maxim that the king never dies: now it had time to work. All who had castles in their hands fortified and garrisoned them; and not a few broke out into open rapine immediately on hearing of the fate of Richard³. The archbishop found it no easy task to enforce order, when once the spell was broken. His first measure was to direct that the oath of fealty and peace should be everywhere taken: the sheriffs brought together the force of the shires for the purpose, and all attempts at resistance were put down, the spoil restored, and the offenders brought to justice⁴. It was Interregnum after the death of Richard.

Archbishop Hubert and William Marshall enforce order.

¹ Hoveden, iv. 83: 'Cum autem rex de vita desperaret, divisit Johanni fratri suo regnum Angliæ, et fecit fieri prædicto Johanni fidelitates ab illis qui aderant.' John was not present; there is surely in this anxiety of the dying king to provide for his brother and for the succession at least one redeeming trait: Richard knew how to forgive. R. Coggeshale, p. 170.

² Hoveden, iv. 86.

³ R. Coggeshale, pp. 169, 170.

⁴ Hoveden, iv. 88; R. Coggeshale, p. 170.

Apprehensions of the great earls.

more difficult to allay the apprehensions and secure the adhesion of the earls and other great vassals, who, although they had acquiesced in Richard's oppressions, were by no means inclined to accept the same treatment from John. He had made himself personal enemies during his short tenure of power; some feared and some despised him. The feudal spirit was not extinct, and every one who had anything to gain thought this a fair time for the attempt. The king of Scots might press his claim on the northern counties, the earl of Chester might even support the cause of his stepson Arthur; Roger de Lacy had hanged two knights for betraying his castles to John; the earl of Hertford had claims on the earldom of Gloucester, which John held in right of his wife; the earl Ferrers held his earldom with no very sure hand. The archbishop, acting in conjunction with the justiciar and William Marshall, called together at Northampton all those of whom any apprehension was entertained, and made them the most ample promises on behalf of John: not a grievance, public or private, was to remain without redress. Even the Scottish claims should receive due attention; and wherever a right was in danger the king, as soon as there should be a king, would confirm and enforce it¹. The promises of the three ministers were accepted as sufficient security, and all the barons, including Earl David of Huntingdon, the brother of the king of Scots, took the required oaths. In the meanwhile John, having made good his hold on Normandy, crossed over to England for his coronation, which took place on the feast of the Ascension, May 27, 1199.

The archbishop procures their adhesion to John.

Arrival of John.

His coronation.

Speech of Hubert Walter.

The ceremony was performed with the same pomp as had been used for Richard: the form of election and the solemn promises of good government were repeated. But a speech is preserved by Matthew Paris, which, whether or no the words are genuine, seems to show that there was something exceptional in the proceedings; some attempt on the archbishop's part to give to the formality of the election a real validity, which perhaps might be useful if the claims of Arthur should ever be revived. Hubert declared, the historian tells us, that the right to reign is conferred by the election which the nation makes after invoking the grace of the Holy Ghost: Saul and David were made kings, not because they were of royal race, but the one because of his strength and fitness, the other because of his sanctity and humility. Still, if in the royal stock there were one of distinct pre-eminence, the choice should fall more readily on him. Richard had died without an heir; the grace of the Holy Ghost had been asked for: in John were united royal blood, and the good qualities of prudence and energy: all together then elected John. The cry 'Vivat rex' was the answer of the assembled crowd. The archbishop moreover, when he received the coronation oath, adjured him on God's behalf that he would not take the honour to himself without a full purpose to keep his oath, and John replied that by God's help in good faith he would keep all that he had sworn¹. Later events gave to both these declarations a character which, in the case of ordinary kings, they might not have had. Matthew Paris supposes that the archbishop, warned of John's utter faithlessness and foreseeing the troubles of his reign, wished to impress upon him and upon the people that as an elected king he must do his duty under pain of forfeiture. But the speech of Hubert was probably in itself nothing more than a declaration of John's fitness to be elected, the recollection of which would naturally recur to those who heard it when they found out how unfit he was to reign. The enunciation however of the elective character of the royal dignity is of very great importance. The circumstances too of John's accession recall forcibly those which attended that of William Rufus, when Lanfranc strove in vain to bind the conscience of the prince in whose exaltation he had so large a share. In more than one respect Hubert Walter played the part of Lanfranc to John.

¹ Hoveden, iv. 88.

Principle of election enunciated.

Oath of good government.

The business of the coronation was followed by the investiture of William Marshall and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter as earls²; a ceremony which had been long delayed. The chancellorship was

Investiture
of earls.

Hubert
chancellor.

¹ Matthew Paris (ed. Wats), p. 197. In the declaration made by Lewis, on his invasion of England in 1216, long before Matthew Paris wrote, this speech of Hubert is distinctly referred to as affecting the claim of inheritance. See Foedera, i. 140.

² Hoveden, iv. 90.

Faithfulness of Hubert.

undertaken by the archbishop, notwithstanding the warning of Hugh Bardulf, who told him plainly that he was derogating from his dignity and making a dangerous precedent. Hubert probably saw that John would need both advice and restraint, which no one of inferior position or weaker character would be able to enforce. The justiciar continued in office; but most of the sheriffs were either removed to other counties or dismissed altogether. No charter of liberties is known to have been issued; if any such had existed it could scarcely have failed to be brought forward in the struggle that followed.

John goes to Normandy,
but makes peace and returns early
in 1200.

John had no time to lose in England: he hurried to Nottingham to meet the king of Scots, who did not come; and then, on the 20th of June, left England, taking with him a large number of the barons to prosecute the war in Normandy¹. Immediately on his arrival he made a truce with Philip, who for the moment was supporting the claims of Arthur in Anjou and Maine: after Christmas a treaty was concluded between the two kings, and John returned to England to raise money for the purchase of peace, a sum of 30,000 marks. He stayed in the kingdom from the 27th of February to the 28th of April, and took a carucage of three shillings on the hide; a scutage of two marks had just been taken on account of the expedition to Normandy. Both these exactions were in excess of the usual rate², and the chroniclers furnish us with no further evidence of the way in which they were imposed and levied, than that the king demanded the aid, and an edict went forth from the justices that it should be paid; a grant of a fortieth of moveables for the Crusade was obtained in the following year by letters addressed by the king to the barons and by the justiciar to the sheriffs³. After a second vain attempt to secure the homage of the king of Scots, John again sailed for France, where he remained until September; employed, after the conclusion of the peace in May, chiefly in divorcing his wife, Hawisia of Gloucester, and marrying Isabella of Angoulême,—acts which caused in England the alienation of the whole of the Gloucester influence from the

New taxes.

John returns to France in April and marries a new wife.

¹ Hoveden, iv. 92, 93.

² Ibid. 107; R. Coggeshale, p. 180.

³ Hoveden. iv. 188, 189.

king, and in France the active and malicious hostility of the house of Lusignan, to whose head Isabella had been betrothed. The month after his return John and his wife were crowned at Westminster¹; the fealty of the king of Scots was finally received in a great council of bishops and barons of the two kingdoms, and the court made a progress through the north². At Easter, 1201, the coronation ceremonial was again performed at Canterbury³; and the state of peace and order which had lasted for two years began almost immediately afterwards to break up. The remainder of the history of the reign may be briefly examined under the three heads of foreign affairs, the great ecclesiastical quarrel, and the struggle which led to the granting of Magna Carta.

On his return he is crowned, Oct. 8; receives the Scottish homage, Nov. 22; and is crowned a third time, Mar. 25, 1201.

152. John possessed in his mother, Queen Eleanor, who was now nearly eighty, a counsellor of much experience in continental politics, of great energy and devoted faithfulness. As long as she lived his fortunes in France were not hopeless; she had herself headed an army against Arthur, and her last public act was to fetch her granddaughter, Blanche of Castille, from Spain, in order to strengthen the new alliance between Philip and John by a royal marriage. Unfortunately the peace so made was very shortlived; quarrels on the Norman frontier called John from England in June, 1201, and he did not return until the inheritance of his fathers had passed away from him. Early in 1202 Philip, having obtained a respite from his matrimonial troubles, and found time to listen to the complaints of Hugh of Lusignan, summoned John to trial for oppressing the barons of Poitou⁴. John refused to attend, and was declared to have forfeited his fiefs as a contumacious vassal. Arthur, taking advantage of the confusion, raised a force and besieged his grandmother in the castle of Mirabel, where he was captured by John; and after some mysterious transactions, disappeared finally Foreign politics of John's early years.

Peace in 1200 with France.

John goes to Normandy in 1201.

Philip in 1202 declares that he has forfeited his fiefs.

Arthur captured.

¹ Hoveden, iv. 139. R. Coggeshale says more particularly that the king wore his crown, but the queen was consecrated; p. 182. R. Diceto says, 'ipse rex eadem die pariter coronatus est;' c. 707. ² Hoveden, iv. 140 sq.

³ Ibid. 160. R. Diceto, c. 709: 'instinctu archiepiscopi.'

⁴ Rigord (Bouquet, xvii. 54); R. Coggeshale, p. 208; R. Wendover, iii. 167; Alberic of Trois Fontaines, p. 423; Will. Armoric. (Bouquet, xvii. 75).

John a second time condemned to forfeiture.

Loss of Normandy.

John returns to England in 1203.

Death of Eleanor.

John's faint attempts to recover his states.

Separation of Normandy from England.

on the 3rd of April, 1203. Philip, who believed with the rest of the world that John had murdered him, summoned him again to be tried on the accusation made by the barons of Brittany¹. Again John was contumacious, and this time Philip himself undertook to enforce the sentence of his court. City after city castle after castle, fell before him. The Norman barons were unwilling to fight the battles of a king who wasted his opportunities and would scarcely strike a blow for himself. In November, 1203, John returned to England and left Normandy to its fate²; he distrusted the barons, and they distrusted him. In the following spring both Normandy and Anjou were lost; John pretending to raise an army in England, and selling to the barons his licence to absent themselves, or exacting scutages on the pretence that they had deserted him. Eleanor died on the 1st of April, 1204³; and the month of July saw Philip supreme in the whole of Normandy, Maine, Anjou, and Touraine. John never again set foot in Normandy: in 1205 he raised an army, but dismissed it. In 1206⁴ he made an attempt to recover Poitou, where he still had some ground, but was obliged to purchase a truce of two years by surrendering his last hold on the Norman and Angevin inheritance. In 1214 again, after his quarrel with the Church was settled, he made an expensive and fruitless expedition to Guienne, which likewise ended in a truce.

Normandy was at last separated from England. The Norman barons had had no choice but between John and Philip. For the first time since the Conquest there was no competitor, son, brother, or more distant kinsman, for their allegiance. John could neither rule nor defend them. Bishops and barons alike welcomed or speedily accepted their new lord. The families that had estates on both sides of the Channel divided into two branches, each of which made terms for itself; or having balanced their interests in the two kingdoms, threw in their lot ¹ See Le Baud, Hist. Bret. p. 210; Morice, Hist. Bret. i. 132; Foedera, i. 140; R. Wendover, iii. 273; M. Paris, p. 283; Chron. Lanercost, p. 2; Ann. Margam, p. 27; Walter of Coventry, ii. pref. xxxii, xxxiii.

² M. Paris, p. 209.

³ Ann. Waverley, A.D. 1204.

⁴ M. Paris, p. 214; Foedera, i. 95.

with one or other, and renounced what they could not save. Almost immediately Normandy settles down into a quiet province of France; a province which Philip was willing to govern by Norman law, and to indulge in such free customs as the Normans could challenge as their own. For England the result of the separation was more important still. Even within the reign of John it became clear that the release of the barons from their connexion with the Continent was all that was wanted to make them Englishmen. With the last vestiges of the Norman inheritances vanished the last idea of making England a feudal kingdom. The Great Charter was won by men who were maintaining, not the cause of a class, as had been the case in every civil war since 1070, but the cause of a nation. From the year 1203 the king stood before the English people face to face; over them alone he could tyrannise, none but they were amenable to his exactions: and he stood alone against them, no longer the lord of half of France, or of a host of strong knights who would share with him the spoils of England. The royal power and the royal dignity that had towered so haughtily over the land in the last two reigns was subjected to a searching examination: the quarrels of the next few years revealed all the weakness of the cause which had lately been so strong, and the strength of the nation which had so lately been well contented to sustain the strength of its oppressor.

Importance of the separation.

Consolidation of the English nationality.

The king face to face with his people.

153. As the death of Eleanor marks the collapse of John's continental power and the end of the dynastic system of the Conqueror¹, that of Hubert Walter marks the termination of the alliance between the king and the clergy which had been cemented by Lanfranc, and had not been completely broken by the quarrel of Anselm, or even by that of Becket. The archbishop died in July, 1205; John lost his wisest adviser by an event which itself launched him in circumstances requiring the

The death of Hubert Walter produces the quarrel between John and the clergy.

¹ The prophecy of Merlin was fulfilled, 'Gladius a sceptro separatus est,' the sword of the duchy was separated from the sceptre of the kingdom. R. Coggeshale, p. 219. An illustration of the process of separation may be found as early as 1199, when the earls of Pembroke and Clare divided the Giffard estates, the former taking the 'esneccia et caput' in Normandy, the latter in England.

John with a fair cause puts himself in the wrong.

most prudent counsel. Engaged in a quarrel from which a little circumspection would have saved him, he chose to enter the lists against Innocent III; matching his own low cunning at once against the consummate diplomacy of the Curia and the aspiring statesmanship of the greatest of all the popes. Foiled in his attempt to place a creature of his own on the throne of Canterbury, and unwilling to agree in a compromise which he had himself made imperative, he refused to receive the newly-consecrated archbishop, and exposed the country to the shame and horrors of an interdict.

Chronology of the struggle.

Not to dwell in this place on the important questions of the bearing of this quarrel on the history of the Church, it may be sufficient to mark the epochs of the struggle, during the whole of which John continued in the British islands. Hubert Walter died on the 12th of July, 1205; the appeals of the monks of Canterbury and of the suffragan bishops, with an application from John for the confirmation of his nominee, were carried to Rome before Christmas. The pope decided against all the claims in December, 1206, and, taking advantage of the presence of the monks with letters of authorisation from John, prevailed on them to elect Stephen Langton. John refused the royal assent, and Innocent chose to regard it as dispensable. In June, 1207, he consecrated the new archbishop. John persevered in his refusal to receive Langton; the kingdom was placed under interdict on the 23rd of March, 1208; and in 1209 the king was declared excommunicate. Year after year the pope attempted to renew negotiations, but each year the attempt failed. The king seized the estates of the clergy, and many of the bishops fled from the kingdom¹. The large revenues thus made available were used by John in making enormous military preparations: he made expeditions to Wales and Ireland, and grew richer and stronger as he grew more contumacious. In 1211 the pope declared that unless the king would submit he would issue a bull absolving his subjects from their allegiance, would depose him from his throne, and commit the execution of the mandate to Philip of France. The news of

The Interdict.

John's use of it to exact money.

Threat of deposition.

¹ Walter of Coventry, ii. pref. pp. liv-liv.

this determination brought into action a widely-spread feeling of disaffection which, if it existed before, had not yet found vent. The barons had sat still whilst the bishops were plundered. Some of the ministers, if not all, sympathised with John, and made their profit out of the spoil. But the great majority of the people, noble as well as simple, watched in anxious suspense for the event of the struggle.

Neutrality
of the barons.

John however had made private enemies as well as public ones; he trusted no man, and no man trusted him. The threat of deposition aroused all his fears, and he betrayed his apprehensions in the way usual with tyrants. The princes of Wales had just concluded a peace with him; they were the first to take advantage of the papal threat, and renewed the war. John hanged their hostages and summoned an army for a fresh invasion of their country; the army assembled, but John, warned of the existence of a conspiracy, did not venture to lead it into Wales. In panic fear he dismissed his host, and shut himself up in Nottingham Castle. Gathering courage after a fortnight's seclusion he arrested some of the barons, whom he suspected not so much of conspiring as of having power to injure him, and seized their castles¹. This proceeding alarmed the few nobles who had really entertained designs against him. Eustace de Vesci and Robert Fitz-Walter, the chiefs of the party, fled to France. The king next tried to propitiate the people: he remitted the fines which had been exacted during a recent visitation of the forests; he abolished some vexatious customs which prevailed in the ports; and took other measures for the preservation of peace. He then compelled those bishops who still remained in England to acknowledge by letter that the sums of money which he had exacted from them since the beginning of the reign had been paid by them as their own free gift². In the meantime he was negotiating continually with the pope; and Philip of France was collecting his forces for an invasion.

John's misgivings.

Welsh war.

He seizes
the castles of the barons whom he suspects.

He courts
the people, and negotiates with the pope.

The spring of 1213 saw the close of this part of the struggle.

¹ Walt. Cov. ii. 207; M. Paris, p. 231.

² Walt. Cov. ii. 207; M. Paris, p. 232.

In 1213 he prepares to submit.

John had every reason to fear the strength of Philip, and no reason whatever to trust in the attachment of his people. In spite of his own scoffing disregard of religion, he trembled at the papal excommunication, the dire effects of which he saw in the downfall of his nephew the Emperor Otto; but above all he dreaded the fulfilment of the prophecy of Peter of Wakefield, that on the approaching feast of the Ascension he should be no longer king¹. In abject alarm he surrendered every point for which he had been struggling. He made his submission to the pope, accepted Langton as archbishop, undertook to repay the money exacted from the churches, and, as a crowning humiliation, surrendered his kingdom to the see of Rome, receiving it again as a papal vassal subject to tribute, and swearing fealty and promising liege homage to the pope. The pacification was arranged on the 15th of May. For a moment it was accepted as a solution of all difficulties²: no one seemed to see that it created a new one which was greater than all and comprehended all that had preceded it: but it was only for a moment; before the first measures preliminary to the execution of the treaty were taken, a new and still more formidable question arose, from the determination of the barons not to obey John's command to serve in France.

He surrenders his crown to the pope.

Formidable attitude of the barons.

154. The attitude of the barons had been more or less threatening since the beginning of the reign: they had indeed acquiesced in the plunder of the churches, partly because they saw in it one way of diverting the king's oppressive policy from themselves. The moment the ecclesiastical difficulty was overcome, the question of their rights and of the king's infringement of them emerged. We have seen that their adhesion to John at his accession had been purchased by a promise that he would do them justice: they had claimed the fulfilment of the promise in 1201, when, on their refusal to go to Normandy until they were satisfied, John seized their castles and demanded their sons as hostages³. Since then their grounds of complaint had been

Their grievances.

¹ Walt. Cov. ii. 208; M. Paris, p. 232.

² Walt. Cov. ii. 210, 211; M. Paris, pp. 234-237.

³ Hoveden, iv. 161.

accumulating. They had been shamelessly taxed: the carucage had been in John's first year raised from two to three shillings on the carucate; the scutage from a pound to two marks on the knights' fee: year after year the scutage had been taken as a matter of course, and when Geoffrey of York had raised his voice against the imposition of the carucage he had been summarily silenced¹. In 1203 the king had exacted a seventh of the moveable property of his barons²; in 1204 he had taken an aid from the knights³; in 1207 a thirteenth of moveables from the whole country. In this last case Archbishop Geoffrey of York, following the example of S. Thomas and S. Hugh, resisted the demand when it was laid before the council; the clergy refused to give, but the king exacted the tax notwithstanding, and sent their champion into exile⁴. Again and again he had demanded the military service of the barons, and each time he had shown his distrust and cowardice. In 1201 the forces assembled at Portsmouth were allowed to return home on payment of money to the king⁵; in 1202 and 1203, when they reached Normandy, they found the king unwilling to fight, and having returned home in disgust found themselves obliged to redeem their desertion by enormous fines⁶. In 1205 he had brought another great host together at Portsmouth, and had even pretended to sail for France; but he had gone no farther than Wareham, and on his return had accepted money and dismissed the army⁷. The barons were not without the military pride natural to a warlike race; they despised the king who dared not lead them; they hated him for his mistrust of them; they looked with disgust on the mean trickery by which he qualified his capricious despotism. But they endured it all.

Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the earl of Essex, had continued to be John's justiciar ever since his accession. He was a man trained in the school of Henry II under Glanvill and Hubert Walter, had attained his earldom partly by a fortunate marriage and partly by making the best of his opportunities as one of the

¹ Hoveden, iv. 140.² M. Paris, p. 209.³ Ibid.⁴ M. Paris, p. 221; Ann. Waverley, p. 258. See p. 579 below.⁵ Hoveden, iv. 163.⁶ M. Paris, p. 209.⁷ Ibid. p. 212.Heavy scutages.Resistance of archbishop Geoffrey.Disgust of the barons.Character of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter.

He acted as a restraint on John.

king's counsellors¹. He had shown the qualities necessary to the minister of such a king, had carried out his master's plans, and allowed the unpopularity which they involved to fall upon his own head. It must be said in excuse for him, as for Hubert Walter, that he probably retained his position partly from a feeling that, if he resigned it, it would fall into worse hands. Both ministers were hated by the king, who felt that they restrained him; yet both were indispensable. Hubert had governed both the Church and the nation, Geoffrey governed the nation and allowed the king to ruin the Church. He had won by age and ability a commanding position even amongst those who were at first inclined to regard him as an upstart²; and the extent of his influence must be calculated from the permanent breach which followed his death.

John prepares to go to France:
reluctance of
the barons.

To return however to the events of the year 1213. The submission of the king to the pope had been accomplished; the fatal anniversary had passed over, and John was still a king: Peter of Wakefield was hanged. It was time to reply to the threats of Philip; and this could not be done better than by an expedition to France. John, elated by the naval victory at Damme, proposed it to the barons; they alleged that he was still excommunicate, and refused to follow him³. This plea was soon set aside: the archbishop landed on the 16th of July, and absolved the king at Winchester, exacting from him an express renewal of his coronation oath and a promise to abolish all evil customs⁴. Again

His absolu-tion, and new oath.

¹ Hoveden, iii. pref. pp. xlvi, xlv; W. Cov. ii. pref. lxi, lxii.

² M. Paris, p. 243: 'Erat autem firmissima regni columna, utpote vir generosus, legum peritus, thesauris, reditibus et omnibus bonis instauratus, omnibus Angliæ magnatibus sanguine vel amicitia confederatus, unde rex ipsum præ omnibus mortalibus sine dilectione formidabat, ipse enim lora regni gubernabat.'

³ M. Paris, pp. 238, 239. Ralph of Coggeshale and the monk of Barnwell, copied by Walter of Coventry (ii. 212), give other reasons for the refusal of the barons; the literal terms of their tenure, their exhaustion after their long march, and their poverty. 'Barones Northanhumbrenses invitavit ut secum transfretarent: at illi pari animo eademque sententia contradixerunt asserentes non in hoc ei obnoxios esse secundum munia terrarum suarum, sed et in expeditionibus Anglicanis se nimis exhaustos et vehementer extenuatos.' R. Coggeshale, pp. 242, 243. 'Quippe qui longa expeditione vexati non facile possent tantum opus exhaustis aggredi cistarchiis.' W. Cov. ii. 212.

⁴ M. Paris, p. 239: 'Juravit rex, tactis sacrosanctis evangeliiis, quod

the king laid his proposals before the barons, and again he was met by a refusal: this time the northern barons declared that their tenure did not compel them to serve abroad and that they would not follow the king¹. It was the same ground which had been taken up by S. Hugh in 1198, and, although deficient in historical proof, was in accordance both with equity and with the altered state of things. It might be fair enough, when John was duke of Normandy, for his English barons to maintain him by arms in his existing rights; but when Normandy was lost, and lost by his fault, it by no means followed that they should engage in war to recover it. Whether he had a right to take them to Poitou was more than doubtful. The northern barons who alleged this plea were for the most part members of that second aristocracy which had grown up on the ruins of the Conquest families and had no stake in Normandy. They had been trained under the eye of Glanvill and Richard de Lucy; had been uniformly faithful to the king against the greater feudatories; had manfully discharged their duties in the defence against the Scots; and had already begun to show that propension towards political liberty and self-government which marks them during later history; for they were the forefathers of that great north country party which fought the battle of the constitution during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Indignant at their attitude of resistance, John prepared to take his usual prompt vengeance. He marched rapidly northwards: at Northampton the archbishop overtook him and prevailed on him to promise a legal and judicial investigation before proceeding to extremities². John however went on his way; advanced to refuse foreign service.

The barons

Conduct of the northern barons.

John goes into the north, Aug.
25 to Sept. 28.

sanctam ecclesiam ejusque ordinatos diligeret, defenderet et manuteneret contra omnes adversarios suos pro posse suo, quodque bonas leges antecessorum suorum et precipue leges Edwardi regis revocaret, et iniquas destrueret, et omnes homines suos secundum justa curiae suae judicia judicaret, quodque singulis redderet jura sua.

¹ M. Paris, p. 239, refers to this second application the excuse of poverty alleged by the barons: and no doubt the reasons mentioned by Ralph and Walter belong to this juncture; see p. 524, note 3.

² W. Cov. ii. 212; M. Paris, p. 239. Ralph of Coggeshale says that the king was prevailed on to renew his promises to the northern barons: 'Northanhumbrenses regi concordantur, mediantibus legato, archiepiscopo Cantuariensi et aliis episcopis et baronibus ea conditione ut liceat eis gaudere

He does homage to the legate.

Durham by way of a demonstration, but returned without doing anything, in as great haste as he had gone¹. On the 3rd of October he completed his transactions with the pope by doing homage to the legate Nicolas at London².

Assembly at
S. Alban's,
August 4;

Whilst John was thus employed, a series of very important meetings had been held by the justiciar and archbishop. In order to ascertain the amount due by way of restitution to the plundered bishops, a general assembly was called at S. Alban's on the 4th of August, which was attended not only by the bishops and barons, but by a body of representatives from the townships on the royal demesne, each of which sent its reeve and four legal men. In this council, for such is the name given it by the historians³, a much wider range of subjects was discussed than the assessment of the losses of the Church. The justiciar laid before the whole body the king's recent promise of good government, he issued an edict forbidding the illegal exactions, and referred to the laws of Henry I as the standard of the good customs which were to be restored⁴. This is the first occasion on which the laws of Henry I are recurred to as a basis of liberty, and it may be regarded as a mark of the vast increase in royal power which had accrued since the early years of Henry II. Probably few knew what the laws of Henry I were; but the archbishop took care that they should soon be informed. Another council was called at S. Paul's on the 25th of August, in which the laws of Henry I are mentioned.

atavis libertatibus.' But he places the agreement after the arrival of Cardinal Nicolas.

¹ See Sir T. D. Hardy's Itinerary of John, in the Introduction to the first volume of the Patent Rolls.

² W. Cov. ii. 214; M. Paris, p. 247.

³ M. Paris, p. 239: 'In crastino (sc. May 16) autem misit rex litteras ad omnes vicecomites regni Angliæ præcipiens ut de singulis dominicorum suorum villis quatuor legales homines cum præposito apud Sanctum Albanum pridie nonas Augusti facerent convenire. . . Interfuerunt huic concilio apud Sanctum Albanum Galfridus filius Petri et episcopus Wintoniensis cum archiepiscopo et episcopis et magnatibus regni.'

⁴ Ibid.: 'Ubi cunctis pace regis denunciata, ex ejusdem regis parte firmiter præceptum est quatenus leges Henrici avi sui ab omnibus in regno custodirentur et omnes leges iniquæ penitus enervarentur. Denunciatum est præterea vicecomitibus, forestariis, aliisque ministris regis, sicut vitam et membra sua diligunt, ne a quoquam aliquid violenter extorqueant, vel alicui injuriam irrogare præsumant, aut scotalla alicubi in regno faciant sicut facere consueverunt.'

and there Henry's charter was produced¹. It was seen at once that it furnished both a safe standing-ground and a precedent for a deliberate scheme of reform. The justiciar laid before the king the claims of the council, and died almost immediately after, on the 2nd of October².

Council of London. The charter of Henry I produced.

With him the king lost his hold upon the baronage, but his first thought was one of relief: 'When he arrives in hell,' he said, 'he may go and salute Hubert Walter; for by the feet of God, now for the first time am I king and lord of England.' This speech recalls the words addressed by the English to Henry I when he had humbled Robert of Belesme: but the circumstances were very different. The people had then rejoiced in the humiliation of a tyrant who was persecuting the king and themselves alike; John rejoices in the death of a faithful servant who had until now stood between him and the hatred of the people,—between the tyrant and his destined victims³. Geoffrey's successor was a foreigner; the king, to the great disgust of the barons, confided the justiciarship to Peter des Roches, the Poictevin bishop of Winchester⁴.

The king's remark on the death of the justiciar.

Peter des Roches succeeds.

The meeting at S. Alban's is the first occasion on which we find any historical proof that representatives were summoned to a national council. The reeve and four men were probably called upon merely to give evidence as to the value of the royal lands; but the fact that so much besides was discussed at the time, and that some important measures touching the people at large flowed directly from the action of the council, gives to their appearance there a great significance. To the first representative assembly on record is submitted the first draught of the reforms afterwards embodied in the Charter: the action of this council is the first hesitating and tentative step towards that great act in which Church, baronage, and people made their constitutional compact with the king, and their first sensible realisation of their corporate unity and the unity of their rights and interests. How the justiciar would have carried on the Importance of the assembly at S. Alban's.

It is a general meeting of representatives.

¹ M. Paris, p. 240.

² M. Paris, p. 243; W. Cov. ii. 215; R. Coggeshale, p. 243.

³ M. Paris, p. 243; see above, p. 308.

⁴ R. Coggeshale, p. 243.

Obscurity
of the historians.

undertaking we cannot even guess. Unfortunately, as is so often the case in great crises of history, the attention of the historians is devoted to points of minor interest; and when we should hear of great constitutional debates, we find only the record of the doings of the legates and the bishops. The one significant fact is this,—that the king on the 7th of November summoned a council at Oxford to which, besides the armed force of the knights, each sheriff is directed to send four discreet knights from his county to discuss with the king the business of the country¹. The four legal men of the demesne townships are replaced by the four discreet men of the shire: the very words, ‘ad loquendum nobiscum de negotiis regni nostri,’ are an omen of the institution of representative parliaments. Again however the historians forsake us, and we do not even know that the assembly was ever held.

The writ of November 7, 1213.

In 1214 John goes abroad
until Oct. 19.

The eventful year came to a close without overt action. Early in 1214 John went abroad and stayed there until October; when immediately on his return he called the northern barons to account for not accompanying him. But they had been beforehand with him. They had met on the pretence of pilgrimage at S. Edmund’s, and had there sworn that if the king delayed any longer to restore the laws and liberties, they would withdraw their allegiance, and would make war upon him until he should confirm the concession by a sealed charter. The propositions were to be laid before him immediately after Christmas; in the meantime a force was to be raised sufficient to begin if not to decide the struggle². The king however accelerated the crisis by demanding a scutage, which the barons refused to grant³.

Confederation of the barons at
S. Edmund’s.

¹ Report on the Dignity of a Peer, App. i. p. 2; Select Charters, p. 279.

² M. Paris, pp. 252, 253. The northern barons again took the lead. ‘Barones Northanhumbrie in unam coeuntes sententiam ut regem compellerent ad reformandam ecclesie et regni libertatem et ad abolendas pravas consuetudines, quas ad depressionem ecclesie et regni tam pater quam frater regis, cum his abusionibus quas idem rex adjecerat, olim susceperant, secundum quod rex anno praeterito juraverat, regem super his . . . orant et adhortantur, insuper et cartam Henrici primi proferunt.’ R. Coggeshale, p. 246.

³ ‘Dissensio orta est inter Johannem regem Angliae et quosdam de proceribus pro scutagio quod petebat ab illis qui non ierant nec miserant cum

John's first thought was to attempt to divide his enemies. The clergy might be detached from the barons by a promise of the freedom of election which had been so long withdrawn from them; and on the 21st of November a charter was issued to that effect¹. This failed of its purpose; for the bishops, with Langton at their head, had of course not taken part in the oath at S. Edmund's; they were one in counsel with the barons, but had not been compelled to break off relations with the king; nor could they have armed their retainers in the cause without throwing the country at once into civil war. Nothing more was done until after Christmas. On the feast of the Epiphany, John at the Temple received a deputation from the barons and heard their demands: smothering his indignation, he requested a truce until the first Sunday after Easter². This was agreed to; and the king employed the respite in renewed attempts to sow distrust among his enemies. He again issued the charter of freedom to the Church³, directed the oath of allegiance and fealty to be taken throughout England⁴ to him alone, and demanded a renewal of homage from his tenants-in-chief. Not content with this, he took the vow of Crusade⁵, involving in the guilt of sacrilege all who should raise their hands against him. But the barons were undismayed; they collected an army at Stamford, and marched as soon as the truce expired to Brackley in Northamptonshire. The king, who was at Oxford, sent the archbishop and William Marshall to demand their conditions; and the messengers brought back a long schedule of demands, which the king at once refused to grant. The barons, on the John grants freedom of election to the bishops.

He receives the barons, Jan. 6, 1215.

His measures of precaution.

Progress of the barons.

ipso in Pictaviam. Dantibus enim illud plurimis, contradixerunt ex Aquilonaribus nonnulli, illi videlicet qui anno praeterito regem ne in Pictaviam transiret impediunt, dicentes se propter terras quas in Anglia tenent non debere regem extra regnum sequi euntem scutagio juvare. E contrario rege id tanquam debitum exigente, eo quod in diebus patris sui necnon et fratris sic fieret, res ulterius processisset nisi legati praesentia obstitisset. Prolata est carta quaedam libertatum ab Henrico primo Anglis data, quam quasi in observandam cum sibi confirmari a rege proceres jam dicti postularent, dilata est res in annum alterum.' W. Cov. ii. 217, 218.

¹ Statutes of the Realm, i. 5; Select Charters, pp. 279-281.

² M. Paris, p. 253.

³ M. Paris, p. 263.

⁴ M. Paris, p. 253; W. Cov. ii. 218.

⁵ W. Cov. ii. 219.

The barons
enter London.

John is deserted by his court and grants
the Charter.

receipt of this news, proceeded by way of Northampton, Bedford, and Ware to London, where they were received with a hearty welcome on the 24th of May. The adhesion of the Londoners was followed by a great defection from the king's party; nearly all the members of his court and household obeyed the summons addressed to them by the confederacy, and left John without any power of resistance. Under these circumstances he set his seal to the articles proposed by the barons, and issued the Great Charter of liberties on the 15th of June at Runnymede¹.

Summary of the articles
of the Charter. ✕

155. The Great Charter, although drawn up in the form of a royal grant, was really a treaty between the king and his subjects; it was framed upon a series of articles drawn up by them², it contained the provision usual in treaties for securing its execution, and although in express terms it contained only one part of the covenant, it implied in its whole tenour the existence and recognition of the other. The king granted these privileges on the understanding that he was to retain the allegiance of the nation. It is the collective people who really form the other high contracting party in the great capitulation,—the three estates of the realm, not it is true arranged in order according to their profession or rank, but not the less certainly combined in one national purpose, and securing by one bond the interests and rights of each other severally and of all together. The Charter contains a clause similar to that by which Henry I tried to secure the rights of his subjects as against the mesne lords; but now the provision is adopted by the lords themselves for the security of fair and equal justice: 'All the aforesaid customs and liberties that we have granted to be held in our kingdom, so far as pertains to us, with reference to our vassals, all men of our kingdom, as well clerk as lay, shall observe, so far as pertains to them, with reference to their men³.' The barons maintain and secure the

Its treaty
character. ✕

It includes the whole people.

¹ M. Paris, pp. 252-255; W. Coventry, ii. 219-222; R. Coggeshale, pp. 247-249. The best account of the crisis is to be found in the preface prefixed by Blackstone to his edition of Magna Carta.

² Select Charters, pp. 281-288.

³ Articles of the Barons, § 48; Magna Carta, § 62. See above, p. 306.

right of the whole people as against themselves as well as against their master. Clause by clause the rights of the commons are provided for as well as the rights of the nobles; the interest of the freeholder is everywhere coupled with that of the barons and knights; the stock of the merchant and the wainage of the villein are preserved from undue severity of amercement as well as the settled estate of the earldom or barony¹. The knight is protected against the compulsory exaction of his services, and the horse and cart of the freeman against the irregular requisition even of the sheriff². In every case in which the privilege of the simple freeman is not secured by the provision that primarily affects the knight or baron, a supplementary clause is added to define and protect his right; and the whole advantage is obtained for him by the comprehensive article which closes the essential part of the charter.

It protects the rights of the commons.

This proves, if any proof were wanted, that the demands of the barons were no selfish exaction of privilege for themselves; it proves with scarcely less certainty that the people for whom they acted were on their side. The nation in general, the people of the towns and villages, the commons of later days, the Englishmen who had fought the battles of the Norman kings against the feudatories, had now thrown themselves on the side of the barons: John's tyranny had overthrown that balance of the powers of the State which his predecessors had striven with so much earnestness and so much policy to adjust. We do not indeed find, in the list of those who forced the king to yield, any names that prove the commons to have been influential in the drawing up of the articles: the conspicuous names are those of the northern barons, of the men of the great ministerial houses, and of that remnant of the Conqueror's baronage that had cut themselves loose from Normandy and Norman principles and reconciled themselves to the nobler position of leaders of their brother Englishmen. It was probably by the bishops, Langton in particular, and the legal members of the confederacy, that the rights of the freeholder were so carefully fenced round with pro-

The barons did not act selfishly.

The people were on their side.

Debt of the people to the bishops and lawyers.

¹ Art. Bar. § 8; Magna Carta, § 20.

² Art. Bar. § 20; Magna Carta, § 30.

The barons as leaders of the people.

visions. These men and their successors led the commons and acted for them until the Reformation, with little discord and still less jealousy of their rising influence; and it was the extinction of the class which furnished their natural leaders that threw the Church and the nation under the tyranny that followed the Wars of the Roses.

The Great Charter, a corporate act of the nation.

The Great Charter is the first great public act of the nation, after it has realised its own identity: the consummation of the work for which unconsciously kings, prelates, and lawyers have been labouring for a century. There is not a word in it that recalls the distinctions of race and blood, or that maintains the differences of English and Norman law. It is in one view the summing up of a period of national life, in another the starting-point of a new, not less eventful, period than that which it closes.

It is based on the Charter of Henry I.

Magna Carta in its completed form attests the account given by the historians of its origin and growth. It is based on the charter of Henry I; it follows the arrangement of that famous document, and it amplifies and expands it, so as to bring under the principles, which were for the first time laid down in A.D. 1100, all the particular rights, claims, and duties which had come into existence during the developments of the intervening century. As the whole of the constitutional history of England is little more than a commentary on Magna Carta, a brief summary of the articles, regarded as the outgrowth of the previous history, is all that is necessary or possible at this stage of our work.

Motive clause of the Charter.

The king declares himself moved to issue the charter, as his great-grandfather had done, by his pious regard for God and his desire for the benefit of his people: the counsellors by whose advice he acts, and whose names he enumerates, are the bishops and barons who had not taken an overt part against him, or who only at the last moment had joined the confederation which compelled him to yield.

Grant of Church liberties.

The first clause, again, as in the charter of Henry I, secures the rights of the Church; repeats and confirms the charter, twice issued already, for the free election to bishoprics, and the great principle so often appealed to both earlier and later, 'quod Anglicana Ecclesia libera sit'¹.

This is followed by a series of clauses protecting the tenants-in-chief of the Crown from the abuses of feudal right; a fixed sum is determined for the relief, as 'the ancient relief,' the very statement betraying the nature of the grievances²; the relief is altogether abolished where the right of wardship is exercised; the latter right is carefully limited; the disparagement of heirs by unequal marriages is forbidden; and the widow is secured against spoliation as well as against compulsion to take another husband³. The latter concession John had already declared himself willing to grant in that scheme of abortive reforms which he propounded, before his submission to the pope, in A.D. 1212. This portion of the charter closes with three articles in which the king renounces the oppressive means which had been used to secure the payment of debts to the Crown and to the Jews, in whose debts the Crown had an ulterior and contingent interest. These clauses show that the king's servants had departed from the rules which had prevailed in the Exchequer under Henry II, and which had been carefully drawn up so as to secure the rights of the Crown with the greatest regard to the safety of the debtor⁴.

Remedy of feudal abuses in the matters of relief, wardship, and marriage.

Remedy of the tyrannical exaction of debts.

The twelfth and three following articles are those to which the greatest constitutional interest belongs; for they admit the right of the nation to ordain taxation, and they define the way in which the consent of the nation is to be given. No scutage or aid, other than the three regular feudal aids, is henceforth to be imposed but by the common counsel of the nation, and the

The constitutional articles.

Limitation of aids and scutages.

¹ Magna Carta, § 1. Cf. the charter of Henry I, § 1; Stephen, Charter ii.; Select Charters, pp. 97, 114.

² Magna Carta, §§ 2-4; Art. Bar. §§ 1-3. Cf. Charter of Henry I, § 2; Assize of Northampton, § 4; Dialogus de Scaccario, lib. ii. c. 10: where the rule that a relief is not to be taken on the coming to age of a royal ward, is laid down as it is in the charter itself.

³ Art. Bar. §§ 4, 17; Magna Carta, §§ 6-8. Cf. Charter of Henry I, §§ 3, 4. Walter of Coventry says, 'sed et viduis dicitur propitius existisse,' of the reforms proposed in 1212; ii. 207.

⁴ Magna Carta, §§ 9-11; Art. Bar. §§ 5, 15, 16, 34, 35. Cf. Charter of Henry I, §§ 6-8; Dialogus de Scaccario, ii. 12-17; Assize of Northampton, § 4.

Method of summons to the national council.

common counsel of the nation is to be taken in an assembly duly summoned; the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and greater barons are to be called up by royal writ directed to each severally; and all who hold of the king in chief, below the rank of the greater barons, are to be summoned by a general writ addressed to the sheriff of their shire; the summons is to express the cause for which the assembly is called together; forty days' notice is to be given; and when the day has arrived the action of those members who obey the summons shall be taken to represent the action of the whole¹. This most important provision may be regarded as a summing-up of the history of parliament so far as it can be said yet to exist. It probably contains nothing which had not been for a long time in theory a part of the constitution: the kings had long consulted their council on taxation; that council consisted of the elements that are here specified, and had been summoned in a way analogous to if not identical with that here defined. But the right had never yet been stated in so clear a form, and the statement thus made seems to have startled even the barons; they had not ventured to claim it, and when they had the reins of power in their own hands they seem in the subsequent editions of the charter to have shrunk from repeating the clauses which contained it². It was for the attainment of this right that the struggles of the reign of Henry III were carried on; and the realisation of the claim was deferred until the reign of his successor. In these clauses however the nation had now obtained a clear, or comparatively clear, definition of the right on which their future political power was to be based.

Historical importance of these clauses.

Aids of mesne lords limited.

The limitation of royal exaction is supplemented by a corresponding limitation of the power of the mesne lords; the king is not to empower them to take aids except for the three recognised purposes, and then only such sums as are reasonable:

¹ Magna Carta, §§ 12-14; Art. Bar. § 32. The provision for the summoning of the council is not among the barons' articles, and probably expresses the earlier practice; see above, p. 467.

² This clause is not found in any of the numerous confirmations of the Great Charter.

nor is any one to be distrained to perform more than the proper service of his tenure¹.

The next series of clauses concern judicial proceedings: the suitors who are involved in Common Pleas are no longer to be compelled to follow the Curia Regis²: the trials are to be heard in some fixed place. The recognitions of novel disseisin, mort d'ancestor, and darrein presentment are henceforth to be taken in the county courts, before two justices who will visit each shire every quarter, and four knights chosen by the county court for the purpose³. The freeman is not to be amerced in a way that will ruin him, the penalty is to be fixed by a jury of his neighbourhood; earls and barons are to be amerced by their peers, and clerks only in proportion to their non-ecclesiastical property⁴. Such a clause proves that the careful provisions of the Exchequer on this point had been transgressed by the king, who had, as we learn from the historians, imposed ameracements of scandalous amount and with wanton tyranny, just as he compounded by fines for imaginary offences. The sheriffs, constables, coroners, and bailiffs of the king are forbidden to hold pleas of the Crown⁵; a further limitation on the power of the local magistrates, which had been already curtailed by the direction issued in Richard's reign that no sheriff should be justice in his own county. Such a provision shows some mistrust of the sheriffs on the part of both king and barons; but it was probably disregarded in practice. This is the first of a series of articles by which the abuse of the sheriff's authority is Judicial clauses; common pleas, assizes, ameracements, limitation of the power of the sheriff.

¹ Magna Carta, §§ 15, 16; Art. Bar. §§ 6, 7.

² Magna Carta, § 17; Art. Bar. § 8.

³ Magna Carta, §§ 18, 19; Art. Bar. 8. See the Assize of Northampton, § 5.

⁴ Magna Carta, §§ 20-23; Art. Bar. §§ 9-11. Cf. Dialogus de Scaccario, lib. ii. c. 14, where the order to be observed by the sheriffs in sales is prescribed: 'Mabilia cujusque primo vendantur, bobus autem arantibus, per quos agricultura solet exerceri, quantum poterint parcant, ne ipsa deficiente debitor amplius in futurum egere cogatur.' This is a piece of Henry's special legislation; Select Charters, p. 229.

⁵ Magna Carta, § 24; Art. Bar. § 14. The barons had asked that the sheriffs should not interfere in pleas of the Crown sine coronatoribus: the charter forbids both sheriffs and coroners (vel coronatores) to hold such pleas; a fact which seems to suggest that there was some jealousy of the elective officer. Cf. Assize of Richard I, A.D. 1194, art. 21; and see above, p. 505.

Remedy of Exchequer
abuses, and petty exactions.

restrained¹; the fermes of the counties and other jurisdictions are not to be increased; the debts due to the Crown which are collected by the sheriff are to be collected under the view of the lawful men of the neighbourhood; the goods of intestates are to go to their natural heirs; the royal officers are to pay for all the provisions which they take by requisition; they are not to take money in lieu of service from those who are willing to perform the service in person; they are not to seize the horses and carts of the freeman to do royal work, nor his wood without his consent; the lands of convicted felons are to be held by the Crown for a year and a day, and then to revert to the lords²; and the weirs in the Thames, the Medway, and the other rivers of England are to be removed.

Miscellaneous articles.

The remaining articles of general application are of a miscellaneous character; some laying down great principles, and others defining points of minute and occasional import.

Writ of Præcipe : measures :
inquests.

The use of the writ of Præcipe is limited³: the uniformity of weights and measures is directed in the words of Richard's assize⁴; the writ of inquest in cases where life and limb are concerned is to be granted freely⁵: the king will not claim the sole wardship of the minor who has other lords, except where he is the king's tenant by knight service⁶: no bailiff is to force a man to compurgation or ordeal without faithful

Privileges of merchants.

witnesses⁷. Merchants may go out and come in without paying exorbitant customs; and all lawful men may leave the kingdom and return except in time of war, or when the traveller belongs to a nation at war with the king⁸. The vassals of an escheated honour are not to be treated by the king as tenants-in-chief

Escheats.

¹ Magna Carta, §§ 25-33; Art. Bar. §§ 14-16, 18-23.

² See Dialogus de Scaccario, lib. ii. c. 10; As-ize of Clarendon, § 5.

³ Art. Bar. § 24; Magna Carta, § 34; Glanvill, lib. i. c. 6. See Blackstone, Comm. iii. 274; Brunner, Schwurgericht, pp. 405-407. It is a peremptory writ enjoining the sheriff to command the person in question to do some act, or show why he should not be compelled. It was in fact an evocation of the particular cause to the king's court.

⁴ Art. Bar. § 12; Magna Carta, § 35; Hoveden, iv. 33.

⁵ Art. Bar. § 26; M. C. § 36.

⁶ Art. Bar. § 28; Magna Carta, § 38.

⁷ Art. Bar. § 27; M. C. § 37.

⁸ Art. Bar. §§ 31, 32; Magna Carta, §§ 41, 42. A similar privilege had been granted by charter as early as Apr. 5, 1200. See Charter Rolls, p. 60.

of the Crown, but only to pay such reliefs and aids as they would owe to the mesne lord if there were one¹. The forest courts are not to compel the attendance of any man who is not directly concerned in the forest jurisdiction: this clause relieves the people of the shires in which the forests lie from the compulsory attendance directed by the Assize of Woodstock². It is followed by a still greater concession; all the forests made in the present reign are disforested, and all rivers placed in fence are thrown open; a thorough investigation of all the forest usages is to be made by an inquest of twelve sworn knights, and all the bad customs are to be abolished forthwith³. By these clauses, which form the only forest charter issued by John⁴, a great yet reluctant concession is made to a demand which had been increasing in intensity and listened to with stubborn disregard for a century and a half.

Remedy of the forest abuses.

Other clauses are of a more general character. The thirty-ninth and fortieth are famous and precious enunciations of principles. 'No free man shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseized, or outlawed, or exiled, or any wise destroyed; nor will we go upon him, nor send upon him, but by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land. To none will we sell, to none will we deny or delay, right or justice⁵.' The judicium parium was indeed no novelty; it lay at the foundation of all German law; and the very formula here used is probably adopted from the laws of the Franconian and Saxon Caesars; but it was no small gain to obtain the declaration in such terms from a king who by giving the promise made a confession of past misgovernment⁶.

Enunciation of general principles of justice.

The judicium parium.

¹ Art. Bar. § 36; Magna Carta, § 46.

² Art. Bar. § 39; Magna Carta, § 44. See the Assize of Woodstock, § 11; Select Charters, p. 151.

³ Art. Bar. § 47; Magna Carta, § 47. Cf. Charter of Henry I, § 10; and Stephen's second Charter.

⁴ The Forest Charter ascribed to him by Matthew Paris belongs to Henry III.

⁵ Art. Bar. §§ 29, 30.

⁶ Compare the following passages from the Libri Fendorum: Conrad the Salic (A.D. 1024-1036) says, 'Praecipimus . . . ut nullus miles . . . tam de nostris majoribus valvassoribus quam eorum militibus sine certa et convicta culpa suum beneficium perdat nisi secundum consuetudinem ante-

Judges to be skilled in the law.

Rights of patrons.

General application.

Temporary provisions.

Dismissal of mercenaries.

The Scots and Welsh.

Means of execution.

Another significant article pledges the king to confer the sheriffdoms and other judicial offices of the local courts only on men skilled in the law¹. Another secures to the founders of religious houses their rights of custody during vacancy²; and another forbids that any one should be taken or imprisoned on the appeal of a woman, except for the death of her husband³.

Such, with the provision for the application of the rules thus enunciated to the whole nation, are what may be called the general articles of the Charter. The remainder is composed of clauses of special and transient interest: the king undertakes to surrender all charters and hostages placed in his hands as securities, and to dismiss the detested group of foreign servants whom he had gathered round him either as leaders of mercenaries or as ministers of small tyrannies. As soon as the pacification is completed he will dismiss all his mercenaries, forgive and recall all whom he has disseized or exiled; he will then reform, on the principles already adopted, the forests made by his father and brother, and do justice in other ways, for many of the promises made in the earlier part of the Charter had no retrospective validity. The rights of the Welsh who have been oppressed are at the same future period to be determined and recognised; the Welsh princes and the king of Scots are to have justice done; and a general amnesty for all political offences arising out of the present quarrel is to be given⁴.

The enforcement of the Charter is committed to twenty-five barons, to be chosen by the whole baronage. These are emcessorum nostrorum et judicium parium suorum. . . Si contentio fuerit de beneficio inter capitaneos, coram imperatore defini debet; si vero fuerit contentio inter minores valvassores et majores de beneficio, in judicio parium suorum definiatur per judicem curtis.' Lib. Feud. I. xviii.—Lothar II says, 'Sancimus ut nemo miles adimatur de possessione sui beneficii nisi convicta culpa quae sit laudanda per judicium parium suorum sicut supra dictum est.' Ibid. c. xxii; Pertz, Legg. ii. 39; app. p. 185. In the laws of Henry I (so called) the same principle is laid down: 'Unusquisque per pares suos judicandus est.'

¹ Art. Bar. § 42; Magna Carta, § 45. On this principle the steward of a court-leet must be a learned steward.

² Art. Bar. § 43; Magna Carta, § 46.

³ Magna Carta, § 54.

⁴ Magna Carta, §§ 49-59, 62; Art. Bar. §§ 44-46.

powered to levy war against the king himself, if he refuse to do justice on any claim laid before him by four of their number; and in conjunction with the communa—the community of the whole realm—to distrain him, saving his royal person and queen and children¹.

The
twenty-five executors.

The last clause contains the enacting words, 'We will and firmly enjoin,' and the oath to be taken on the part of the king and on the part of the barons, that all these articles shall be observed in good faith and without evasion of their plain construction².

Enacting words and oath.

In this mere abstract of the Great Charter we have the summing-up of the rights and duties that have been growing into recognition whilst the nation was growing into consciousness. The Communa totius terrae, which is to join with the twenty-five barons in the execution of the Charter, has at last entered upon its career of constitutional life.

Recognition
of the national unity.

So great a boon as Magna Carta might almost excuse the men by whose agency it was won from a trial at the bar of history. But so much of the earlier fortunes of the constitution turns upon personal history, on the local, official, and family connexions of the great men, that we cannot dismiss the subject without the inquiry, Who were the men, and what was their training? Who were the barons that now impose limits on royal tyranny, and place themselves in the vanguard of liberty? How have they come to sit in the seats and wield the swords of those whom so lately we saw arrayed in feudal might against king and people?

Inquiry as to the persons who won the Charter.

The barons who took part in the transactions out of which Magna Carta emerges—and the whole baronage was in one way or another directly concerned in it—fall into four classes: those who began the quarrel in A.D. 1213 by refusing to follow the king to France; those who joined them after the councils held at S. Alban's and in S. Paul's; those who left the king in the spring of A.D. 1215 after the adhesion of the Londoners; and those who continued with him to the last. Each of these

Fourfold classification
of the baronage.

¹ Magna Carta, § 61; Art. Bar. § 49.

² Magna Carta, § 63.

divisions contained men who acted on the ground of public right, and others who were mainly influenced by private friendship and gratitude, or by the desire of avenging private wrongs.

The first class; the northern lords.

The first class was chiefly composed of the north country barons, the Northimbrani, Norenses, Aquilonares of the chroniclers. No list of them is given, but they can be easily distinguished in the roll of chiefs enumerated by Matthew Paris in connexion with the assembly at Stamford: they are Eustace de Vesci, Richard de Perei, Robert de Ros, Peter de Bruis, Nicolas de Stuteville, William de Mowbray, Simon de Kyme, Gilbert de la Val, Oliver de Vaux, John de Lacy the constable of Chester, and Thomas of Multon. All these are well-known names in the north; many of them appear in Domesday; but, with the exception of Mowbray and Lacy, not among the greater tenants-in-chief at the time of the Survey. They had sprung into the foremost rank after the fall of the elder house of Mowbray, and had many of them done service under Richard de Lacy and Ranulf Glanvill in the defence of the north. Eustace de Vesci, however, was closely connected by marriage with the king of Scots, and is said to have had, like Robert Fitz-Walter and William of Salisbury, cruel wrongs to avenge upon the king.

The second class; the feudal and ministerial lords.

The second division, containing the rest of the confederates who met at Stamford, embraced the remnant of the Conquest baronage, and the representatives of the families which had earned lands and dignities under Henry I and Henry II. Amongst these the most prominent is Robert Fitz-Walter, a grandson of Richard de Lacy and a descendant in the male line from the Norman house of Brionne. With him are Saer de Quenci earl of Winchester, the possessor of half the inheritance of the great house of Leicester; Henry Bohun earl of Hereford, and Roger Bigod earl of Norfolk, who appear side by side as their descendants did when they defied Edward I; Richard of Clare earl of Hertford, the brother-in-law, and Geoffrey de Mandeville earl of Essex, the husband, of the king's divorced wife; William Marshall the younger, the son of the great earl whose adhesion was the main support of John; Roger de Creissi, William Malduit, William de Lanvalei and others, whose names recall the justices of Henry II's Curia ; and with them Robert de Vere, Fulk Fitz-Warin, William Mallet, William de Beauchamp, two of the house of Fitz-Alan, and two of the house of Gant¹. Many of these have names the glories of which belong to later history : such of them as are of earlier importance may be referred to the two sources already indicated ; the great baronial families that had been wise enough to cast away the feudal aspirations of their forefathers, and the rising houses which had sprung from the ministerial nobility.

The Stamford confederates.

The third class, which clung to John as long as he seemed to have any hope in resistance, was headed by those earls who were closely connected by blood or by marriage with the royal house : Earl William of Salisbury, the king's natural brother ; William of Warenne, the son of Earl Hamelin and cousin of John, and Henry earl of Cornwall, grandson of Henry I. With them were William de Forz, titular count of Aumâle and lord of Holderness, a feudal adventurer of the worst stamp, whose father had been one of the captains of Richard's crusading fleet ; Ranulf earl of Chester, and William Marshall earl of Pembroke, two men of long and varied experience as well as great social importance, who seem up to the last moment to have hoped that their own influence with the king might make it unnecessary for them to go into open opposition. In the second rank come Geoffrey de Lucy, Geoffrey de Furnival, Thomas Basset, Henry de Cornhell, Hugh de Neville, and William Briwere, the men who were at present in power in the Curia Regis and Exchequer ; who were bound in honour to adhere to their master or to resign their dignities, and who had in many cases been too willing ministers of the iniquities that provoked the struggle.

The third class, who joined the barons after their entry into London.

The present ministry.

The few who adhered to John to the last were chiefly those who had everything to fear and nothing to hope from the victory of the confederates ; Richard de Marisco, the chancellor, Peter de Mauley, Falkes de Breatû, Philip son of Mark, Gerard de Atie, Engclard de Cygonies, Robert de Gaugi, and others whose names testify to their foreign extraction, and some of whom were expressly excluded by the Great Charter from ever holding office in England¹.

The fourth class: John's personal adherents.

¹ M. Paris, pp. 253-255.

The king's party among the bishops.

Of the bishops, Peter des Roches the justiciar was probably the only one who heartily supported John: he was a foreign favourite and an unpopular man. Pandulf the papal envoy was also on the king's side; and some of the bishops who had been lately consecrated, such as Walter Gray of Worcester, who had been chancellor for some years, and Benedict of Rochester, probably avoided taking up any decided position. Even archbishop Langton himself, although he sympathised with, and partly inspired and advised the confederates, remained in attendance on the king.

Classification of the twenty-five executors.

It is worth while to compare with these lists the names of those counsellors by whose advice John declares that he issues the charter, as well as those of the twenty-five barons to whom the execution was committed. The former body is composed of the bishops, with Stephen Langton and Pandulf at their head, and those earls and barons who only left John after the adhesion of the Londoners: it contains none of the northern barons, none of the second list of confederates, and the selection was perhaps made in the hope of binding the persons whom it includes to the continued support of the hard-won liberties. The twenty-five executors are selected from the two latter classes; they are as follows: of the north country lords, Eustace de Vesci, William de Mowbray, Robert de Ros, John de Lacy, Richard de Percy; of the Stamford confederates, the earls of Hertford, Gloucester, Winchester, Hereford, Norfolk, and Oxford; Robert Fitz-Walter, William Marshall the younger, Gilbert de Clare, Hugh Bigod, William Mallet, John Fitz-Robert, Roger de Mumbezou, Richard de Muntfitchet, William de Huntingfield. Two of the third list, William of Aumâle and William of Albini, represent a body less hostile to John. Geoffrey de Say, who is found shortly after in arms against John, and the mayor of London, complete the number².

¹ Art. 50.

² M. Paris, p. 262; Select Charters, p. 298.

In a further stage of our inquiry we shall be able to trace the subsequent divisions of party and policy that sprang out of these several combinations, in that altered state of affairs which followed the French invasion, and through the difficulties which beset the minority of Henry III. The analysis of the lists confirms the evidence of the historians, and proves that the first cry for freedom came from the North, that it was taken up and maintained by the strength of the baronial party, which had learned the benefit of law, peace, and good government, and that the demands of the confederates took a definite and defensible form under the hand of the archbishop, and on the model of Henry I's charter: that this basis of agreement was accepted by the people at large, and especially by the Londoners, who to some extent represent the town population of the kingdom; and was finally adhered to by the most important members of the government, with William Marshall at their head. John remained contumacious till all but his foreign creatures had forsaken him, and when he yielded, he yielded with a full intention of eluding by papal connivance all his promises. The Great Charter is then the act of the united nation, the church, the barons, and the commons, for the first time thoroughly at one. It is in form only the act of the king: in substance and in historical position it is the first effort of a corporate life that has reached full consciousness, resolved to act for itself and able to carry out the resolution.

Importance
of these lists.

CHAPTER XIII.

ADMINISTRATIVE AND REPRESENTATIVE INSTITUTIONS.

156. Character of the period, 1155-1215; amalgamation and national unity;—in blood.—157. In language and law.—158. The king.—159. The national Council.—160. Legislation.—161. Taxation.—162. Military organisation.—163. Judicature.—164. The institution of Juries.—165. The Towns.—166. The Clergy.—167. Conclusion.

Distinctive character
of the constitution.

Anglo-Saxon
local institutions.

Norman central institutions.

156. The great characteristic of the English constitutional system, in that view of it which is offered in these pages,—the principle of its growth, the secret of its construction,—is the continuous development of representative institutions from the first elementary stage, in which they are employed for local purposes and in the simplest form, to that in which the national parliament appears as the concentration of all local and provincial machinery, the depository of the collective powers of the three estates of the realm. We have traced in the Anglo-Saxon history the origin and growth of the local institutions, and in the history of the Norman reigns the creation of a strong administrative system. Not that the Anglo-Saxon rule had no administrative mechanism, or that the Norman polity was wanting in its local and provincial organism, but that the strength of the former was in the lower, and that of the latter in the upper ranges of the social system, and that the stronger parts of each were permanent. In the reigns of the three kings, whose history was sketched in the last chapter, we trace a most important step in advance, the interpenetration, the growing together, of the local machinery and the administrative organisation. We have already examined the great crisis by which they were brought together; now we begin to trace the process by which the administrative order is worked into the common law of the people, and the common institutions of the people are admitted to a share in the administration of the state; the beginning of the process which is completed in national self-government.

Period of interpenetration.

The period is one of amalgamation, of consolidation, of continuous growing together and new development, which distinguishes the process of organic life from that of mere mechanic contrivance, internal law from external order.

The nation becomes one and realises its oneness; this realisation is necessary before the growth can begin. It is completed under Henry II and his sons. It finds its first distinct expression in Magna Carta. It is a result, not perhaps of the design and purpose of the great king, but of the converging lines of the policy by which he tried to raise the people at large, and to weaken the feudatories and the principle of feudalism in them. Henry is scarcely an English king, but he is still less a French feudatory. In his own eyes he is the creator of an empire. He rules England by Englishmen and for English purposes, Normandy by Normans and for Norman purposes; the end of all his policy being the strengthening of his own power. He recognises the true way of strengthening his power, by strengthening the basis on which it rests, the soundness, the security, the sense of a common interest in the maintenance of peace and order.

Realisation of national unity.

The result of Henry's policy.

The national unity is completed in two ways. The English have united; the English and the Norman have united also.

Union of blood.

The threefold division of the districts, the Dane law, the West-Saxon and the Mercian law, which subsisted so long, disappears after the reign of Stephen. The terms are become archaisms which occur in the pages of the historians in a way that proves them to have become obsolete¹; the writers themselves are uncertain which shires fall into the several divisions. Traces of slight differences of custom may be discovered in the varying rules of the county courts, which, as Glanvill tells us, are so numerous that it is impossible to put them on record²;

Extinction of legal distinctions.

¹ Simeon of Durham, ed. Hinde, i. 220-222.

² Glanvill, De Legibus Angliæ, lib. xii. c. 6.

but they are now mere local by-laws, no real evidence of permanent divisions of nationality. In the same way Norman and Englishman are one. Frequent intermarriages have so united them, that without a careful investigation of pedigree it cannot be ascertained,—so at least the author of the Dialogus de Scaccario affirms,—who is English and who Norman¹. If this be considered a loose statement, for scarcely two generations have passed away since the Norman blood was first introduced, it is conclusive evidence as to the common consciousness of union. The earls, the greater barons, the courtiers, might be of pure Norman blood, but they were few in number: the royal race was as much English as it was Norman. The numbers of Norman settlers in England are easily exaggerated; it is not probable that except in the baronial and knightly ranks the infusion was very great, and it is very probable indeed that, where there was such infusion, it gained ground by peaceable settlement and marriage. It is true that Norman lineage was vulgarly regarded as the more honourable, but the very fact that it was vulgarly so regarded would lead to its being claimed far more widely than facts would warrant: the bestowal of Norman baptismal names would thus supplant, and did supplant, the old English ones, and the Norman Christian name would then be alleged as proof of Norman descent. But it is far from improbable, though it may not have been actually proved, that the vast majority of surnames derived from English places are evidence of pure English descent, whilst only those which are derived from Norman places afford even a presumptive evidence of Norman descent. The subject of surnames scarcely rises into prominence before the fourteenth century; but an examination of the indices to the Rolls of the Exchequer and Curia Regis shows a continuous increase in number and importance of persons bearing English names: as early as the reign of Henry I we find among the barons Hugh of Bochland, Rainer

Inter-
marriages.

Uncertain infusion of Norman blood.

Value of Norman
name and lineage.

Increase of English sur-
names.

¹ 'Jam cohabitantibus Anglicis et Normannis et alterutrum uxores ducentibus vel nubentibus, sic permixtae sunt nationes ut vix discerni possit domie, de liberis loquor, quis Anglicus quis Normannus sit genere; exceptis dumtaxat ascriptiis qui villani dicuntur.' Dialogus, i. c. 10; Select Charters, p. 193.

of Bath, and Alfred of Lincoln, with many other names which show either that Englishmen had taken Norman names in baptism, or that Normans were willing to sink their local surnames in the mass of the national nomenclature.

English names.

157. The union of blood would be naturally expressed in unity of language, a point which is capable of being more strictly tested. Although French is for a long period the language of the palace, there is no break in the continuity of the English as a literary language. It was the tongue, not only of the people of the towns and villages, but of a large proportion of those who could read and could enjoy the pursuit of knowledge. The growth of the vernacular literature was perhaps retarded by the influx of Norman lords and clerks, and its character was no doubt modified by foreign influences under Henry II and his sons, as it was in a far greater degree affected by the infusion of French under Henry III and Edward I: but it was never stopped. It was at its period of slowest growth as rapid in its development as were most of the other literatures of Europe. Latin was still the language of learning, of law, and of ritual. The English had to struggle with French as well as with Latin for its hold on the sermon and the popular poem: when it had forced its way to light, the books in which it was used had their own perils to undergo from the contempt of the learned and the profane familiarity of the ignorant. But the fact that it survived, and at last prevailed, is sufficient to prove its strength. The last memoranda of the Peterborough Chronicle belong to the year 1154: the last extant English charter can scarcely be earlier than 1155. There are English sermons of the same century, and early in the next we reach the date of Layamon's Brute and the Ormulum. These are fragments of the literature of a language which is passing through rapid stages of growth, and which has not attained a classical standard. Only fragments are left, for the successive stages pass so quickly that the monuments of one generation are only half intelligible to the next. The growth of the language and that of the literature proceed in an inverse ratio. If we were to argue from these fragments, we should infer, that whilst in the department of Unity and growth of language.

Modifications of vernacular literature.

Continuity, survival, and victory of English.

Fragmentary character accounted for.

Relation of language and literature in the process of development.

Scraps of English in conversation.

law the use of the native tongue was necessarily continuous, it had to rise through the stages of the song and the sermon to that point of development at which those who required history and deeper poetry demanded them in their own language. Such a sequence may imply the increase of education in the English, but it more probably implies the disuse of French in the classes that had a taste for learning: and it is still more probable that the two literatures advanced by equal steps until the crisis came which banished French from popular conversation. There are traces that seem to show that English was becoming the familiar conversational language of the higher classes. The story of Helewisia de Morville, preserved by William of Canterbury in his life of Becket, exhibits the wife of one of the murderers as using English. 'Huwe of Morvill, war, war, Liulf haveth his sword ydrawen,' was her cry when she invoked the aid of her husband to punish the stubborn virtue of her English favourite¹. Giraldus Cambrensis, a man of high Norman descent, could not only read but criticise the language of the Chronicles and of Alfred, and compare the dialects of northern and southern England². Hugh of Nunant, a Norman of the Normans, mentions it as a strange thing that William Longchamp the chancellor was ignorant of the language of the people, and regards it in special connexion with his hatred and contempt of the English³. Latin was the ordinary language of the monks of Durham, yet they conversed in English with S. Godric, who spoke French only by miracle⁴. The hymn which the Blessed Virgin taught the same saint was in English⁵, and in English it is recorded for the reading of bishop Hugh de Puiset. At Canterbury, in the miraculous history of Dunstan, written by Eadmer, it is the devil that speaks French⁶ and corrects the indifferent idiom of an English monk. S. Hugh of Lincoln, who was a Burgundian by birth, did not understand the dialects of Kent

¹ Will. Cant. ap. Giles, ii. 31.

² Gir. Cam. Opp. vi. 177, 178.

³ Ben. Pet. ii. 219: 'Ille non respondebat quia linguam Anglicanam prorsus ignorabat.' See also Gir. Camb. V. Galfridi, in Anglia Sacra, ii. 407.

⁴ V. S. Godric, pp. 203, 206.

⁵ Ibid. p. 208.

⁶ Eadmer, V. S. Dunstani, p. 236.

and Huntingdonshire, but he was addressed by the natives as if it were naturally to be expected that he would comprehend what they said¹. Little can be safely inferred from such scattered notices, but that it was not uncommon for educated people to speak both languages. Of any commixture of French and English at this period there is no trace: the language of Chaucer owes its French elements to a later infusion: the structure of our language is affected by the foreign influence as yet in a way which may be called mechanical rather than chemical: it loses its inflexions, but it does not readily accept new grammatical forms, nor does it adopt, to any great extent, a new vocabulary.

English commonly spoken.

No commixture of French with English.

The uniformity of legal system in its application to Norman and Englishman alike, would of necessity follow from a state of society in which Norman was undistinguishable from Englishman: but except in one or two points of transient interest, it is not likely that any great distinctions of legal procedure had ever separated the two races. The Norman character of the Curia Regis and the English character of the shiremoot stand in contrast not so much because the former was Norman and the latter English, but because of the different social principles from which they spring. The Englishman where he is a tenant-in-chief has his claims decided in the Curia Regis; the Norman vavassor and the English ceorl alike are treated in the shiremoot². The trial by battle and the inquest by jury in its several forms are, after the first pressure of the Conquest is over, dealt with by both alike. The last vestige of difference, the presentment of Englishry, loses what significance it ever had. The tenures are the same for all; the Englishman is not disqualified from being a tenant in chief: the Norman may hold land in villenage: the free and common socage of the new system is really the free possession of the old, and the man who holds his acres by suit and service at the county court³ is as free as if he continued to call his land ethel or bocland, over Consolidation of the legal system.

¹ Magna Vita S. Hugonis, pp. 157, 268.

² Writ of Henry I, quoted above, p. 390.

³ 'Per sectam comitatus et de hendemot, unde scutagium dari non debet.' Rot. Pip. 3 Joh.; Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 467.

The villein class.

which none but the king had soken. The one class which is an exception to all these generalisations, that of the rustici or nativi, is, it would appear, exclusively English: but even these, where they have recognised claims to justice, claim it according to its fullest and newest improvements. The system of recognition is as applicable to the proof or disproof of villein extraction as to the assize of mort-d'ancester or novel disseisin: nor does the disqualification under which the rustic lies, for ordination or for the judicial work of the jury and assize, arise from his nationality, but from his status. The claims of his lord forbid him to seek emancipation by tonsure; the precarious nature of his tenure forbids him to testify in matters touching the freer and fuller tenure of other men's property.

Englishmen rarely promoted.

Still great promotion in Church and State does not yet commonly fall to the lot of the simple Englishman. Wulfstan of Worcester, the last of the Anglo-Saxon bishops, dies in 1095; Robert, the scholar of Melun, the first English bishop of any note after the Conquest, belongs to the reign of Henry II¹. The Scot, the Welshman, and the Breton reach episcopal thrones before the Englishman. Archbishop Baldwin, who was promoted to Canterbury by Henry II, seems to have been an Englishman of humble birth; Stephen Langton was also an Englishman, but by this time the term includes men of either descent, and henceforth the prelates of foreign extraction form the exceptions rather than the rule. In the service of the State however it is, as we have seen already, by no means improbable that English sheriffs and judges were employed by Henry I: and English scholars and lawyers were rising into distinction in Sicily and even in France.

Character of the union of races.

The union of the races resembles not merely the mechanical union of two bodies bound together by force, or even by mutual attraction, in which, however tight the connexion, each retains its individual mass and consistency: it is more like a chemical commixture in which, although skilled analysis may distinguish the ingredients, they are so united both in bulk and in qualities, that the result of the commixture is something altogether distinct from the elements of which it is composed. The infusion of a little that is Norman affects the whole system of the English, and the mass which results is something different from either the one or the other. True the great proportion of the bulk must be English, but for all that it is not, and nothing will ever make it, as if that foreign element had never been there.

¹ Robert is distinctly described by Robert de Monte, as genere Anglicus (ed. Pertz, vi. 513); John of Pagharn, who was made bishop of Worcester in 1151, may also have been English.

Result of the commixture.

The commixture of institutions is somewhat similar: the new machinery which owes its existence to the new conception of royal power, the Curia Regis and Exchequer, does not remain side by side and unconnected with the shiremoot and the kindred institutions; it becomes just as much a part of the common law as the other: the ancient system of the shire rises to the highest functions of government; the authority of royal justice permeates the lowest regions of the popular organisation. The new consolidating process is one of organism, not of mere mechanism: the child's puzzle, the perfect chronometer, the living creature, symbolise three kinds or stages of creative skill, order, organisation, law; the point that our history reaches at the date of Magna Carta may be fixed as the transition from the second to the third stage.

Commixture of institutions.

Growth of the common law.

In tracing the minute steps of the process by which the commixture of race and institutions was so completed as to produce an organisation which grew into conscious life, we may follow a principle of arrangement different from that used in the eleventh and earlier chapters; and after examining the position of the king, divide the discussion under the four heads of legislation, taxation, the military system, and judicature; closing the history of the period with an attempt to trace the origin and development of that representative principle, which we shall find running through all the changes of administrative policy, and forming as it were the blending influence which enables the other elements to assimilate, or perhaps the breath of life which turns mere organism into living and conscious personality.

Plan of the following Chapter.

158. The very idea of kingship had developed since the age The King.

Growth of the idea of kingship.

of the Conqueror. This had been one result of the struggle with the Church. The divine origin of royalty had been insisted on as an argument to force on the kings the sense of responsibility. This lesson had been familiar to the ancient English rulers, and its application had been summarily brought home. Edwy, like Rehoboam, had spurned the counsels of the fathers, and the men of the north had left him, and taken Edgar to be king. But the truth was less familiar, and the application less impressive to the Norman. The Conqueror had won England by the sword; and though he tried to rule it as a national king, it was not as one who would be brought to account: William Rufus had defied God and man: Henry I had compelled Anselm to give him a most forcible reminder of the source from which both king and prelate derived their power: Stephen had sinned against God and the people, and the hand of supreme power was traced in his humiliation. The events that were taking place

Moral and religious position of the king.

on the Continent conveyed further lessons. In the old struggles between pope and emperor the zeal of righteousness was on the side of the latter: since the reign of Henry IV the balance of moral influence was with the popes; and the importance of that balance had been exemplified both in Germany and in France.

Scholastic view of king-
ship.

The power of the pen was in the hands of the clergy: Hugh of Fleury had elaborately explained to Henry I the duties and rights which his position owed to its being ordained of God¹. John of Salisbury, following Plutarch and setting up Trajan as the model of princes, had urged the contrast between the tyrant and the king such as he hoped to find in Henry II². Yet these influences were thwarted by another set of ideas, not indeed running counter to them, but directed to a different aim. The clergy had exalted royalty in order to enforce its responsibilities on the conscience of the king; the lawyers exalted it in order to strengthen its authority as the source of law and justice; making the law honourable by magnifying the attributes of the law-giver. And as the lawyers grew more powerful as a class, the theory of royalty approached more closely to absolutism: their

Legal theory of absolute sovereignty.

¹ See his work in Baluze's Miscellanea, ii. 184 sq.

² In the Polycraticus, throughout.

language has a tone, a force, and a consistent logic that is wanting to the exhortations of the churchmen. Yet even to the lawyer this ideal king was not the man who sat on the throne, but the power that would enforce the law. Glanvill cites and applies to Henry II the maxim of the Institutes, 'quod principi placuit, legis habet vigorem,'—a principle which, as Fortescue points out, is absolutely foreign to the ideas of English law¹; and the author of the Dialogus de Scaccario, who, although himself a priest, represented both in life and in doctrine the ministerial lawyer, lays down that the deeds of kings are not to be discussed or condemned by inferior men, their hearts are in the hands of God, and it is by divine not by human judgment that their cause must stand or fall². Happily a theory of absolutism is compatible with very strong and strict limitations in practice: yet it was probably under the idea that the king is the sovereign lord of his people that Richard I and John forsook the time-honoured practice of issuing a charter of liberties at the coronation. John's idea of his own position was definitely that of an absolute prince: when he heard the demands of the barons he inquired why they had not asked for the kingdom also, and swore that he would never grant them such liberties as would make him himself a slave³: yet the liberties they asked were those which his forefathers had been glad to offer to their people. Curiously enough it is in John that the territorial idea of royalty reaches its typical enunciation: all the kings before him had called themselves on their great seals kings of the English: John is the first whose title appears on that solemn and sovereign emblem as Rex Angliæ.

Influence of the imperial idea.

Practical limitations.

John's idea of his own position.

Growth of real power.

The growth of real power in the king's hands had advanced in proportion to the theory. Every measure of internal policy by which the great vassals had been repressed, or the people strengthened to keep them in check, had increased the direct influence of the crown; and the whole tendency of the ministerial system had been in the same direction. Hence it was that John was able so long to play the part of a tyrant, and that

¹ De laudibus Legum Angliæ, ch. 9.

² Dialogus, præf.; Select Charters, p. 161.

³ M. Paris, p. 254.

the barons had to enforce the Charter by measures which for the time were an exercise on their part of sovereign power.

Claim of the king to the rule of the British islands.

Somewhat of the greatness of the royal position was owing to the claim, which at this period was successfully urged, to the supreme rule of the British islands; a claim which had been made under the descendants of Alfred, and was regarded by tradition as really established by Edgar. The princes of Wales had acknowledged the suzerainty of the Conqueror, and had been from time to time forced into formal submission by William Rufus and Henry I: but Stephen had been able to do little on that side of the island. The three Welsh wars of Henry II were not amongst his most successful expeditions, yet by arms or by negotiations he managed to secure the homage of the princes¹, on one of whom he bestowed his own sister in marriage². On Richard's accession the homage was again demanded, and a scutage was raised on the pretext of an expedition to enforce it. Yet when Rhys ap Griffith, the king of South Wales, came to Oxford for the purpose of negotiation, Richard refused to meet him³, and it does not appear that he ever renewed his homage. On the death of Rhys, the disputed succession to his principality was settled by archbishop Hubert as justiciar⁴, and Griffith his successor appeared as a vassal of the English king at the court of John⁵. There seems to have been no reluctance to accept the nominal superiority of England, so long as it was compatible with practical independence. But the fact that their bishops received their consecration at Canterbury, and were, from the reign of Henry I, elected and admitted under the authority of the kings of England, is sufficient to prove that anything like real sovereignty was lost to the so-called kings

Homage of Wales.

Ecclesiastical dependence of Wales.

¹ Henry's three Welsh wars were in 1157, 1163, and 1165. Homage was performed by the princes at Woodstock July 1, 1163: and they attended his court at Gloucester in 1175. In 1177 they swore fealty at Oxford in May. In 1184 they provoked the king to prepare for another expedition; but when he had reached Worcester, Rhys ap Griffith met him and did homage. The South Welsh were again in arms in 1186. The princes of North Wales, after the marriage of David with the king's sister, were faithful, and adhered to Henry in the rebellion of 1173.

² Bened. i. 162.

³ Bened. ii. 97.

⁴ Hoveden, iv. 21.

⁵ Hoveden, iv. 142.

of Wales. They were divided amongst themselves, and the highest object of their political aims was from time to time to throw their weight on the side of the disaffected barons who were their neighbours: creating difficulties in the way of the king of England, which prevented him from meddling with them. But his formal suzerainty was admitted. 'What Christian,' says Matthew Paris, 'knows not that the prince of Wales is a petty vassal (vassalulus) of the king of England¹?' Policy of the Welsh princes.

It was very different with Scotland, although Malcolm Canmore had under the spell of the Conqueror's power done formal homage to him, and each of the sons of Margaret had in turn sought support against his competitors at the court of Henry I. The complicated question of the Scottish homage, an obligation based, it is said, on the commendation of the Scots to Edward the Elder, on the grant of Cumberland by Edmund to Malcolm, and on the grant of Lothian by Edgar or Canute to the king of Scots, was one of those diplomatic knots which are kept unsolved by mutual reservations until the time comes when they must be cut by the sword. And to these obscure points a new complication was added when David of Scotland, who had obtained the English earldom of Huntingdon, succeeded to his brother's throne. Henry the son of David received the earldom of Northumberland from Stephen, and his father kept during the whole of Stephen's reign a hold on that county as well as Cumberland and Westmoreland, partly in the alleged interest of his niece the empress, partly perhaps with the intention of claiming those territories as rightfully belonging to his Cumbrian principality. Henry II not only obtained the restoration of the northern counties from Malcolm IV, but compelled him to do homage²: William the Lion, who succeeded Malcolm, acted throughout his whole reign as a vassal of England, attending the royal courts and acquiescing for the most part in a superiority which it would have been folly Question of the Scottish homage.
Its complications.

¹ M. Paris, p. 626.

² Malcolm IV did homage to Henry II at Chester in 1157; he attended him at the siege of Toulouse, and was knighted by him at Tours in 1159. He did homage to the younger Henry at Woodstock in 1163. These homages were apparently due for the county of Huntingdon.

Scottish homage from 1174 to 1189.

to dispute¹. After the unsuccessful attempt in 1174 to assist the rebellious earls, in which he was defeated and captured, Henry II imposed on him the most abject terms of submission : compelling him to surrender the castles of Lothian, and to enforce on his bishops and barons a direct oath of fealty to the English crown. From that obligation Richard released him for the sum of ten thousand marks ; but neither Henry's exaction of the homage, nor Richard's renunciation of it, affected the pre-existent claims. With William the Lion it was a far more important object to recover Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, than to vindicate his formal independence. The states he ruled or claimed to rule were as yet unconsolidated : he had little authority in the real Scotland that lay beyond the Forth, and from which his royal title was derived. The English-speaking provinces, which he held as lord of Lothian and of Strath Clyde, were as yet no more Scottish than the counties which he wished to add to them. Yet both he and his people aimed at an independence very different from that of Wales. The Scottish bishops, who from the beginning of the twelfth century had struggled against the attempt to reduce them to dependence on York or Canterbury, refused to submit themselves to the English Church, even when they swore fealty to the English king ; and actually obtained from Pope Clement III a declaration that they were subject immediately and solely to the apostolic see itself. The Scottish barons, even before they

The Scottish church made immediately dependent on Rome.

¹ William succeeded his brother in 1165 ; in 1166 he followed Henry II to Normandy, according to the Chronicle of Melrose, as a vassal, but returned shortly after. In 1170 he and his brother David did homage to the younger Henry, according to Lord Hailes for Huntingdon, according to Lord Lyttelton for Lothian ; there is no decisive evidence on the point. After his release from imprisonment he frequently attended the English court ; especially at Northampton in 1176, at Winchester in 1177, at Nottingham in 1179, in Normandy in 1181, at Nottingham in the same year, at London in 1185, at Marlborough in 1186. He attended on Richard at Canterbury in 1189, and was there relieved from the bondage imposed by Henry II ; and was again at court in 1194 at Nottingham. In 1200 he did homage to John at Lincoln, 'salvo jure suo.' At this time the county of Huntingdon was in the hands of his brother David ; it is therefore difficult to see for what the homage could have been due, unless it were for the traditional claim. Possibly William yielded it in the hope of recovering the northern counties, in which he did not succeed.

had been released by Richard, refused to be bound by the English undertaking to pay the Saladin title¹. When it is remembered that a large portion of these barons were adventurers of Norman descent, who had obtained estates in the Lowlands, too far from the English court to fear royal interference, it is not difficult to see how the fental principle gained its footing in Scotland in such strength as to colour all its later history. The Scottish constitution, as it appears under king David, was a copy of the English system as it existed under Henry I, but without the safeguards which the royal strength should have imposed on the great vassals. Hence the internal weakness which so long counteracted the determined efforts of the people for national independence.

Refusal to pay the Saladin title.

English influence in Scotland.

The anomalous condition of the principality of Galloway, which, as an outlying portion of the Strath Clyde kingdom, clung to English protection to evade incorporation with Scotland, and was from the beginning of the twelfth century subject ecclesiastically to York, gave the English kings another standing-point beyond the border². But although Henry II raised an army for the reduction of Galloway in 1186, and even marched as far northwards as Carlisle, his successors did not regard the question as worthy of a struggle. Alan of Galloway appears amongst the barons by whose counsel John issued the charter, and the bishops Relation of Galloway to England and Scotland.

¹ Bened. ii. 44.

² Galloway was under the rule of Fergus, an almost independent prince (princeps), who was connected by marriage with Henry I, until the year 1160, when the country was subdued by Malcolm. Fergus then became a canon and died the next year. On the outbreak of war in 1173, the sons of Fergus expelled the Scottish officers from their country, and in 1174 Henry sent envoys to invite them to become his vassals. They however quarrelled among themselves, and Henry, finding that they intended to make a tool of him, abstained from further negotiations; and William did homage for Galloway as well as Scotland. In 1176 the king of Scots compelled Gilbert of Galloway, who had murdered his own brother Uhtred, to do homage to Henry, as a Scottish baron, under the terms of the treaty of Falaise. In 1184 Gilbert rebelled against William the Lion, and died before the war was over, in 1185, leaving his heir in Henry's hands. The territory was seized by his nephew, Ronald, against whom Henry marched in 1186. Ronald however met him at Carlisle and did homage: he retained the principality until he died in 1200 at the English court. Alan, his son and successor, married a daughter of David of Huntingdon, and was the father of Dervorguilla Balliol. Galloway furnished a portion of Henry II's mercenary troops.

Galloway
dependent ecclesiasti-cally on York.

of Whithern received consecration and mission at York, down to the middle of the fourteenth century; but the territory was gradually and completely incorporated with Scotland, as Scotland gradually and completely realised her own national identity: Dervorguilla, the heiress of the princes of Galloway, was the mother of John Balliol, king of Scots.

Claims of the kings on Ireland.

Over Ireland as a whole the claims of the Anglo-Saxon kings were only titular. Edgar however, who had obtained the submission of the Northumbrian Danes, had apparently acted as patron also of the Ostmen in Ireland¹. Canute may not improbably have done the same; and when those settlers sought and obtained an ecclesiastical organisation in the reign of the Conqueror they received their bishops from Canterbury. But nothing more had been done; and it is uncertain whether in the most extensive claims of the Anglo-Saxon kings to the 'imperium' of all the British isles², Ireland was even in thought included. Henry II however, very early in his reign, conceived the notion of conquering the sister island. In his first year he obtained from the English Pope, Adrian IV, the bull Laudabiliter, in which, by virtue of a forced construction of the forged donation of Constantine, the pontiff, as lord of all islands, bestowed Ireland on the English king³. In the council of Winchester, held the same year, Henry proposed an expedition to conquer the country as a kingdom for his brother William, but was dissuaded by the empress⁴; and the gift remained a dead letter until 1167, when the quarrels of the native princes opened the way for the piratical attempts of Richard of Clare. In 1171 Henry himself, determined to avoid the Roman legation, went,

The bull
Laudabiliter.

Henry proposes a conquest of Ireland.

¹ Coins of Ethelred and Canute, if not also of Edgar, were struck at Dublin; Robertson, Essays, p. 198; Ruding, Annals of the Coinage, i. 262-276; and Nicholas of Worcester in a letter to Eadmer counts the king of Dublin among Edgar's vassals; Memorials of Dunstan, p. 423. Cf. Kemble, Cod. Dipl. ii. 404.

² 'Ego Aethelred gentis gubernator Angligenae totiusque insulae coregulus Britannicae et caeterarum insularum in circuitu adjacentium.' Kemble, Cod. Dipl. iii. 323; cf. 348, iv. 23.

³ Giraldus Cambrensis, Opp. v. 316. Cf. Joh. Salisb. Metalogicus, iv. c. 42. John of Salisbury brought an emerald ring from the pope to Henry II by way of investiture.

⁴ Robert de Monte, A.D. 1155.

as we have already seen, to Ireland and received the formal obedience of both kings and prelates, the king of Connaught, who alone resisted, making his submission by treaty in 1175¹. In 1177 John was made lord of Ireland, and received the homage of some of the barons, amongst whom his father portioned out the country, which was as yet unconquered². In 1185 he was sent over to exercise authority in person, but he signally failed to show any capacity for government, and was recalled in disgrace. Henry seems to have thought that a formal coronation might secure for his son the obedience of the Irish, and obtained from Urban III licence to make him king, the licence being accompanied by a crown of gold and peacock's feathers³. But although a special legate was sent for the purpose in 1187, John was never crowned, and the kings of England remained lords only of Ireland until Henry VIII took the title of king without coronation. John, during the years of the Interdict, made an expedition to Ireland, in which he had some success, bringing the English settlers, who already aimed at independance, into something like order. But the lordship of Ireland was little more than honorary; the native population were driven into semibarbarism, and the intruding race were scarcely subject even in name to the English crown. The resignation of the kingdom of England to the pope in 1213 was, however, accompanied by the surrender and restoration of Ireland also; and of the annual tribute of a thousand marks, three-tenths were assigned to Ireland, whilst seven-tenths were to be paid for England. The fact that Ireland had in 1151 received a new ecclesiastical constitution from Pope Eugenius probably saved it from annexation to the province of Canterbury, or to the jurisdiction of the primate of England.

The submission of the Irish princes; and the feudal division of Ireland.

John and his successors lords of Ireland.

New ecclesiastical constitution of Ireland.

Whilst the king of England was thus asserting and partially realising imperial claims over his neighbours in the British islands, he was in his continental relations involved in a net of homages and other kindred obligations, which might seem to derogate from the idea of royalty as much as the former magnified it. As duke of Normandy he was a vassal of the king

Homages paid by the kings for foreign fiefs.

¹ Benedict, i. 101-103.

² Ib. i. 161, 165.

³ Hoveden, ii. 307.

Homage for Normandy.

of France; and as dukes of Aquitaine, counts of Poitou, and counts of Anjou, Henry II and his sons stood in still more complicated feudal connexion. The Norman kings had avoided as much as possible even the semblance of dependence. The Conqueror was not called on after the Conquest to do homage to his suzerain, and William Rufus never was duke of Normandy. Henry I claimed the duchy during the life of Robert, but he avoided the necessity of the ceremony by making his son receive the formal investiture¹; and Stephen followed the same plan, to secure Normandy for Eustace². In these cases the royal dignity was saved by throwing the duty of homage upon the heir; David king of Scots had allowed his son Henry to take the oath to Stephen, and thus avoided a ceremony which, although it might not have humiliated, would certainly have compromised him³. Henry II had performed all the feudal ceremonies due to Lewis VII before he obtained the English crown⁴; and on

Homage of Henry II for Normandy,
Anjou, and Aquitaine.

the succession of Philip would willingly have devolved the renewal of homage on the sons amongst whom his great foreign dominion was to be divided⁵. When however, after the death of his eldest son, he found himself in 1183 obliged to make a fresh settlement of his estates, with that politic craft which he embodied in his saying that it was easier to repent of words than of deeds, he sacrificed his pride to his security, and did formal homage to his young rival⁶. Richard had done the same before his accession, and was not called on to repeat it⁷.

Homage of John.

John, after in vain attempting to avoid it, and after seeing Arthur invested with Normandy and the other paternal fiefs, yielded, as his father had done, to expediency, and performed in

¹ William the Etheling did homage for Normandy in 1119. Cont. F. Wig.; W. Malmesb. G. R. v. § 419.

² In 1137; Hen. Hunt. fol. 222; Hoveden, i. 192.

³ Hen. Hunt. fol. 221, 222; Hoveden, i. 190, 191.

⁴ He did homage for Normandy in 1151 to Lewis VII. R. de Monte (Bouquet, xiii. 292).

⁵ The younger Henry acted as seneschal of France at the coronation of Philip II. Bened. i. 242.

⁶ Hoveden, ii. 284; Bened. i. 306.

⁷ At least no mention is made of the repetition of the ceremony in the account of his interview with Philip immediately after his father's death, Bened. ii. 74.

A.D. 1200 the homage which was a few years later made one of the pleas for his forfeiture¹. His mother was still alive, and from her he chose to hold Aquitaine, she in her turn doing the homage to the suzerain².

If the royal consecration was supposed to confer such dignity that it was a point of honour to avoid, if possible, the simple ceremonies of homage and fealty for fiefs for which it was justly due, it was only in the greatest emergency and under the most humiliating circumstances that the wearer of the crown could divest himself of his right and receive it again as the gift of his temporary master. Yet this, if we are to believe the historians, happened twice in the short period before us. Richard was compelled to resign the crown of England to Henry VI during his captivity; and John surrendered his kingdom to Innocent III: in both cases it was restored as a fief, subject to tribute: and in the former case the bargain was annulled by the emperor before his death, although Richard was regarded by the electors who chose Otto IV as one of the principal members of the empire³. It has been stated that Henry II made a similar surrender, or took a similar oath to the pope on the occasion of his absolution at Avranches: this however was not the case; the fealty which he swore was merely promised to Alexander III as the Catholic pope, not as his feudal lord, and the oath simply bound him not to recognise the antipope⁴. John during his brother's life was said to have undertaken to hold the kingdom as a fief under Philip II if he would help him to win it; but this may have been a mere rumour⁵. It can scarcely be thought probable that either Henry VI or Innocent III, although both entertained an idea of universal empire, deliberately contrived the reduction of England to feudal dependence; both took advantage of the opportunity which Disparagement of the Crown by surrender.

Cases of Richard and John.

No such act done by Henry II.

View of the pope and emperor.

¹ 'Receptit homagium regis Angliae de omnibus terris et feodis et tenementis quae unquam rex Ricardus aut Henricus pater ejus tenuit de eo vel de praedecessoribus suis;' R. Coggeshale, p. 172. Cf. Hoveden, iv. 115.

² Rot. Chart. p. 130; Rigord (Bouquet, xvii. 50); W. Covent. ii. pref. xxxiv.

³ Hoveden, iii. 202, 203; iv. 37, 38.

⁴ It is not clear however that the pope did not intend Henry to bind himself to homage and fealty, and so to hold the kingdom of the papacy. See Robertson's Becket, p. 303.

⁵ Hoveden, iii. 204.

Humiliating character of the act.

deprived their victims for the moment of the power of resistance. Richard made his surrender with the advice of his mother, his most experienced counsellor; and John accepted his humiliation with the counsel and consent of all parties, bitterly as they felt it, and strongly as they resented the conduct by which he had made it necessary¹. In neither case would much heroism have been shown by resistance to the demand: Richard's misfortune and John's misgovernment had left them practically without alternative.

Disuse of the coronation-days.

The ceremonial attributes and pomp of royalty changed but little under these sovereigns. The form and matter of the coronation service remained, so far as we have documentary evidence, unaltered: Henry II during his first three years wore his crown in solemn state on the great festivals, though he so far varied the ancient rule as to hold his court on those days at S. Edmund's, Lincoln, and Worcester: but after A.D. 1158 he gave up the custom altogether. Richard only once, after his consecration, wore his crown in state; and John went through the ceremony twice, once on the occasion of his wife's coronation². The venerable practice was distasteful to Henry II, who disliked public ceremonial and grudged needless expense. Richard's constant absence from England, and John's unfriendly relations with Archbishop Langton and the barons, prevented its revival.

The custom obsolete.

The improvement in the legal machinery of the kingdom had deprived it of its former usefulness, and the performance of the grand serjeanties which were due at the coronations might by agreement take place on other occasions, as at the great court held at Guildford in 1186³. In other points both Richard and John showed themselves inclined to advance rather than abate the pomp of their position. Richard is the first king who regularly uses the plural 'we' in the granting of charters; John,

Pomp of Richard and John.

¹ Matthew Paris says that the surrender was made by the unanimous consent of all parties (p. 235). The Barnwell canon, copied by Walter of Coventry, allows that the act was politic, although it appeared to many an 'ignominious and enormous yoke of slavery' (ii. 210). In the document itself John states that he acts 'communi consilio baronum suorum.'

² Hoveden, iv. 169, 182; above, p. 517.

³ Benedict, ii. 3; above, p. 489, n. 4.

as we have seen, is the first who formally calls himself the king John is Rex Angliæ. of the land instead of the king of the people.

The long absences of the kings threw additional power, or a Regency in the king's absence. firmer tenure of power, into the hands of the justiciars. Yet it may be questioned whether Henry II did not contemplate the institution of a practice according to which either himself or his eldest son should be constantly present in England. The younger The younger Henry. Henry is found, both before and after his coronation, acting in his father's place : not only as the centre of courtly pomp, but transacting business, issuing writs, presiding in the Curia, and discharging other functions which seem to belong to regency¹. During the interregnum which followed Henry's death, his Queen Eleanor. widow acted in her son's name, proclaiming his peace and directing the oaths of fealty to be taken to him ; and during his captivity she is found at the head of the administration both in England and Normandy, acting with rather than through the justiciar. John, after the fall of Longchamp in 1191, was John. recognised by the barons as ruler of the kingdom² in his brother's stead. These facts seem to indicate that the viceregal The justiciar. character which the justiciar certainly possessed, was not without its limits : whilst from the fact that earl Robert of Leicester is found acting together with the justiciar Richard de Lucy³ during the absence of Henry and his sons, it may be argued that the king avoided trusting even that most loyal servant with a monopoly of ministerial power. But we have not sufficient evidence to define the exact position of either the members of the royal family or the justiciar ; and it is very probable that it was not settled even at this time by any other rule than that of temporary convenience.

159. The national council under Henry II and his sons seems

¹ He was present at Becket's election to the primacy in 1162; R. de Diceto, c. 532 : also when Becket received the quittance, in the Exchequer, of his accounts as chancellor; Vita S. T. C., Grim, p. 15; Roger of Pontigny, pp. 107, 108. He must have been quite an infant at the time. After his coronation he had a chancellor and a seal-bearer or vice-chancellor, and that at a time when his father had dispensed with a chancellor.

² 'Summus rector totius regni;' R. Devizes, p. 38; above, p. 500.

³ As for example in 1165, when he refused the kiss of peace to the archbishop of Cologne as a schismatic; R. Diceto, c. 539.

The national council in two aspects ; as a feudal court and as a stage towards the representation of estates.

Gradual definition of the position of the feudal tenants.

Possible arrangements of the council.

The greater and lesser barons.

in one aspect to be a realisation of the principle which was introduced at the Conquest, and had been developed and grown into consistency under the Norman kings, that of a complete council of feudal tenants-in-chief. In another aspect it appears to be in a stage of transition towards that combined representation of the three estates and of the several provincial communities which especially marks our constitution, and which perhaps was the ideal imperfectly grasped and more imperfectly realised, at which the statesmen of the middle ages almost unconsciously aimed. The constituent members of this assembly are the same as under the Norman kings, but greater prominence and a more definite position are assigned to the minor tenants-in-chief ; there is a growing recognition of their real constitutional importance, a gradual definition of their title to be represented and of the manner of representation, and a growing tendency to admit not only them, but the whole body of smaller landowners, of whom the minor tenants-in-chief are but an insignificant portion, to the same rights. This latter tendency may be described as directed towards the concentration of the representation of the counties in the national parliament,—the combination of the shiremoots with the witenagemot of the kingdom.

The royal council, as distinct from the mere assembly and court of the household, might consist of either the magnates, the greater barons, the ‘proceres’ of the Conqueror’s reign ; or of the whole body of tenants-in-chief, as was the accepted usage under Henry II ; or of the whole body of landowners, whoever their feudal lords might be, which was the case in the great councils of 1086 and 1116, and which, when the representative principle was fully recognised, became the theory of the medieval constitution. These three bodies were divided by certain lines, although those lines were not very definite. The greater barons held a much greater extent of land than the minor tenants-in-chief : they made a separate agreement with the Crown for their reliefs, and probably for their other payments in aid¹ : they had as we learn from Magna Carta, their several summonses to the great councils, and they led their vassals to the host under their own banner. The entire body of tenants-in-chief included besides these the minor barons, the knightly body, and the socage tenants of the crown, who paid their reliefs to the sheriff, were summoned to court or council through his writ, and appeared under his banner in the military levy of the county. The general body of freeholders comprised, besides these two bodies, all the feudal tenants of the barons and the freemen of the towns and villages, who had a right or duty of appearing in the county court, who were armed in the fyrd or under the assize of arms, who were bound to the Crown simply by the oath of allegiance taken in the shiremoot, and were qualified to determine by their sworn evidence the rights of their neighbours, the assessment of their goods, and the report of their neighbourhood as to criminals.

¹ Dialogus de Scaccario, ii. cc. 10, 24.

The entire body of tenants-in-chief.

The general body of freeholders.

These three possible assemblies may be regarded again as the assembly in its ordinary, extraordinary, and theoretical form : the national council usually contained only the magnates ; on great occasions it contained the whole body of the tenants-in-chief ; in idea it was the representation of the nation ; and on one or two very rare occasions that idea was partially realised. But there were departments of national action in which the uncertainty and indefiniteness of such a theory were inadmissible. For the payment of taxes all men must be brought under contribution ; for the efficiency of the national host all men must be brought together in arms. For the first of these purposes they might be visited in detail, for the second they must be assembled in person. Accordingly we find that the military levies in which Henry II brought together the whole kingdom in arms, as for the siege of Bridgnorth in 1155 or for the expedition to Normandy in 1177, may have really been steps towards the assembling of the nation for other purposes ; and when, as in the latter case, we find the king acting by the counsel of the assembled host ¹, we recur in thought to that ancient time when Ordinary, extraordinary, and theoretical forms.

Military levies a general assembly of the nation.

¹ Bened. i. 178 : 'Venerunt etiam illuc ad eum comites et barones et milites regni per summonitionem suam, parati equis et armis secum transfretare in Normanniam. . . . Congregatis itaque omnibus in urbe Wintoniæ rex per consilium eorum transfretationem suam distulit.' Immediately after, the 'consilarii' of the king are mentioned as advising him about the garrisons of the castles.

National
concentration in arms.

the only general assembly was that of the nation in arms. But the nation in arms was merely the meeting of the shires in arms: the men who in council or in judgment made up the county court, in arms composed the 'exercitus scirae:' on occasion of taxation or local consultation they were the wise men, the legales homines of the shiremoot. The king's general council is then one day to comprise the collective wisdom of the shires, as his army comprises their collective strength. But it is very rarely as yet that the principle of national concentration, which has been applied to the host, is applied to the council.

Constitution
of the national council as stated in the Great
Charter.

The point at which the growth of this principle had arrived during the period before us is marked by the fourteenth article of the Great Charter: 'To have the common council of the kingdom' for the assessment of extraordinary aids and scutages, 'we will cause to be summoned the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and greater barons singly by our letters; and besides we will cause to be summoned in general by our sheriffs and bailiffs all those who hold of us in chief; to a certain day, that is to say, at a term of forty days at least; and to a certain place; and in all the letters of such summons we will express the cause of the summons; and the summons having been so made, the business shall on the day assigned proceed according to the counsel of those who shall be present, although not all who have been summoned shall have come.' The council is thus no longer limited to the magnates: but it is not extended so as to include the whole nation, it halts at the tenants-in-chief: nor are its functions of advising on all matters recognised, it is simply to be assembled for the imposing of taxation. The provision, that the determination of the members present shall be regarded as the proceeding of the whole body summoned, enunciates in words the principle which had long been acted upon, that absence, like silence, on such occasion implies consent.

A stage of transition.

Writs of summons.

The use of a written summons to call together the council must have been very ancient, but we have no evidence of the date at which it became the rule. The great courts held on the festivals of the Church might not indeed require such a summons, but every special assembly of the sort—and very many such occur from the earliest days of the Norman reigns—must have been convoked by a distinct writ. Such writs were of two kinds: there was first a special summons declaring the cause of meeting, addressed to every man whose presence was absolutely requisite; thus for the sessions of the Exchequer each of the king's debtors was summoned by a writ declaring the sum for which he was called upon to account¹; and secondly there was a general summons such as those addressed to the several counties through their sheriffs to bring together the shiremoot to meet the justices or the officers of the forest². The former was delivered directly to the person to whom it was addressed; the latter was proclaimed by the servants of the sheriff in the villages and market towns, and obeyed by those who were generally described in the writ itself, as their business, inclination, or fear of the penalty for non-attendance, might dispose them. On this analogy the writs of summons to the national council were probably of two sorts: those barons who in their military, fiscal, and legal transactions dealt directly with the king were summoned by special writ: those tenants-in-chief who transacted their business with the sheriff were convened, not by a writ in which they were severally named, but by a general summons. Of the greater barons the first person summoned was the archbishop of Canterbury, and it is from the mention by the historians of the offence offered to Becket by neglecting this customary respect that we learn the existence of the double system of summons in the early years of Henry II³. The Pipe Rolls however contain very frequent mention of payments made to the summoners, and that in direct connexion with meetings of the council⁴. In 1175 Henry went so far as to forbid those who had been lately in arms against him to appear at his court at all without summons⁵. It is a strange thing that and the general.

Two sorts of writs of summons: the special,

Summons of the greater barons.

Summons of the minor tenants.

Importance of summons.

¹ See the chapters on Summons in the Dialogus de Scaccario, i. cc. 1, 2.

² Such are the 'communes summonitiones' mentioned in Art. 44 of the Great Charter.

³ See above, p. 467. There is still earlier evidence of the special summons: Gilbert Foliot, in reference to the homage and oaths taken to the empress, says, 'eorum namque qui statuto consilio propriis, ut dicitur, consueverant appellari nominibus, nemo plane relictus est qui non ei consilium de obtinendo et tuendo post regis obitum regno . . . promitteret.' S. T. C. v. 98.

⁴ P. 467, note 3.

⁵ See above, p. 483.

First extant writ, of 1205.

so very few of these early writs are now in existence: the most ancient that we have is one addressed to the bishop of Salisbury in 1205, ten years before the granting of the charter. This document fixes the date of the assembly, which is to be held at London on the Sunday before Ascension Day, and the cause of the meeting, which is to discuss the message brought by the envoys from Philip of France; and it also contains a clause of general summons, directing the bishop to warn the abbots and priors of his diocese to be present on the occasion¹. Of the general forms of summons addressed to the sheriffs, we have no specimens earlier than the date at which representative institutions had been to a great extent adopted: but if we may judge of their tenour from the like writs issued for military and fiscal purposes, they must have enumerated the classes of persons summoned in much the same way as they were enumerated in the writs ordering the assembly of the county court². Of this Summons of the county court.

however it is impossible to be quite certain. That the county court had a special form of summons for the purpose of taxation we learn from a writ of Henry I, which has been already quoted³. It is probable that the clause of Magna Carta represents no more than the recognised theory of the system of summons; a system which was already passing away; for besides that council at S. Alban's in 1213 in which the several townships of royal demesne were represented as in the county court by the reeve and four best men, a council was called at Oxford

Summons of four discreet knights in 1213.

in the same year in which each county was represented by four discreet men, who were to attend on the king 'to talk with him on the business of the kingdom.' In the writ by which this council is summoned, and which is dated on the 7th of November at Witney, we have the first extant evidence of the representation of the counties in the council⁴; they were already accustomed to elect small numbers of knights for legal and fiscal purposes, and the practice of making such elections to expedite

¹ Select Charters, p. 274.

² Examples, of the reign of Henry III, are in the Select Charters, pp. 334, 349, 365, &c.

³ Above, p. 393.

⁴ Select Charters, p. 279; above, p. 528.

the proceedings of the itinerant justices is confirmed by the Great Charter itself. It is then just possible that the 14th clause may have been intended to cover the practice of county representation which had been used two years before. The further development of the system belongs to a later stage of our inquiries.

The character of the persons summoned requires no comment: the archbishops and bishops were the same in number as before, but the abbots and priors were a rapidly increasing body. The number of earls increased very slowly: it may be questioned whether Henry II founded any new earldoms, or whether the two or three ascribed to him were not merely those which, having been created by his mother or Stephen, he vouchsafed to confirm¹. None were created by Richard; and by John only the earldom of Winchester, which was founded in favour of one of the coheirs of the earldom of Leicester, the latter title being taken by the other coheir. The number of great baronies however was probably on the increase, although we have not sufficient data, either as to the possessors or as to the exact character of such baronies, to warrant a very positive statement. The number of minor tenants-in-chief who attended cannot even be conjectured: but, as the clergy of inferior dignity formed an appreciable part of the council, it is probable that the knights who, without yet possessing a representative character, came up from the shires in consequence of the general summons, were a considerable body: and sometimes they were very numerous. The presence of a large number of deans and archdeacons is mentioned on some special occasions², which seem to indicate a plan of assembling the three estates in something like

Members of the Council.

Earldoms
and great baronies.

Minor tenants and clergy.

¹ William of Albini of Arundel was made earl of the county of Sussex by charter 1155; and Aubrey de Vere, earl of Oxford, about the same time. Henry confirmed the earldoms of Norfolk and Hereford, and the grant to Aubrey de Vere was no doubt a confirmation also. Richard gave charters to William of Arundel and Roger Bigod: John restored the earldom of Hereford in favour of Henry de Bohun, and created that of Winchester for Saer de Quiney. See the Fifth Report on the Dignity of a Peer, App. pp. 1-5.

² For example on the occasion of the Spanish award in 1177, Bened. i. 145; and at S. Paul's in 1213, M. Paris, p. 240.

completeness : but we have no reason to suppose that they were ever summoned as a matter of right or as tenants-in-chief.

Times of holding councils.

The times of assembly were very irregular. In many cases, especially in the early years of Henry II, they coincided with the great festivals, or with the terminal days which were already beginning to be observed by the lawyers. But so great a number of occasional councils were called by Henry, and so few by his sons, that obviously no settled rule can have been observed. And the same remark is true as regards the place of meeting. The festival courts were still frequently kept at Winchester and Westminster ; but for the great national gatherings for homage, for proclamation of Crusade, or the like, some central position, such as Northampton or its neighbourhood, was often preferred. Yet some of Henry II's most important acts were done in councils held in the forest palaces, such as Clarendon and Woodstock. Richard's two councils were held in middle England, one at Pipewell in Northamptonshire, the other at Nottingham ; both places in which the weariness of state business might be lightened by the royal amusement of the chase.

Name of parliament.

The name given to these sessions of council was often expressed by the Latin *colloquium*¹: and it is by no means unlikely that the name of parliament, which is used as early as 1175 by Jordan Fantosme², may have been in common use. But of this we have no distinct instance in the Latin Chroniclers for some years further, although when the term comes into use it is applied retrospectively ; and in a record of the twenty-eighth year of Henry III the assembly in which the Great Charter was granted is mentioned as the 'Parliamentum Runimedæ.'

Subjects of deliberation.

The subjects on which the kings asked the advice of the body thus constituted were very numerous : it might almost seem that Henry II consulted his court and council on every matter of importance that arose during his reign ; all the business that Richard personally transacted was done in his great councils ;

¹ E. g. M. Paris, p. 240.

² Jordan Fantosme, p. 14. It is used also by Wace. It is applied by Otto Morena to the diet or parliament of Roncaglia held by Frederick I in 1154 ; Leibnitz, Scr. Rer. Brunswic. i. 809. It is first used in England by a contemporary writer in 1246, namely by M. Paris, p. 696 : see Hody, History of Convocation, p. 326.

and even John, who acted far more in the manner and spirit of a despot than did his father or brother, did little in the first half of his reign without a formal show of respect towards his constitutional advisers. Nor is there any reason to suppose that such a proceeding was, in the great proportion of instances, merely a matter of form : a sovereign who is practically absolute asks counsel whenever he wants it ; and such a sovereign, if he is a man of good sense, with reason for self-confidence, is not trammelled by the jealousies or by the need of self-assertion which are inseparable from the position of a monarch whose prerogatives are constitutionally limited. Hence it was perhaps that these kings, besides constantly laying before their barons all questions touching the state of the kingdom¹,— matters of public policy such as the destruction of the illegal castles and the maintenance of the royal hold on the fortresses, matters relating to legislation, to the administration of justice, to taxation, and to military organisation,—also took their opinion on peace and war, alliances, royal marriages, and even in questions of arbitration between foreign powers which had been specially referred to the king for decision². Of such deliberations abundant instances have been given in the last chapter. It is very rarely that any record is preserved of opposition to or even remonstrance against the royal will. In 1175 Richard de Luey ventured to remind Henry II, when he was enforcing the law against the destroyers of the forests, that the waste of vert and venison had been authorised by his own writ ; but his mediation was summarily set aside³ : the remonstrances likewise of the one or two counsellors who during the Becket quarrel interposed on behalf of the archbishop, were either tacitly disregarded or resented as an advocacy of the king's enemy. Still less are we to look for any power of initiating

General deliberations.

Miscellaneous matters.

Opposition to the royal will.

¹ Such was the assembly at Bermondsey in 1154 'de statu regni;' Gervase, c. 1377; that 'de statutis regni' at London in 1170, and that at Northampton in 1176; Bened. i. 4, 107.

² In 1176 Henry II consulted his council before assenting to the marriage of his daughter Johanna; in 1177 he consulted the great assembly of feudal tenants held at Winchester, on the expediency of proceeding with the war. In 1155 he had consulted them on an expedition to Ireland. In 1177 he took their advice on the Spanish arbitration. Bened. i. 116, 142, 178; R. de Monte, A.D. 1155.

³ Bened. i. 94.

Position of the justiciar
as spokesman of the council.

measures of either public policy or particular reform in any hands but those of the king¹. The justiciar however probably advised the king on all these matters, and perhaps suggested the administrative changes which he had to work out in their details ; in this respect acting as the spokesman of the barons, as the archbishop acted as the spokesman of the Church, and exercising over the king a less overt but more effectual influence than could have been asserted by the barons except at the risk of rebellion. John certainly chafed under the advice of the justiciar, without venturing to dismiss him. In all these matters the regard, even if merely formal, shown by the king to the advice and consent of his barons has a constitutional value, as affording a precedent and suggesting a method for securing the exercise of the right of advising and consenting when the balance of power was changed, and advice and consent meant more than mere helpless acquiescence. The part taken by the national council in legislation, taxation, and judicature may be noticed as we proceed with the examination of those departments of public work.

Position of the Church
councils.

The ecclesiastical councils of the period did their work with very little interference from the secular power, and with very little variation from the earlier model. Their privilege of legislating with the royal acquiescence was not disputed, and their right to a voice in the bestowal of their contributions towards the wants of the state came into gradual recognition in the reign of John : but although his expedients for the raising of money may now and then have served as precedents upon which the claim to give or to refuse might be raised on behalf of the several orders in Church and State, no complete system of separate action by the clergy on secular matters was as yet devised, nor was their position as a portion of the common council of the realm defined by the Great Charter apart from that of the other tenants-in-chief. The theory of the Three Estates had yet to be worked into practice ; although there were signs of its growing importance.

¹ Yet the assize of measures in 1197 was made not only with the advice but by the petition of the magnates. See page 575.

160. Great as was the legal reputation of Henry II, and greatly as the legal system of England advanced under him and his sons, the documentary remains of the legislation of the period are very scanty. The work of Glanvill is not a book of statutes, but a manual of practice; and although it incorporates no doubt the words of ordinances which had the force of laws, it nowhere gives the literal text of such enactments. The formal edicts known under the name of Assizes, the Assizes of Clarendon and Northampton, the Assize of Arms, the Assize of the Forest, and the Assizes of Measures are the only relics of the legislative work of the period. These edicts are chiefly composed of new regulations for the enforcement of royal justice. They are not direct re-enactments or amendments of the ancient customary law, and are not drawn up in the form of perpetual statutes: but they rather enunciate and declare new methods of judicial procedure, which would either work into or supersede the procedure of the common law, whether practised in the popular or in the feudal courts. In this respect they strongly resemble the Capitularies of the Frank kings, or to go farther back, the edicts of the Roman praetors: they might indeed, as to both form and matter, be called Capitularies. The term Assize, which comes into use in this meaning about the middle of the twelfth century, both on the Continent and in England, appears to be the proper Norman name for such edicts¹; but it is uncertain

Legislation.
Form of legislation:
the Assize.

¹ Looking at the word assisa simply we might incline to regard it as the lex assisa or sententia assisa, the settled edict of the king, just as the redditus assisus was the fixed or assessed rent of an estate. It is however used so early in the sense of a session that the former cannot be regarded as the sole explanation. In the Assize of Jerusalem it simply means a law: and the same in Henry's legislation. Secondly, it means a form of trial established by the particular law, as the Great Assize, the Assize of Mort d'Ancester; and thirdly, the court held to hold such trials; in which sense it is commonly used at the present day. Yet it occurs in the Norman law books in the twelfth century, and apparently in the Pipe Roll of 2 Henry II, in the sense of a session, and that is taken by many antiquaries as the primary meaning. The formation of assisus from a barbarous use of assido or assideo (instead of assensus) might be paralleled with the derivation of tolta in malutolta from tollo in the sense of taking toll; but the word accido, to tax, may, so far as the assisus redditus is concerned, be the true origin of this form, as it is of the modern excise. On the other hand, it is impossible not to associate the assize of Henry II with the asetniss of Ina and Edmund. Possibly the use of the word in so many senses may point to a confusion of three different origins. Cf. the derivation of taxo, to tax, from τάσσα,

Origin of the Assize.

whether it received this particular application from the mere fact that it was a settlement like the Anglo-Saxon asetniss or the French établissement, or from a verbal connexion with the session of the court in which it was passed, or from the fact that it furnished a plan on which sessions of the courts reformed by it should be held. The assize thus differs widely from the charter of liberties, the form which the legislation of Henry I and Stephen had taken, and is peculiar in English history to the period before us, as the form of Provisions marks the legislative period of Henry III, and that of Statute and Ordinance belongs to that of Edward I and his successors. It possesses moreover the characteristic of tentative or temporary enactment, rather than the universal and perpetual character which a law, however superficially, seems to claim¹: its duration is specified in the form; it is to be in force so long as the king pleases; it may have a retrospective efficacy, to be applied to the determination of suits which have arisen since the king's accession, or since his last visit to England²; it is liable to be set aside by the judges where they find it impossible to administer it fairly. But, on the other hand, it is to the assize that the most important legal changes of the period owe their origin: the institution of jury and the whole procedure of the Curia Regis can have come into existence in no other way.

Its character of edict or decree.

In the drawing up of the assize, the king acted by the advice to ordain, or regulate: and the use of the word tallare = accidere, taxare. The form assisia suggests further difficulties, but there is no reason to look for an Arabic derivation, as is done in the editions of Du Cange.

¹ The special sanctity of the term law, as used in Holy Scripture and in the Roman jurisprudence, may perhaps account for the variety of expressions, such as those quoted above, by means of which men avoided giving the title of law to their occasional enactments. The Assizes of England, Jerusalem, Sicily, and Romania, the Establishments of S. Lewis, the Recesses of the German diets, and many other like expressions, illustrate this reluctance.

² The Assize of Clarendon is to be held good as long as it pleases the king. That of Northampton directs inquiry into disseisins made since the king's last coming to England; and the view of this Assize is to extend from the date of the Assize of Clarendon to the time of its own publication; 'atenebit a tempore quo assisa facta fuit apud Clarendonam continue usque ad hoc tempus.' Richard's Assize of Measures was set aside by the justices because the merchants declared it to be impracticable. See Select Charters, pp. 139, 144; Hoveden, iv. 172. John's Assize of Wines was set aside in the same way; ibid. p. 100.

and consent of his national council. This is distinctly stated in the preamble or title of the Assizes of Clarendon and Woodstock: the former is made 'de assensu archiepiscoporum, episcoporum, abbatum, comitum, baronum, totius Angliæ¹;' the latter 'per consilium et assensum archiepiscoporum, episcoporum et baronum, comitum et nobilium Angliæ².' The Assize of Northampton was the work, we are told, of the king, made by the counsel of King Henry his son and by the counsel of his earls, barons, knights, and vassals (homines) in a great council, consisting of bishops, earls, barons, and the rest, held 'de statutis regni³.' The ordinance by which trial by the Great Assize was instituted, was, according to Glanvill, an act of royal beneficence, bestowed on the nation by the clemency of the prince according to the counsel of the magnates⁴. The Assize of Measures was issued in the name of Richard I by the justiciar in 1197, as made by the lord Richard king of England at Westminster, although the king was at the time in France, by the petition and advice of his bishops and all his barons⁵. In this act of legislation the justiciar represented the king. The instructions given to the itinerant justices had likewise the force of laws, and might with justice be termed Assizes. They too were issued by the justiciar in the king's absence, and contained old as well as new regulations for the courts. The Assize of Arms issued in 1181 is not distinctly said to be framed under the advice of the council, and it may possibly have been regarded by the barons with some jealousy as putting arms into the hands of the people; but when John in 1205 summoned the nation to arms in conformity with the principle embodied in his father's assize, he declares that it is so provided with the assent of the 'archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, and all our faithful of England⁶.' These instances are sufficient to prove the share taken by the national council in legislation. The duty of proclaiming the law in the country fell upon the sheriffs and the itinerant Assizes issued with the counsel and consent of the council.

Instances of Assizes.

¹ Select Charters, p. 137.

² Ibid, p. 150.

³ Ibid, p. 124.

⁴ 'Est autem magna assisa regale quoddam beneficium, clementia principis de consilio procerum populis indultum.' Glanvill, ii. c. 7.

⁵ Hoveden, iv. 33.

⁶ Select Charters, p. 273.

Proclamation of the new laws in the country.

justices, whose credentials contained perhaps the first general promulgation. The Great Charter was read, by the king's order, publicly in every county, no doubt in the shiremoot and hundred court¹; duplicates of it were deposited in the cathedral churches.

Importance of constitutional forms

In all this there was nothing new: it was simply the maintenance of ancient forms, which prove their strength by retaining their vitality under the strongest of our kings. The advice and consent of the council may have been, no doubt in many cases was, a mere formality: the enacting power was regarded as belonging to the king, who could put in respite or dispense with the very measures that he had ordained. Yet in this an advantage may be incidentally traced. If the barons under Henry II had possessed greater legislative power, they might have kept it to themselves, as they did to a certain extent keep to themselves the judicial power of the later parliament; but as it was, legislation was one of the nominal rights that belonged to the whole council as the representative of the nation, and the real exercise of which was not attained until the barons had made common cause with the people, and incorporated their representatives in their own assembly. The period of national as distinct from royal legislation begins when the council has reached its constitutional development as the national parliament. The legislation of the Great Charter was to a certain extent an anticipation, a type, a precedent, and a firm step in advance towards that consummation.

Legislative power not really acquired by Parliament until it has become representative.

Taxation: three points.

161. The subject of taxation may be arranged under three heads,—the authority by which the impost is legalised, the description of persons and property on which it is levied, and the determination of the amount for which the individual is liable; in other words, the grant, the incidence, and the assessment.

Norman taxation.

The reticence of historians during the reigns of the Norman kings leaves us in doubt whether the imposts which they levied were or were not exacted simply by their own sovereign will. Two records have been mentioned, however, of the reign of

¹ Select Charters, p. 298: 'quam etiam legi publice praecepimus per totam bailliam vestram.' See above, pp. 115, 116.

Henry I, in one of which the king describes a particular tax as 'the aid which my barons gave me,' whilst in another he speaks of the summoning of the county courts in cases in which his own royal necessities require it¹. From the two passages it may be inferred that some form was observed, by which the king signified, both to his assembled vassals and to the country at large through the sheriffs, the sums which he wanted, and the plea on which he demanded them. The same method was observed by Henry II and Richard I; and it is only towards the end of the reign of Richard that we can trace anything like a formal grant or discussion of a grant in the national council². It is commonly said that the king took a scutage, an aid, or a carucage; and where the barons are said to have given it, the expression may be interpreted of the mere payment of the money. Of any debate or discussion on such exactions in the national council we have rare evidence: the opposition of S. Thomas to the king's manipulation of the Danegeld, and the refusal by S. Hugh of Lincoln to furnish money for Richard's war in France, are however sufficient to prove that the taxation was a subject of deliberation, although not sufficient to prove that the result of such discussion would be the authoritative imposition of the tax³. For the shadow of the feudal fiction, that the tax-payer made a voluntary offering to relieve the wants of his ruler, seems to have subsisted throughout the period: and the theory that the promise of the tax bound only the individual who made it, helped to increase the financial complications of the reign of John. Archbishop Theobald had denounced the scutage of 1156, and it is doubtful whether it was

Form of imposing a tax, by signifying the king's necessities.

Cases of debate on taxation.

Want of a system of representation.

¹ Above, pp. 371, 393.

² In 1159 Henry 'scutagium accepit;' Gerv. c. 1381: in 1194 Richard 'constituit sibi dari' a carucage; Hoveden, iii. 242: in 1198 'cepit . . . quinque solidis de auxilio;' ib. iv. 46. In 1201 we find the word 'expostulans' used of the king's proposition of a tax for the collection of which 'exiit edictum a justitiariis;' R. Coggeshale. In 1203 John 'cepit ab eis septimam partem omnium mobilium suorum;' M. Paris, p. 207. In 1204 'concessa sunt auxilia militaria;' ibid. 209. In 1207 'convenit episcopus et abbates ut permitterent personas dare regi certam summam;' Ann. Waverl. p. 258. A gradual change in the tone of demand may be traceable in this, yet John was really becoming more despotic all the time.

³ See above, pp. 463, 509.

Opposition
to taxation, personal not representative.

raised on his lands. S. Thomas had declared at Woodstock that the lands of his church should not pay a penny to the Danegeld; the opposition of S. Hugh was based not on his right as a member of the national council, but on the immunities of his church; and when Archbishop Geoffrey in 1201 and 1207 forbade the royal officers to collect the carucage on his estates, it was on the ground that he himself had not promised the payment. The pressing necessity of raising the ransom of Richard probably marks an epoch in this as in some other points of financial interest. The gentle terms donum or auxilium had signified under his father's strong hand as much as Danegeld or tallage; but now not only was the king absent and the kingdom in a critical condition, but the legal reforms in the matter of assessment had raised up in the minds of the people at large a growing sense of their rights. The taxes raised for the ransom were imposed by the justiciar, probably but not certainly, with the advice of the barons¹, and were no doubt collected without any general resistance; but both the amount and the incidence were carefully criticised, and in some cases payment was absolutely refused. The clergy of York, when the king's necessities were laid before them by the archbishop in their chapter, declared that he was infringing their liberties, and closed their church as in the time of interdict².

Taxes for Richard's ransom.

Growth of the idea of connecting taxation with representation.

This idea, which is indeed the rudimentary form of the principle that representation should accompany taxation, gained ground after the practice arose of bringing personal property and income under contribution. It was the demand of a quarter of their revenues, not a direct tax upon their land, that provoked the opposition of the canons of York; and although Archbishop Geoffrey is found more than once in trouble for forbidding the collection of a carucage, the next great case in which resistance was offered to the demands of the Crown occurred in reference to the exaction of a thirteenth of moveable property in 1207.

¹ Above, p. 501.

² Hoveden, iii. 222: 'Vocavit, monuit et rogavit ut quartam partem redditum suorum ad præfati regis liberationem conferrent; . . . qui renuentes et concanonicos suos in partes suas trahentes, asserebant eum . . . libertates ecclesie suae velle subvertere.'

On this occasion it was not an isolated chapter, but a whole estate of the realm that protested. The king in a great council held on January 8 at London proposed to the bishops and abbots that they should permit the parsons and beneficed clerks to give him a certain portion of their revenues. The prelates refused to do so. The matter was debated in an adjourned council at Oxford on February 9, and there the bishops repeated their refusal in still stronger terms. The king therefore gave up that particular mode of procedure, and obtained from the national council a grant of an aid of a thirteenth of all chattels from the laity. That done, having forbidden the clergy to hold a council at S. Alban's, he issued, May 26, a writ to the archdeacons and the rest of the clergy, informing them of the grant of aid, and bidding them follow the good example¹. Archbishop Geoffrey, who acted as the spokesman of the clergy, now gave up the struggle and went into exile; other circumstances were leading to a crisis: the thirteenth was no doubt generally collected; but early in the following year the interdict was imposed and constitutional law was in abeyance during the remainder of the reign. The twelfth article of the charter, in which the king promises that no scutage or aid, save the three regular aids, should henceforth be imposed without the advice and consent of the national council, does not explicitly mention the imposition of a tax on moveables, nor does it provide for the representation in the council of the great majority of those from whom such a tax would be raised. But in this, as in other points, the progress of events was outstripping and superseding the exact legal definitions of right. The fourteenth article does not provide for the representation of the shires, or for the participation of the clergy as an estate of the realm, Protest of the Church against taxation in 1207.

Imposition of the thirteenth.

Exile of Geoffrey.

Growth of the taxative principle, in advance of the Great Charter.

¹ Ann. Waverley, p. 258; M. Paris, p. 221. The writ addressed to the archdeacons, after rehearsing the grant made by the archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, and magnates, proceeds: 'Verum quia de vobis confidimus quod nos et honorem nostrum diligitis et defensionem regni nostri et recuperationem terrarum nostrarum affectatis, vos rogamus attentius, quatenus tale auxilium nobis ex parte vestra faciatis ut inde vobis gratias dare debeamus; et quod alii rectores ecclesiarum vicini vestri ad auxilium nobis faciendum exemplo vestro facilius invitentur.' May 26, 1207. Patent Roll, 8 John; ed. Hardy, i. 72.

The principle of taxation by the nation itself not yet enunciated.

distinct from their character as feudal freeholders, yet in both respects the succeeding history shows that the right was becoming practically established. So neither is the principle as yet formally laid down that a vote of the supreme council is to bind all the subjects of the realm in matter of taxation without a further consent of the individual. The prevalence of the idea that such consent was necessary brings the subject of the grant into close connexion with that of the assessment. But before approaching that point, the question of incidence requires consideration.

Indirect taxation of the period.

The indirect taxation of this period is obscure and of no great importance. The prisage of wine, the fines payable by the merchants for leave to import particular sorts of goods, the especial temptation which the stores of wool held out to the king's servants, the whole machinery of the customs, although referred to in the Great Charter as 'antiquae et rectae consuetudines¹', were, so far as touches constitutional history, still in embryo. The existing practice rested on the ancient right of toll, and not on any historical legislative enactment. Although, then, these sources furnished an appreciable revenue to Richard I and John², the general taxation of the country may for our present purpose be regarded as direct taxation only.

Incidence of taxation.

The taxable property may be divided into land and moveables, and again, according to the character of their owners, into lay and clerical; these may be subdivided in the former case according as the layman is a tenant-in-chief, a knight, a freeholder, a burgher, or a villein, in the latter according as the possessor is a prelate, a beneficed clerk, a chapter, or a religious house. Each division of property was brought under contribution at a different period, and for each there was a distinct name and method of taxation.

Realty and personality, lay and clerical.

All early taxation borne by the land.

All the imposts of the Anglo-Saxon and Norman reigns were, so far as we know, raised on the land, and according to computation by the hide: the exceptions to the rule would be only in the cases of those churches which claimed entire immunity, and those boroughs which paid a composition for their tax in a settled sum, as they paid the composition for the ferm in the shape of an annual rent. This generalisation covers both the national taxes like the Danegeld, and the feudal exactions by way of aid; both were levied on the hide. Henry I had exempted from such payments the lands held in demesne by his knights and barons, in consideration of the expenses of their equipments¹; but this clause of his charter can have been only partially observed. Henry II, from the very beginning of his reign, seems to have determined on attempting important changes. He brought at once under contribution the lands held by the churches, which had often claimed, but had never perhaps secured immunity.

¹ Article 31.

² Madox, Hist. Exch. pp. 529 sq.

Taxation
of land.Of Church lands.

In the Assize of Arms in 1181 he took a long step towards taxing rent and chattels, obliging the owner of such property to equip himself with arms according to the amount which he possessed². In the ordinance of the Saladin Tithe personal property is rendered liable to pay its tenth³. Under Richard I the rule is extended: for the king's ransom every man pays a fourth part of his moveables⁴: in 1204 John exacted a seventh of the same from the barons⁵, and in 1207 a thirteenth from the whole of the laity⁶. This change in the character of taxation serves to illustrate the great development of material wealth in the country which followed the reforms of Henry II. The burdens would not have been transferred from the land to the chattels if the latter had not been found much more productive of revenue than the former.

Taxation
of goods introduced.Sevenths
and thirteenths.

But this was not the only change. Henry II adopted the knight's fee instead of the hide as the basis of rating for the knights and barons: and on this basis established a somewhat minute system of distinctions. As early as his second year we find him collecting a scutage, a new form of taxation, at twenty shillings on the 'scutum' or knight's fee, from the knights who held land under the churches⁷. In 1159, for the war of Toulouse, he raised a much larger sum under the same name, from the tenants by knight service; as a commutation for personal

New system of rating
land.

The scutage.

¹ Above, p. 305.² Ib. p. 488.³ Ib. p. 489.⁴ Ib. p. 501.⁵ Ib. p. 523; M. Paris, p. 209.⁶ Above, p. 523.⁷ Ib. p. 454.

service he accepted two marks from each, and with the proceeds paid an army of mercenaries¹. The word scutage, from its use on this occasion, acquired the additional sense of a payment in commutation of personal service, in which it is most frequently used. In 1163, as has been already mentioned², the ancient Danegeld disappears from the Rolls; but it is succeeded by a tax which, under the name of donum or auxilium, and probably levied on a new computation of hidage, must have been a reproduction of the old usage. Such a change must indeed have been necessary, the Danegeld having become in the long lapse of years a mere composition paid by the sheriff to the Exchequer, while the balance of the whole sums exacted on that account went to swell his own income. Under Richard the same tax appears under the name of carucage: the normal tax being laid on the carucate instead of the hide, and each carucate containing a fixed extent of one hundred acres³.

Each of these names represents the taxation of a particular class: the scutage affects the tenants in chivalry; the donum, hidage or carucage, affects all holders of land; the tenth, seventh, and thirteenth, all people in the realm. Each has its customary amount; the scutage of 1156 was twenty shillings on the fee⁴; those of 1159 and 1161 were two marks; the scutage of Ireland in 1171 was twenty shillings, and that of Galloway in 1186 at the same rate. The scutages of Richard's reign,—one for Wales in the first year and two for Normandy in the sixth and eighth,—were, in the first case ten, in the other cases twenty shillings. John in his first year raised a scutage of two marks; on nine other occasions he demanded the same sum, besides the enormous fines which he extorted from his barons on similar pretexts. Other aids to which the name is not commonly given were raised in the same way and at similar rates. Such were especially the aid pur fille marier, collected by Henry in 1168 as twenty shillings on the fee, and that for the ransom of Richard I at the same amount.

¹ Above, p. 456.² Ib. p. 463.³ Hoveden, iv. 47.⁴ The following particulars are from the Pipe Rolls and Red Book of the Exchequer, as cited by Madox.

The carueage of Richard was probably intended, as the Dane-geld had been, to be fixed at two shillings on the carucate. In 1198 however it was raised to five, and John in the first year of his reign fixed it at three shillings¹.

Rate of carueage.

Under the general head of donum, auxilium, and the like, come a long series of imposts, which were theoretically gifts of the nation to the king, and the amount of which was determined by the itinerant justices after separate negotiation with the payers. The most important of these, that which fell upon the towns and demesne lands of the Crown, is known as the tallage. This must have affected other property besides land, but the particular method in which it was to be collected was determined by the community on which it fell², or by special arrangement with the justices.

The tallages.

It was only on rare occasions that all these methods of raising money were resorted to at once. Such an occasion might be the aid to marry the king's daughter, or to ransom his person; but not the ordinary contributions towards the regular expenses of the Crown. On those great occasions, the knights paid aid or scutage, the freeholders carueage, the towns tallage: the whole and each part bore the name of auxilium. More frequently only one tax was raised at once; a year marked by a scutage was not marked by a donum or a carueage. It was the accumulation and increased rate of these exactions that created the discontent felt under Hubert Walter's administration in the later years of Richard and the early years of John. In this division of burdens, and distinction of class interests, may be traced another step towards the system of three estates: the clergy and laity were divided by profession and peculiar rights and immunities; scutage and carueage drew a line between the tenant in chivalry and the freeholder, which at a later time helped to divide the lords from the commons. The clergy had in their spiritual assemblies a vantage-ground, which they used during the thirteenth century, to vindicate great liberties; and their action led the way to general representative assembling, and made easier for the commons the assertion of their own definite position.

Varieties of financial programme.

The Budget of the year.

Growth of system of estates.

¹ Above, p. 516.

² See below, pp. 585 sq.

Assessment
of taxes.

Domesday
the rate-book of land.

The tenants in knight-service are called on to declare their several liability.

The method of assessment varied according to the incidence of the tax. So long as all the taxation fell on the land, Domesday book continued to be the rate-book of the kingdom¹; all assessments that could not be arranged directly by it, such as the contributions of the boroughs, were specially adjusted by the sheriffs, or by the officers of the Exchequer in their occasional visitations², or were permanently fixed in a definite proportion and at round sums³. This system must have proved sufficient so long as the changes of occupation, which had occurred since the Domesday Survey, could be kept in living memory. As soon however as Henry II began to rate the land by the knight's fee, a new expedient was requisite. Hence, when he was preparing to levy the aid pur file marier, the king issued a writ to all the tenants-in-chief of the Crown, lay and clerical, directing each of them to send in a cartel or report of the number of knights' fees for the service of which he was legally liable⁴. This was done, and the reports so made are still preserved in the Black Book of the Exchequer, to which reference has been more than once made in former chapters. The scutages continued to be exacted on the same assessment, compared from year to year with the Pipe Rolls, until the reign of John, who on several occasions took advantage of the reluctance which his barons showed for foreign war to make arbitrary exactions. A clause of the Great Charter issued by Henry III in 1217 directs that the scutages shall be taken as they were in his grandfather's time. A few years after this, Alexander of Swerford, who compiled the Red Book of the Exchequer, reduced the computation

¹ Dialogus de Scacc. i. c. 16.

² 'Noveris itaque quod plurimum interest si donum vel auxilium civitatis per singula capita commorantium in ea a justitiis constituatur, vel si cives summam aliquam quae principe digna videatur justitiariis offerant et ab eis accipiatur.' Dialogus, ii. c. 13.

³ See above, p. 382.

⁴ One of the answers to this demand probably preserves the exact words of the writ: 'Mihi et aliis comparibus meis per litteras vestras innotuit, ut per fidem et ligantiam quam vobis debemus, vobis per breve nostrum pendens extra sigillum mandaremus quot milites habemus de veteri feodamento de tempore Henrici avi vestri, et quot milites habeamus de novo feodamento post tempus regis Henrici avi vestri, et quot milites habeamus super dominium nostrum.' Liber Niger, i. 148.

of knights' fees to something like order by a careful examination of the Pipe Rolls; but so long as scutages were collected at all, the assessment of the individual depended very much on his own report, which the Exchequer had little means of checking.

Assessment
of scutage.

The donum, auxilium, or tallage, which Henry imposed in lieu of the ancient Danegeld, was assessed by the officers of the Exchequer. In 1168 the whole of England was visited by a small commission of judges and clerks, who rated the sums by which the freeholders and the towns were to supplement the contributions of the knights. In 1173 a tallage on the royal demesne was assessed by six detachments of Exchequer officers, and throughout the remainder of the reign the fiscal circuits correspond with those of the justices, or the fiscal business is done by the justices in their judicial circuits. This method of assessment, like that of scutage, failed to secure either party against the other; either the justices had to accept the return of the tax-payer, or the tax-payer had to pay as the judges directed him¹. Little help could be expected from the sheriff, who indeed was generally an officer of the Exchequer. The assessment of the justices sometimes varied considerably from that of the payer, and in one recorded instance we find the tender of the former accepted in preference to the valuation of the latter. In 1168 the men of Horneastle pay £29 13s. 4d. for an aid, 'quod ipsi assederunt inter se concessu justiciarum aliter quam justitiæ?' It is obvious that an exaction, the amount of which was settled as in these two cases by the statement of the payer, was removed by only one step from the character of a voluntary contribution. That step might be a very wide one, and the liberty which it implied might be very limited, but the right of grant and the right of assessment were brought into immediate juxtaposition.

Assessment
of tallage by itinerant officers of the Exchequer.

When however, as was the case under the Assize of Arms and the Saladin Tithe, personal property was to be rated, it became clear that no safe assessment could be based either on the taxpayer's statement of his own liability, or on the unin-

Personal property required more careful assessment.

¹ See above, p. 584, note 2.

² Pipe Roll, 14 Hen. II; Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 407.

Application of the jury principle to assessment of personal property.

formed opinion of the sheriff and justices. To remedy this, Henry had recourse to his favourite expedient of the jury. He directed that the quantity and character of armour which each man was to provide should be determined by the report of a number of sworn knights and other lawful men of each neighbourhood, who were to draw up a list of the men within their district, with a distinct statement of their liability¹. In the collection of the Saladin Tithe, in which the king himself took an active part, the same plan was adopted: where suspicion arose that any man was contributing less than his share, four or six lawful men of the parish were chosen to declare on oath what he ought to give². The great precedent for this proceeding was found of course in the plan by which the Domesday Survey had been made, and the occasional recognitions of fiscal liability which had been taken under special writs. The plan was so successful that in 1198 it was applied to the assessment of the carucage, an account of which has been given already³. The assessment of the thirteenth in A.D. 1207 was however not made by juries, but by the oath of the individual payer taken before the justices⁴; the contributions of the clergy being a matter of special arrangement made by the archdeacons⁵. The carucage of 1198 is then the land-mark of the progress which the representative principle expressed by the jury had as yet attained in the matter of taxation.

It is applied to the carucage.

Question of collection of tallages.

The further question, which arose chiefly in the towns, how the sums agreed to between the special community and the Exchequer were to be adjusted so as to insure the fair treatment of individuals, also came into importance as soon as personal property was liable to assessment. We learn from the story of William Fitz-Osbert, that in London the taxes were raised by capitation or poll-tax, every citizen poor or rich contributing the same amount, the unfairness of the rule being compensated by the lightness of the burden which so many

¹ Bened. i. p. 278; Select Charters, p. 147.

² Bened. ii. 31; Select Charters, p. 152.

³ Above, p. 510.

⁴ Patent Rolls, ed. Hardy, i. 72; Select Charters, p. 275.

⁵ Above, p. 579, note 1.

joined in bearing. William came forward as the advocate of the poor, and declared that an assessment should be made by which each man should pay in proportion to his wealth: but we are not told by what means he intended to carry out the idea, and his intemperate conduct produced the riot with which our knowledge of the matter terminates¹.

William
Fitz-Osbert
and graduated taxation.

The whole subject of taxation illustrates the gradual way in which king and people were realising the idea of self-government. The application of a representative scheme to the work of assessment, and the recognition that the liability of the payer was based on his own express consent, either to the grant itself or to the amount of his own contribution, mark a state of things in which the concentration of local interests in one general council was all that was needed to secure the tax-payer from arbitrary treatment on the part of either the sovereign or his ministers. This becomes still more evident as we approach the wider but equally important sphere of judicial action, in which not only the principle, but the actual details of the representative system seem progressively to assert themselves. Before entering upon this, however, some notice must be taken of the military system of Henry II and his sons, which, as exemplified both in the scutage and in the Assize of Arms, may be regarded in close connexion with his expedients of taxation.

Summary of the subject.

162. Henry found on his accession the three kinds of military force, which we have described in a former chapter², in full existence, but very incompletely organised, and in consequence of the recent troubles, either burdensome to the nation or thoroughly ineffective. The standing army of mercenaries he was bound by the treaty, which secured him the succession, to disband and banish; the general body of tenants in chivalry was broken up among the feudatories who had been fighting each for himself; and the national force of the fyrd, which by its very nature was capable of only slight discipline and occasional usefulness, had shared in the general disorder of the country consequent on the paralysis of government. Henry from the very first years of his reign saw that peace was his true interest, but that with so system.

The military

¹ Above, p. 508.

² Above, p. 431 sq.

Policy of Henry II
in military matters.

wide an extent of territory to defend, and so many jealous enemies to keep in check, he could have no peace unless he were strong enough to prevent war. Each then of these three expedients he saw would have its uses, whilst each had its defects. The mercenary force was hateful to the nation; the feudal levy was divided according to the interests of its leaders, was not trustworthy in emergency, and, owing to the strict rules as to the nature and duration of service, was incapable of being freely handled: the national militia was either useless for foreign warfare, or could be made useful only by being treated as a mercenary force, an expedient which wasted at once the blood and the treasure of the kingdom. The obvious policy was to use mercenaries for foreign warfare, and to employ the national militia for defence and for the maintenance of peace. The feudal levy, like the rest of the machinery of feudalism which could not be got rid of, might be made occasionally useful in both ways, but would be more useful still, if it could be made to contribute to the support of the crown in ways which would leave the king unembarrassed by the minutiae of feudal custom.

The mercenaries, employed by Henry, Richard,
and John.

This policy Henry maintained more or less continuously. He fought his wars on the Continent by means of mercenaries¹: he had a standing force of 10,000 Brabançons, and a large number of Welsh and Galwegian soldiers. Richard followed the example, and in addition to these embodied a force of Basques and Navarrese, two races whose military malpractices had been condemned by the Lateran Council of 1179, and who with the Brabançons and Catalans enjoy the evil reputation of being the forerunners of the free companies of the next age. Many of these were probably Crusaders who had returned penniless from the East, or mere bandits and brigands who by taking foreign service had escaped the justice of their native lords. John, like his father and brother, maintained a great host of these adventurers, and with them fought the battles and conducted the cruel ravages which mark the close of his reign.

¹ 'Mavult enim princeps stipendarios quam domesticos bellicis apponere casibus.' Dialogus, i. c. 9. 'Nolens vexare agrarios milites nec burgensem nec rusticeorum multitudinem duxit, solidarios vero milites innumeros.' R. de Monte, A.D. 1159.

The mercenary force only comes within our view in two points: it was a breach of the compact of Wallingford, in spirit at least, that such a host ever set foot on English soil; and it was only from the revenue of his kingdom that Henry could draw funds to pay its expenses. The king faithfully observed the condition: on one occasion only were his mercenaries brought to England, and then it was to repel invasion, for the purpose of which a force of Flemish soldiers had already landed. They stayed in England for a month, and left with the king on his return to France¹. Richard had no inclination, as he had indeed no temptation, to break the rule: and John's mercenary army, raised to repel the French invasion of 1213, in itself perhaps justified by the emergency, became one of the great occasions of his downfall. The direct question of the payment of the mercenaries only once arises, that is in 1198, when the justiciar proposed that it should be met by a grant for the express purpose of maintaining a body of knights, and was defeated by the resolution of S. Hugh². But in this case the force required was asked rather as a substitute for personal service than as an engine of national defence, and on that ground it was refused.

Mercenaries brought to England only in exceptional cases.

Payment of mercenaries refused.

Henry's manipulation of the feudal host is a more complex matter, for there can be little doubt that he desired to weaken the great feudatories by disarming their vassals, as well as to obtain a more complete command of the resources that lay within his reach. The first expedient to which he had recourse was to break through the net of feudal custom by demanding that every three knights should, instead of serving in person, equip one of their number, probably for a threefold term of service. This was done in the Welsh war of 1157, and furnished the king with a body of knights, one-third of the whole knightly force of the kingdom, for a space of four months instead of the usual forty days³. A similar, if not the same, plan was adopted by Richard, who in the council of Nottingham in 1194 demanded a third part of the knight-service of the kingdom for his war in Normandy⁴: and John in 1205, by the advice

Henry's management of the feudal force.

Joint equipment.

¹ Bened. i. 74.

² Above, p. 509.

³ R. de Monte, A.D. 1157.

⁴ Hoveden, iii. 242.

Combination for purpose of equipment.

of the council, directed that every nine knights should join to equip a tenth with wages of two shillings a day for the defence of the country¹. The principle involved in this arrangement is exactly analogous to that adopted by Charles the Great in the capitulary of A.D. 807, in which he directs that when there is war in Spain or with the Avars, every five Saxon warriors are to join to equip a sixth; when the war is in Bohemia, every two are to equip a third; for the direct defence of the country each is to present himself in person². This rule is in direct agreement with the Frank system of armament by which the poorer landowners combined to equip a fully-armed warrior, as was the Berkshire custom recorded in Domesday³. The coincidence may be accidental, but it forms one of a great number of small points in which Henry's administrative expedients seem to be borrowed from the Karolingian laws.

Coincidence
of the Frank laws.

Scutage as commuta-
tion of
service.

A second and more comprehensive measure is found in the institution of scutage, which we have already examined under the head of taxation. The transition by which the fyrdwite or penalty for neglecting the summons to arms,—a fine which was provided for also in the most ancient laws of the Germanic races⁴,—was so modified as to become an honourable commutation for personal service, was not so great as might appear at first sight. Richard Fitz-Neal distinctly ascribes it to Henry's wish to spare the blood of his subjects⁵; it had however the further merit of providing the king with money to pay an army which he could handle as he pleased; it helped to disarm a dangerous element in the country; and it solved, or rather waived for the time, the already threatening question of the liability to foreign service. That it was used by John, like everything else, as an engine for extortion, or that in later reigns it was made an excuse for unrighteous exaction is no argument against its original usefulness. The land-tax of the present day is the link which binds us, directly in this point, with the custom of our forefathers.

¹ Patent Rolls, i. 55; Select Charters, pp. 273, 274. ² Baluze, i. 318.

³ Baluze, i. 317, 318; above, p. 117; Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 471 sq.

⁴ See Waitz, D. V. G. iv. 470; Baluze, i. 299, 300. The heribannum of the Franks, in the sense of a fine for not going to war, corresponds with the Anglo-Saxon fyrdwite.

⁵ Above, p. 588, note 1.

The Assize of Arms in 1181 was intended to reform and re-arm the national force of the fyrd. It directed that the whole free population, the communa liberorum hominum, should furnish themselves with arms. The owner of a knight's fee must possess a coat of mail, a helmet, a shield, and a lance; the freeman possessing sixteen marks of rent or chattels must have the same; the owner of ten marks must possess a hauberk, a head-piece of iron, and a lance; and all burghers and freemen a wambais, head-piece, and lance¹. Here again we find a strict analogy with the Karolingian system, which no doubt had had in this respect a continuous existence on the Continent; a similar assize was issued by Philip of Flanders and Philip of France at the same time². Every man who possessed twelve mansi was, by the capitulary of A.D. 805, obliged to possess a brunia or coat of mail³: by one of A.D. 779 it is forbidden that any should give or sell such arms to a stranger⁴: by that of A.D. 812 he who possesses more than the necessary equipment must employ it, or alienate it, in the royal service⁵: all these are minor points in which the language of the Assize almost exactly coincides. It stands however in still closer relation to the system of the Lombard kings.

Assize of Arms, a re-constitution of the fyrd.

The Assize of Arms embodied a principle of perpetual utility, and one the history of which is easily traceable, from the first germ of the obligation in the trinoda necessitas, down to the militia armament of the present times: the several questions, all of them important in their day, connected with distraint of knighthood, the commission of array and the like, directly Importance of the Assize of Arms.

¹ Bened. i. 278.

² Bened. i. 269, 270.

³ Baluze, i. 297, 301, &c. The capitulary 'de expeditione Romana,' which directs that each man shall have a brunia for every ten mansi, is a fabrication; Pertz, Legg. ii. App. p. 3; but the edict of the Lombard king Haistulf (A.D. 750) furnishes a very important parallel: 'Stetit ut ille homo qui habet septem casas massarias habeat loriam suam cum reliqua conciatura sua, debeat habere et cavallos; et si super habuerit per isto numero debeat habere caballos et reliqua armatura: item placuit ut illi homines qui non habent casas massarias et habent 40 jugis terre habeant cavallum et scutum et lanceam; item de minoribus hominibus principi placuit ut, si possunt habere scutum, habeant coccora cum sagittas et arcum; item de illis hominibus qui negotiantes sunt et pecunias non habent, qui sunt majores et potentes habeant loriam et cavallos, scutum et lanceam; qui sunt sequentes habeant caballos scutum et lanceam; et qui minores habeant coccoras cum sagittas et arcum.' Edictus, &c. Longobardorum, ed. Bluhme, Hanover, 1869.

⁴ Baluze, i. 277, 297, 301.

⁵ Ib. i. 340.

The Assize
of Arms.

connect themselves with it. It has however in its relation to the maintenance of the peace another important bearing, which connects it directly with the agency of the county courts. The 'jurati ad arma,' the freemen sworn under the Assize to furnish themselves with arms, were under the special charge of the sheriff, and come into prominence again under Henry III. In the writ of 1205, already referred to, John directs the general armament of the people to resist invasion, but without minute instructions, under the severe penalty of being reduced to perpetual servitude. The duty of watch and ward, of following the hue and cry, and of taking the oath of the peace, prescribed in 1195, serve to connect the several duties of the freeholder with the obligation of the ancient allodial owner; but they come before us in other places.

Maintenance of the feudal force.

Whilst Henry however thus attempted to unite the whole free people under proper discipline for national defence, he maintained the show at least of the fental force: in 1177 he brought the whole of the knights to Winchester, and made a grand demonstration of the military strength of the kingdom¹: the plan was followed on several occasions by John, although, as we have already seen, the only result of the assembly, and perhaps the only purpose for which he brought it together, was the extortion of money, by way of fine or in commutation of further service².

Naval force
of the kingdom.

The naval force of the kingdom during the twelfth century, so far as it can be regarded as a national institution, must have depended for existence on the three principles by which the army was sustained, but in different proportions and combinations. The usage of the reign of Ethelred, according to which each shire furnished its quota of ships³, had disappeared before the Domesday Survey, although England had continued to be a naval power throughout the reign of the Confessor. Possibly the fleet had become less important as the danger of Danish invasion was less constantly imminent. The great vassals of the Conquest had, it is said, merited their great rewards by their contributions to the Norman fleet⁴, but none of them received or held their English lands on the condition of service by sea. The inland counties in some cases reported in Domesday book special services due when the king went to sea; and Dover held its liberties in return for a provision of twenty ships to be kept for fifteen days annually in the king's service¹. The fleet however is not a prominent object in the Survey.

¹ Above, p. 565. ² Ib. p. 523. ³ Ib. p. 116. ⁴ Ib. p. 257.

Ships of Dover.

Yet the kings, possessing so extensive a sea-board in both England and France, were never at a loss for ships; and the ships when assembled were, like the fyrd, ranged according to the counties from which they came. The crusading expedition of A.D. 1147, by which Lisbon was taken, was to a certain extent a volunteer expedition, and may not be a fair instance of the usual practice:
in it however the ships of Norfolk and Suffolk sailed under Hervey Glanvill, a local magnate; those of Kent under Simon of Dover; those of London, Hastings, Southampton, and Bristol under their own captains². The London crusaders of 1188 and 1190 seem to have had an organisation of their own, although in the latter case they formed part of a fleet commanded by royal officers who bore the names of justiciars and constables³.
Richard made laws for this fleet, with the counsel of his 'probi homines,' and enjoined the observance of them on his own subjects in the strictest terms, compelling them to swear obedience, and commanding them as they cared for their fortunes at home to act in proper submission to their justiciars.

The fleets arranged according to the ports from which they came.

Richard
made laws for the fleet.

Even of the fleet of 1190 a large proportion was in no respect national property: the vessels of transport which composed no small part of it were no doubt hired by the king, or possibly impressed for the occasion. Dover and Hastings held their liberties by furnishing twenty ships each for the king's service, and the rest of the Cinque Ports doubtless contributed in proportion. The vessels of war however, the galleys, must have been the property of the king, and it is probably to this crusade that we owe the germ of a permanent navy.
Such a navy must have been from remote antiquity an institu-

The beginning of a permanent navy.

¹ Domesd. i. 1. Sandwich owed the same service; and Romney with other ports owed sea-service.

² Expugnatio Lyxbonensis, Chron. Rich. I, i. p. cxliv.

³ Hoveden, iii. 46 sq.; Benedict, ii. 120 sq. The commanders are called constables by Hoveden, iii. 36, justiciars by Bened. ii. 110.

Growth of navies.

tion among the Mediterranean powers; at this moment the Pisans, the Genoese, and the Venetians possessed large fleets of armed transports, which were hired by the French and German Crusaders: the king of Sicily had his 'stolium fortunatum,' for whose commander he borrowed the Arabic title of Emir or Admiral¹. The Danes and the Flemings likewise possessed naval forces, but these probably belonged to individual adventurers, amongst whom the king or the count might be the first. In England itself Hugh de Puiset, the bishop of Durham, had his own great ship, which became royal property at his death². Except for the distant expeditions to Palestine, the king needed only such a squadron as would carry him and his court from time to time across the Channel³: the defence of the coast must have been maintained as of old by local resources.

The permanent fleet a fleet of mercenaries.

The permanent fleet then was from its very origin a fleet of mercenaries, and was maintained from the royal revenue just as a band of Brabançons might have been, although, as the English merchant service was the readiest resource for recruits, the royal fleet was chiefly manned by Englishmen. John's naval armament was organised on this plan; but it is not until after the date of the Charter, which limits our present inquiries, that its importance comes into historical prominence. The legislation of the Admiralty, which is referred to the present period by writers of the fifteenth century, is either antedated, or so modified by translation and adaptation that it is not to be recognised as twelfth-century work.

The king
was the paymaster.

It is clear from what has been said that the mercenary force of army and navy was, so far as its maintenance is concerned, dependent on no authority but that of the king, who paid its expenses, as he did all other national and personal expenses, out of the general fund accruing to the Exchequer, over which the national council neither possessed nor as yet claimed control.

Judicature.

163. The judicial measures of Henry II constitute a very important part of his general policy. They have been noticed in their personal and political bearing in the last chapter. We have there seen how the original impulse was given to his reforms by the terms on which the Crown was secured to him, how those reforms were moulded by his peculiar genius or by the influence of well-chosen advisers, the tradition of the Exchequer forming an important element; how the several steps in advance were partly guided by a desire to limit the judicial power of the great feudal vassals, and to protect the people against the misuse by the local magnates of that influence in the county courts which had fallen into their hands. We have accordingly noted the chief occasions on which the sheriffs, and even the royal judges, were brought to special account, and displaced to make way, either for men who had received a better legal training, or for such as were less closely connected with the ruling families of the district, or for those who would bring the shire administration into more thorough concert with the supreme administration, if not completely under its control. We have traced, under the history of Hubert Walter and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, a growing spirit of legal reform, a rapid invention of new machinery or adaptation of the old machinery to new ends, not indeed free from the imputation that it was chiefly stimulated by financial considerations, but still in its ultimate results conducive to the growth and conscious realisation of the idea of self-government. And we have further inferred that the attitude taken by the clergy, the barons, and the commons at the date of the Great Charter was produced by the altered circumstances in which the kingdom was placed by these changes: that whilst on the one hand they had given to the king an overwhelming power, they had on the other revealed to the Three Estates the unity of their interests, and the possibility of erecting a well-compacted fabric of liberty. We have now to trace the mechanical workings involved in this history.

¹ Bened. i. 171; ii. 128.

² Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 493.

³ Henry II had one ship of his own until Becket ordered three very good ones to be built and equipped; these he presented to his master. W. Fitz-Stephen (V. S. Thom.), i. 193. The full number furnished by the Cinque Ports under Edward III was fifty-seven, twenty-one each by Dover and Hastings, five each by Romney, Hythe, and Sandwich.

Recapitulation of the judicial policy of Henry II;

and of Richard's ministers.

Henry at his accession found the administrative system in the most attenuated state. Twenty years of misrule had seen the polity of his grandfather broken up rather than suspended, and very few of the old servants of the State survived. Such judicial

Condition of things in 1155.

Reforms of Henry II,
his own
work.

machinery as existed seems to have been sustained by Richard de Lucy, but the year which had elapsed since the pacification had only given time to attempt the uprooting of the evils of misrule, not to lay the foundations or to rebuild the fabric of a sound government. Hence Henry's reforms, although, so far as he was able to get aid from his grandfather's ministers, they were based upon the older system, owe very much to the king himself, and, from the outset of the reign, exhibit marks of decided growth and difference from the former state of things. The Exchequer was restored under Bishop Nigel as it had existed under Bishop Roger, but the Curia Regis from the first presents a much more definite appearance than before. Still one with the Exchequer in its personal staff, it has much more independent action and a wider sphere; it develops a new and elaborate system of rules and customs. The king's personal tribunal continues to be a supreme and ultimate resort, but the royal judicature from time to time throws off offshoots, which before the end of the period constitute a system of courts and jurisdictions that with some developments and modifications subsist to our own day.

Division of the subject of judicature.

The judicature may be divided into three branches, the central and supreme court or courts, the provincial, popular, or common law tribunals, and the visitatorial jurisdiction by which the first interfered with, regulated, and remodelled the second: and these may be noticed in the order of their authority; first, the king's courts; secondly, the itinerant justices; thirdly, the local tribunals.

The Exchequer and Curia Regis.

The Exchequer and the Curia Regis continue throughout this period to exist in that close union which proves their original identity; but whereas under Henry I the financial character, under Henry II the judicial aspect, of the board is the most prominent. In the former reign the Curia Regis, except when the king takes a personal share in the business, seems to be a judicial session of the Exchequer, an adaptation of Exchequer machinery to judicial purposes; under the latter the Exchequer seems to be rather a financial session of the Curia Regis. The king is ostensibly the head of the one¹, the justiciar the principal actor in the other ; but still the fabric is the same : the judges are the same ; the transactions of the Curia frequently take place in the chamber of the Exchequer, and are recorded in its Rolls ; and, through all the changes by which the Curia is modelled and divided, the Exchequer forms a rallying-point, or common ground, on which all the members of the supreme judicature seem to meet, as in the more modern Court of Exchequer Chamber at the present day.

¹ 'Regis Curia, in qua ipse in propria persona jura decernit; . . . ex officio

Close union of the two.

The financial system of the Exchequer, as it existed under Henry I, has been already described, and illustrated from the single Pipe Roll of the reign as well as from the *Dialogus de Scaccario*¹. The latter work describes the practice of the year 1178, in language which shows a substantial agreement with the system presented in the Roll of 1130. This organisation therefore it is unnecessary to recapitulate here. The points in which change and development are traceable are either minute matters of procedure, which scarcely come within the view of constitutional history, or matters of legal interest which belong more strictly to the history of the Curia Regis and itinerant jurisdictions. The Court of Exchequer, taking special cognisance of suits touching the revenue, possessing a different body of judges and a distinct code of customs, has not yet a separate existence ; but it may be justly presumed that where such suits were entertained, the judges before whom they were tried would be those who were most familiar with the financial work. The fines levied for legal purposes, which were originally the determinate agreements between litigants drawn up and recorded in the king's court, and were a source of constant income to the Crown, were regularly concluded 'ad scaccarium'² ; but the judges who witnessed the transaction were not a permanent committee of officers ; they were apparently a selection for each occasion from the whole body of the Curia, all of whom were, it is probable, equally eligible and of equal authority. The records of the Exchequer grow during the period in bulk and in number : the Continuity of Exchequer usages.

Special legal business in the Exchequer.

principaliter residet [in scaccario] inmo et praesidet primus in regno capitalis scilicet justitia.' Dialogus, i. c. 4.

¹ Above, p. 377.
² See illustrations of business done 'ad scaccarium' in the reign of Henry II in Madox, Hist. Exch. pp. 144, 145.

Increase of Exchequer
Records.

Pipe Rolls of Henry II¹ are supplemented under John by Oblate, Liberate, and Mise Rolls², in which the particular outgoings on the heads of royal allowances, benefactions, and other payments are circumstantially recorded. The Great Rolls of the Pipe however continue to contain the summaries and authoritative details of the national account.

Growth of the Curia
Regis.

The Curia Regis of Henry II attained its ultimate constitution by a long series of somewhat rapid changes. In the early years of the reign it appears to be, as it had been under Henry I, a tribunal of exceptional resort to which appeals, although increasing in number, were still comparatively rare, and the action of which is scarcely distinguishable from that of the national council. The king himself took a leading part in the business, much of which was done in his presence; and even in his absence the action of the justiciar seems to depend on the royal pleasure as indicated by special writs. Such at least is the impression made by the long details of litigation contained in the Chronicle of Battle, and in the account of Richard de Anesty, who has preserved the record of his delays and expenses in a suit which lasted from 1158 to 1163³. Yet side by side with this there appears a show of judicial activity among the subordinate members of the household, the court, and the Exchequer. The Chancellor, as we learn from the Lives of S. Thomas, was constantly employed in judicial work, whether in attendance on the king, or, as the Pipe Rolls also testify, in provincial visitations. As early as the second year of the reign,

Personal
sessions of the king.

The Chancellor.

¹ Only three Pipe Rolls of Henry II are in print, one of Richard, and one of the reign of John: it is greatly to be desired that the whole series for the two former reigns might be published. They are the only complete series of records for the period, and throw a great deal of light on every department of history, although commonly known only through the medium of Madox's work.

² The Fines of the reigns of Richard and John were edited by Hunter among the publications of the Record Commission, in 1835 and 1844; the Rotuli de oblatiis of John and the Rotuli 'de Liberate ac de Misis et Praestitis' in 1844 by Sir T. Duffus Hardy; the Rotuli Curiae Regis of Richard and John by Sir F. Palgrave in 1835; and the Close and Patent Rolls of John between 1833 and 1844 by Sir T. D. Hardy.

³ This important record is only to be found in Sir F. Palgrave's Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth (vol. ii), where it is illustrated by most interesting notes.

Henry of Essex the Constable, Thomas the Chancellor, and the earl of Leicester the cojusticiar, are found hearing pleas in different counties¹. The Chancellor, if we may believe the consistent evidence of his biographers, habitually relieved the king of the irksome part of his judicial duties². From the Constitutions of Clarendon again we learn that the Curia Regis possessed the organisation of an established tribunal, the action of which in ecclesiastical cases must be held to prove a still wider action in secular causes. In 1165, the year after the enactment of the Constitutions, we have an agreement between the abbots of Westminster and S. Alban's attested by several of the ministers of the Exchequer under the title of justices³, and in 1166 we come to the Assize of Clarendon, which marks an epoch in the administration of, at least, the criminal law. During these years—for such is the reasonable inference—the judicial work of the Curia Regis had been growing until it was more than the king and his regular ministers of state could dispatch, and was thus falling, even more completely than it had done under Henry I, into the hands of the officers of the Exchequer. The system of recognitions was, as the Constitutions of Clarendon prove, in full play, and the superior chances of justice which that system afforded were drawing larger business to the court, and at the same time involved a vast 'officina brevium,' with a body of trained clerks⁴ and a regular code of practical jurisprudence. Unfortunately we are unable to discover the date at which the Great Assize was issued; if this were known, it would probably be found to coincide with one of the periods at which great changes were made in the judicial staff.

Trials in the country.

The Curia in 1104.

In 1166.

Increase of business.

The first however of these epochs is the year 1166. The

¹ Pipe Rolls of Henry II, pp. 17, 26, 65. An assize of the Chancellor and Henry of Essex is mentioned in Essex, pleas of the Chancellor and the earl of Leicester in Lincolnshire, in the second year. In the fourth year are entered pleas of the Chancellor in Middlesex.

² Roger of Pontigny (V. S. Thom. ed. Giles), i. 102; W. Fitz-Stephen, ibid. i. 170, 186.

³ Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 30; Formulare Angl. p. xix.

⁴ Under Becket as Chancellor were fifty-two clerks; some of them however belonged to his private retinue. W. Fitz-Stephen, i. 196.

Itinerant
justices in 1166.

changes in the Curia Regis at this date were so great as to call for especial notice from John of Salisbury, even in the height of the Becket controversy¹; and the Assize of Clarendon, which belongs to the same year, denotes the character of the changes. Yet the Assize of Clarendon was directed to the improvement of provincial justice; and it was carried out, not by a new body of judges, but by two of the king's ministers, the justiciar and the earl of Essex, with the assistance of the sheriffs, who, acting under royal writ as administrators of the new law, still engrossed the title of 'justitiae errantes².' The development of the central jurisdiction is traceable by inference from that of the provincial judicature. The four Exchequer officers³ who assessed the aid pur fille marier in 1168 are found hearing placita and attesting concords shortly after; it follows that they acted not only as taxers but as judges. The six circuits of the tallagers of 1173 were no doubt suggestive of the two circuits of the justices in 1175 and the six circuits of the judges in 1176⁴. It is then to these years, from 1166 to 1176, that we must refer the creation or development of the large staff of judges in the Curia Regis which we find acting in 1178. All the eighteen justices of 1176 were officers of the Exchequer; some of them are found in 1175 holding 'placita Curiae Regis' in bodies of three or four judges⁵, and not in the same combinations in which they took their judicial journeys. We can scarcely help the conclusion that the new jurisprudence was being administered by

In 1168.

In 1176.

Growth of the staff of judges.

¹ 'Quae autem circa Anglorum curiam innovantur, ubi rerum crebrae mutationes sunt, vobis notiora esse arbitror quam nobis.' John of Salisbury writes thus to Bartholomew bishop of Exeter; Ep. 145.

² Above, p. 389, note 1.

³ Richard of Ilchester, Wido dean of Waltham, Reginald of Warenne, and William Basset, were the four. See Madox, Hist. Exch. pp. 102, 145.

⁴ See the lists for 1176, in Bened. i. 107; Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 86; and those for 1173 are in the Pipe Rolls only. In 1175, Ranulph Glanvill and Hugh de Cressi visited the eastern and midland counties, William de Lauvalei and Thomas Basset the south and west. Ibid. p. 85.

⁵ For instance, in 1176 William Fitz-Ralph, Bertram de Verdun, and William Basset hear pleas in Curia Regis touching Buckinghamshire and Bedfordshire: yet, on the eyre, these two counties are visited by three other judges; moreover Bertram de Verdun visited Worcestershire, and the other two with Hugh de Gundeville visited seven midland counties. The first placita Curiae Regis mentioned by Madox are in 1175. Hist. Exch. pp. 64, 65.

committees of the general body of justices, who were equally qualified to sit in the Curia and Exchequer and to undertake the fiscal and judicial work of the eyre.

The year 1178 furnishes another epoch. Henry finding that the eighteen judges of the Curia were too many, that they caused entanglements in the business of the court, and expense and distress to the suitors, reduced them at once to five¹. Some were dismissed perhaps for misconduct; but very many of the existing judges reappear again in functions scarcely distinguishable from those which they had discharged before. Yet the statement of the diminution of their number, which is made by a historian singularly well informed as to the affairs of the court, has considerable significance. From this date we may fix the existence of the sittings of the Curia Regis 'in Banco.' Their proceedings are still nominally transacted 'coram rege,' but nominally only. 'The five are to hear all the complaints of the kingdom and to do right, and not to depart from the Curia Regis.' Questions which are too hard for them are to be referred to the king in person, who will decide them with the advice of the wise men of the kingdom.

Henry reduces the number in 1178.

The Curia Regis 'in banco.'

The year 1179 witnessed another change, possibly however of persons rather than of system. The great justiciar had resigned, and Henry had put the office as it were into commission, employing the bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Winchester as heads of three bodies of itinerant judges, each containing two clerks and three knights. A fourth body, to which the northern counties were assigned, contained Ranulf Glanvill, who was to succeed, the next year, to the justiciarship, with five other judges. This fourth committee, according to the chronicler,

Changes in 1179.

¹ Benedict, i. 207: 'Itaque dominus rex moram faciens in Anglia quaesivit de justitiis quos in Anglia constituerat, si bene et modeste tractaverunt homines regni; et cum didicisset quod terra et homines terrae nimis gravati essent ex tanta justiciarum multitudine, quia octodecim erant numero; per consilium sapientium regni sui quinque tantum elegit, duos scilicet clericos et tres laicos: et erant omnes de privata familia sua. Et statuit quod illi quinque audirent omnes clamores regni, et rectum facerent, et quod a Curia Regis non recederent, sed ibi ad audiendum clamores hominum remanerent, ita ut, si aliqua quaestio inter eos veniret quae per eos ad finem duci non posset, auditui regio praesentaretur et sicut ei et sapientioribus regni placeret terminaretur.'

The Curia
in 1179.

entered into the place assigned in 1178 to the five judges retained in the Curia; 'these six are the justices constituted in the Curia Regis to hear the complaints of the people¹:' why the circuit most remote from the capital was assigned to them we are not told, but as the whole business of the eyre was concluded between April 1 and August 27, there could have been no insuperable difficulty.

This is the last notice of the constitution of the Curia Regis which the historians of Henry's reign have preserved to us: and the modifications which are traceable in records from this point to the date of Magna Carta are of personal rather than legal importance. The work of Glanvill furnishes us with the rules of procedure; the Rotuli Curiae Regis which begin in 1194 afford a record of the actual business done, and the names of the judges employed are discoverable from these and other records.

General conclusion as to the growth of the Curia.

So far then as concerns the framework of the supreme judiciary, our conclusion for the present is this: from the year 1179 sessions of 'justitiarum in Banco²' are regularly held in the Curia Regis, nominally but not actually 'coram rege.' These justices are a selection from a much larger staff, before whom Exchequer business is done, and who undertake the work of the circuits: and it would appear probable that the selection was altered from time to time, possibly from year to year. Their work was to hear all suits that were brought before the king, not only criminal but civil, cases in which the revenue or rights of the king were touched, and cases of private litigation with which the king, except as supreme judge, had no concern: all the business in fact which came at a later period before the courts of King's Bench, Exchequer, and Common Pleas. Although their deliberations were not held in the king's presence, they followed his person, or the justiciar in the king's absence; a rule which must have been most burdensome to ordinary suitors, and which accordingly, so far as touches private civil suits or 'communia placita,' was abolished by Magna Carta. The fixing of the Common Pleas at Westminster broke up the unity of the Curia¹; but it was not until the end of the reign of Henry III that the general staff was divided into three distinct and permanent bodies of judges, each under its own chief.

¹ Bened. i. 238; R. de Diceto, c. 605.

² Glanvill, lib. ii. 6; viii. c. 1; xi. c. 1: 'coram Justitiis Domini Regis in banco residentibus.' Coke's notion that by this session of the judges the Common Bench or Court of Common Pleas is meant, is mentioned by Madox only to refute it; Hist. Exch. p. 546. Foss also argues conclusively against it; Judges of England, ii. 161. See also Hardy's Introduction to the Close Rolls, vol. i. pp. xxv. sq. Instances of Final Concords made before the justices of the Curia, answering to those described by Glanvill as made before the justices in Banco, will be found in Madox, Formulare Anglicanum, pp. 217 sq., and in the Fines published by the Record Commission; above, p. 598, note 2.

The later divisions of the courts.

But the court or courts thus organised must no longer be regarded as the last resource of suitors. The reservation of knotty cases to be decided by the king with the council of his wise men², cases which, as we learn from the Dialogus de Scaccario, included questions of revenue as well as of law in general³, continues the ancient personal jurisdiction of the sovereign. The very act that seems to give stability and consistency to the ordinary jurisdiction of the Curia, reduces it to a lower rank. The judicial supremacy of the king is not limited or fettered by the new rule; it has thrown off an offshoot, or, as the astronomical theorists would say, a nebulous envelope, which has rolled up into a compact body, but the old nucleus of light remains unimpaired. The royal justice, diffused through the close personal council⁴, or tempered and adapted by royal grace and equity under the pen of the chancellor⁵, or exercised in the national

The court of royal audience.

The judicial supremacy of the king.

¹ By the seventeenth article of Magna Carta. The Provisions of the Exchequer, 12 Edw. I, and the Articuli super Cartas, 28 Edw. I, c. 4, forbid Common Pleas to be holden henceforth in the Exchequer.

² Above, p. 601. The same principle is stated in the Articles of the Assize of Northampton: 'Nisi tam grandis sit querela quod non possit deduci sine domino rege, vel talis quam justitiæ ei reportent pro dubitatione sua.'

³ Dialogus, i. c. 8: 'Si . . . fieri contigerit, ut inter ipsos majores dissensionis oriatur occasio . . . horum omnium cognitio ipsi principi reservabitur.'

⁴ See Sir Francis Palgrave's Essay on the Jurisdiction of the King's Council, and Dicey's Essay on the Privy Council.

⁵ The growth of the Chancellor's jurisdiction does not fall within the present period; but the increased importance of his position is remarkable, and the germ of his future functions was in being already. William Fitz-Stephen, who was one of Becket's clerks, writes thus: 'Cancellarii Angliæ est ut secundus a rege in regno habeatur, ut altera parte sigilli regii, quod et ad ejus pertinet custodiam, propria signet mandata; ut capella regis in ipsius sit dispositione et cura, ut vacantes archiepiscopatus, episcopatus, abbatias et baronias cadentes in manu regis ipse suscipiat et conservet; ut assembly as in the ancient witenagemot, or concentrated in the hands of an irresponsible executive in the Star Chamber, has for many generations and in many various forms to assert its vitality, unimpaired by its successive emanations.

Its continuity.

The growth of the itinerant judicature.

In tracing the history of the central judicature we have had to anticipate the leading points of interest in the development of the visitatorial jurisdiction. The whole may be briefly summed up. The circuits of the royal officers for fiscal and judicial purposes, which we have traced in the reign of Henry I, continue to have the same character under Henry II, the judicial forms following rather than preceding the fiscal. In 1166 the itinerant court receives new and full instructions from the Assize of Clarendon, but it is still the Curia Regis in progress, a great part of the work being done by the sheriffs¹. In 1176 six circuits are formed, eighteen judges are specially told off in six detachments, as had been done in the fiscal iter of 1173: in 1178, 1179, and 1180 there seem to be four circuits, and the arrangements in the later years vary between two and six. Under Richard we have still further modifications, and the same in the early years of John, none of them however involving a new principle of construction, but all perhaps implying a restriction omnibus regis adsit consiliis, ut etiam non vocatus accedat; ut omnia sigilliferi regii clerici sui manu signentur, omnia cancellarii consilio disponantur; item ut, suffragantibus ei per Dei gratiam vite meritis, non moriatur nisi archiepiscopus aut episcopus, si voluerit. Inde est quod cancellaria emenda non est.' V. S. Thom. i. 186. The Dialogus de Scaccario represents the justiciar as 'primus post regem;' the term 'secundus a rege' probably means next after the justiciar; the form is frequently used by Becket's friends. The Dialogus (lib. i. c. 5) confirms most of the statements of the biographer just cited; nothing is done without his consent and advice either in the Curia or in the Exchequer; he has charge of the royal seal, sealing it up into its loculus or purse, which is kept by the treasurer.

Formation and changes of circuits.

The statement that the chancery is not purchaseable is disproved by some important exceptions. See above, pp. 384, 497. The fact that the chancellor was always in attendance on the king led to the petitions for royal grace and favour being entrusted to him, first for custody, and afterwards for hearing. Hence arose the equitable jurisdiction by which he remedied the 'summum jus' of the common law or promised remedies in cases which were not provided for by the common lawyers.

¹ The action of a justice itinerant at Bedford in 1163 was one of the grounds of the quarrel between the king and Becket; the judge was Simon Fitz-Peter, who had ceased to be sheriff of Bedfordshire two years before. Rog. Pont. S. T. C. i. 114.

of the local jurisdictions of the sheriff and the shire-moot¹. At last, in the eighteenth clause of Magna Carta, the king undertakes to send two justices four times a year to take the assizes of Mort d'ancestor, Novel disseisin, and Darrein presentment. This arrangement proved no doubt far too burdensome to be continued, but the changes indicated in the re-issues of the Charter and carried into effect in periodical issues of the judges lie beyond our present inquiry. The justices of the year 1176 are the first to whom the name Justitiarum Itinerantes is given in the Pipe Rolls: the commissioners of 1170 are called Barones errantes: 'perlustrantes judices' is the term used by the author of Dialogus; the sheriffs were the 'errantes justitie' known to John of Salisbury in 1159. The various applications of the terms may mark the growth and consolidation of a system by which the sheriffs were deprived of the most important of their functions.

The visits of the itinerant justices form the link between the Curia Regis and the Shire-moot, between royal and popular justice, between the old system and the new. The courts in which they preside are the ancient county courts, under new conditions, but substantially identical with those of the Anglo-Saxon times. The full shire-moot consists, as before, of all the lords of land and their stewards, and the representatives of the townships, the parish priest, the reeve and four men from each; but the times of meeting, the sphere of business, and the nature of procedure during the period before us have undergone great and significant changes, some of which can be minutely traced, whilst others can be accounted for only by conjecture.

The Anglo-Saxon shire-moot was held twice a year: the county court of Henry I was held as it had been in King Edward's days, that is, according to the 'Leges Henrici I,' twice a year still. Yet in the confirmation of the Great Charter, issued by Henry III in 1217, it is ordered that the county court shall meet not more than once a month, or less frequently where such has been the custom. It is not easy to determine the date justices.

Itinerant

The courts of these justices are full county courts.

Times of holding the county
court.

¹ Above, pp. 505 sq.

Increase of small suits in the county courts.

or the causes of so great a change. Possibly the sheriffs had abused their power of summoning special meetings and of fining absentees; a custom which comes into prominence in the reign of Henry III, and which shows that it was the direct interest of the sheriffs to multiply the occasions of summons. Possibly it may have arisen from the increase of business under the new system of writs and assizes, which involved the frequent adjournment of the court for short terms: possibly from an earlier usage by which the practice of the county court was assimilated to that of the hundred with the special object of determining suits between litigants from different hundreds or liberties. Or it may have been caused by the gradual withdrawal of the more important suits from the shire-moot, the natural result of which would be the increase of the number of less important meetings for the convenience of petty suitors.

Limitations of the power of the sheriff.

The power of the sheriff, again, had been very much limited, not only by the course of political events noticed in the last chapter, but by the process of centering the administration of justice in the hands of the itinerant justices and the Curia Regis,—a process the stages of which may be more easily traced. At the beginning of the period the sheriffs were the ‘errantes justitie,’ only occasionally superseded and superintended by the itinerant justices. As sheriffs, probably, they presided in the court of the county in which the suitors were the judges, and were answerable for the maintenance of the peace: as royal justices they acted under special writ, managed the pleas of the Crown, and conducted the tourn and leet, or the courts which were afterwards so called. In 1166 they were still in the same position; the itinerant justices by themselves, and the sheriffs by themselves, received and acted on the presentment of the grand juries. But from 1170, after the great inquest into their exactions¹, their authority is more and more limited. In the Assize of Northampton they are rather servants than colleagues of the itinerant justices; in 1194 it is provided that they shall no more be justices in their own counties, and the elective office of coroner is instituted to relieve them from the duty of keeping the pleas of the Crown¹. In 1195 the duty of receiving the oath of the peace is laid, not on the sheriffs, but on knights assigned in each county, the duty of the sheriffs being only to receive and keep the criminals taken by these knights until the coming of the justices. In 1215 the barons propose that the sheriffs shall no longer meddle with the pleas of the Crown, without the coroners²; whilst the Great Charter, in the clause founded on that proposal, forbids either sheriff or coroner to hold such pleas at all. We may question whether these regulations were strictly observed, especially as before the year 1258 the sheriffs seem to be as powerful as ever, but they show a distinct policy of substituting the action of the justices for that of the sheriffs, a policy which might have led to judicial absolutism were it not that the growing institution of trial by jury vested in the free-men of the county far more legal power than it took away from the sheriffs. These officers too had long ceased even remotely to represent the local feeling or interest.

¹ Above, p. 472.

The sheriff forbidden to hold pleas of the Crown.

The shire-moot which assembled to meet the itinerant judges was, however, a much more complete representation of the county than the ordinary county court which assembled from month to month. The great franchises, liberties, and manors which by their tenure were exempted from shire-moot and hundred were, before these visitors, on equal terms with the freeholders of the geldable, as the portion of the county was called, which had not fallen into the franchises. Not even the tenants of a great escheat in the royal hands escaped the obligation to attend their visitation³. The representation was thoroughly organised: side by side with the reeve and four men of the rural townships appeared the twelve legal men of each of the chartered boroughs which owed no suit to the ordinary county court⁴. In the formation of the jury of pre-

The fullest county court held by the itinerant justices.

¹ Above, p. 505.

² Articles of the Barons, art. 14; Magna Carta, art. 24.

³ Assize of Clarendon, art. 9, 11.

⁴ Charter of Dunwich, Select Charters, p. 303. Customs of Kent, Statutes of the Realm, i. 223. Instances of this sort of representation taken from the Assize Rolls will be found in Eyton's History of Shropshire in Representative juries.

sentment the same principle is as clear; each hundred supplies twelve legal men, and each township four, to make report to the justices under the Assize of Clarendon, and in 1194 twelve knights from each hundred answer for their hundred under all the articles of the eyre, whether criminal, civil, or fiscal¹. The court thus strengthened and consolidated, is adopted by the royal officers as an instrument to be used for other purposes. All who are bound to attend before the itinerant justices are compelled to attend the forest courts²; and they probably form the 'plenus comitatus' which elects, according to Magna Carta, the knights who are to take the assizes, and the twelve knights who are to inquire into the abuses which Magna Carta was designed to reform.

Institution of juries, a step in the growth of a representative system.

164. It is in the new system of recognition, assizes, and presentments by jury that we find the most distinct traces of the growth of the principle of representation; and this in three ways. In the first place, the institution of the jury was itself based on a representative idea: the jurors, to whatever fact or in whatever capacity they swore, declared the report of the community as to the fact in question. In the second place, the method of inquest was in England brought into close connexion with the procedure of the shire-moot, and thus the inquisitorial process, whether its object was the recognition of a right or the presentment of a criminal, was from the moment of its introduction carried on in association with the previously existing representative institutions, such as were the reeve and four best men, the twelve senior thegns, and the later developments of the same practice which have been just enumerated in our account of the formation of the county court and the usage of legal assessment. In the third place, the particular expedients adopted for the regulation considerable numbers. Writs of Henry III, from 1217 onwards, are found among the Close Rolls, ordering the summonings to the county court to be addressed to 'archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, knights, and freeholders; four men of each township and twelve burghers of each borough to meet the justices.' Rot. Cl. i. 380, 403, 473, 476; Select Charters, p. 349.

¹ Hoveden, iii. 262; above, p. 505.

² Assize of Woodstock, art. 11. Cf. Magna Carta, art. 44; Carta de Foresta, art. 2; Assize of Arms, of 1253; Select Charters, p. 365.

of the inquests paved the way in a remarkable manner for the system of county representation in the parliament as we saw it exemplified on the first occasion of its appearance in the reign of John. The use of election and representation in the courts of law furnished a precedent for the representation of the county by two sworn knights in the national council. On each of these heads some detail is necessary which may throw light incidentally on some kindred points of interest.

The history of the Jury has been treated by various writers from every possible point of view¹: its natural origin, its historical development, the moral ideas on which it is founded, and the rational analysis of its legal force, have all been discussed many times over with all the apparatus of learning and the acute penetration of philosophical research. Some of these aspects are foreign to our present inquiry. Yet the institution is of so great interest both in itself and in its relations that some notice of it is indispensable.

Trial by jury variously treated.

We have sketched, in an earlier stage of this work, the formation of the primitive German courts: they were tribunals of fully qualified members of the community, a selection it might be from a body of equally competent companions, able to declare the law or custom of the country, and to decide what, according to that custom, should be done in the particular case brought before them. They were not set to decide what was the truth of facts, but to determine what action was to be taken upon proof given. The proof was itself furnished by three means, the oaths of the parties to the suit and their compurgators, the production of witnesses, and the use of the ordeal: the practice of trial by battle being a sort of ultimate expedient to obtain a practical decision, an expedient partly akin to the ordeal as a judgment of God, and partly based on the idea that where legal measures had failed recourse must be had to the primitive law of force, —the feud or right of private war,—only regulated as far as

Modes of trial among the German
races.

Oaths, evidence,
ordeal.

¹ See Palgrave, Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth; Forsyth, History of Trial by Jury; Biener, das Englische Geschwornengericht; Gneist, Self-Government, i. 74 sq.; K. Maurer in the Kritische Ueberschau, v. pp. 180 sq., 332 sq.; and Brunner, Entstehung der Schwurgerichte.

Formalism
of the system.

possible by law and regard for the saving of life. For each of these methods of proof there were minute rules and formalities, the infringement or neglect of which put the offender out of court. The complainant addressed his charge to the defendant in solemn traditional form; the defendant replied to the complainant by an equally solemn verbal and logical contradiction. The compurgators swore, with joined hands and in one voice, to the purity and honesty of the oath of their principal¹. Where the oath was inconclusive, the parties brought their witnesses to declare such knowledge as their position as neighbours had given them; the court determined the point to which the witnesses must swear, and they swore to that particular fact². They were not examined or made to testify all they knew; but swore to the fact on which the judges determined that evidence should be taken. If the witnesses also failed the ordeal was used. And where the defeated party ventured to impugn the sentence thus obtained, he might challenge the determination of the court by appealing the members of it to trial by combat. This practice, however common among some branches of the German stock, was by no means universal, and, as has been pointed out, was not practised among the native English.

The germ of the jury not contained in this.

In these most primitive proceedings are found circumstances, which on a superficial view seem analogous to later trial by jury: but on a closer inspection they warrant no distinct impression of the kind. The ancient judges who declare the law and give the sentence—the rachinburgii, or the scabini—are not in any respect the jurors of the modern system, who ascertain the fact by hearing and balancing evidence, leaving the law and sentence to the presiding magistrate: nor are the ancient witnesses who depose to the precise point in dispute, more nearly akin to the jurors who have to inquire the truth and declare

¹ The Anglo-Saxon forms of oath may be found in the Ancient Laws, ed. Thorpe, pp. 76, 77. The oath of the compurgator runs thus: 'On thone Drihten se ath is elæne and unmaene the N. swor.'

² The number of witnesses required varied in the different nations; the Saxon and Lombard laws required two at least: the Bavarian, three or more: the Frank laws, seven or twelve, according to the importance of the matter in question. Brunner, Schwurgericht, p. 51.

the result of the inquiry, than to the modern witnesses who swear to speak not only the truth and nothing but the truth, but the whole truth. The compurgators again swear to confirm the oath of their principal, and have nothing in common with the jury but the fact that they swear¹. Yet although this is distinctly the case, the procedure in question is a step in the history of the jury: the first form in which the jury appears is that of witness, and the principle that gives force to that witness is the idea that it is the testimony of the community: even the idea of the compurgatory oath is not without the same element; the compurgators must be possessed of qualities and legal qualifications which shall secure their credibility.

Yet the oath and evidence are of a representative character.

Beyond this stage, modified it is true here as elsewhere by different circumstances and local usages, the Anglo-Saxon system did not proceed. The compurgation, the sworn witness, and the ordeal supplied the proof; and the sheriff with his fellows, the bishop, the shire-thegns, the justices and juratores, the suitors of the court, declared the law. Only in the law of Ethelred, by which the twelve senior thegns in each wapentake are sworn not to accuse any falsely², do we find the germ of a more advanced system, in which the community seems to undertake the duty of prosecution: but the interpretation of the passage is disputed, and its bearing contested, although it seems to imply no more than that the English were not far in arrear of the Frank jurisprudence.

Anglo-Saxon system.

The twelve thegns in the shire-moot.

The whole system of recognition by sworn inquest, with the single exception, if it be an exception, which has just been mentioned, was introduced into England by the Normans: the laws of Edward, the Domesday Survey, the fiscal recognitions of the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I³, are distinctly a novelty, a part of the procedure of the newly-developed system of government. Various theories have been invented for their origin. Many writers of authority have maintained that the entire jury system is indigenous in England, some Recognitions introduced into England by the Normans.

¹ Forsyth, Hist. of Jury, p. 83.

² Above, pp. 115, 396.

³ Above, pp. 385, 394, 395.

Various opinions on the national origin of
jury.

deriving it from Celtic tradition based on the principles of Roman law and adopted by the Anglo-Saxons and Normans from the people they had conquered¹. Others have regarded it as a product of that legal genius of the Anglo-Saxons of which Alfred is the mythic impersonation; or as derived by that nation from the customs of primitive Germany or from their intercourse with the Danes. Nor, even when it is admitted that the system of recognition was introduced from Normandy, have legal writers agreed as to the source from which the Normans themselves derived it. One scholar maintains that it was brought by the Norsemen from Scandinavia; another that it was derived from the processes of the canon law; another that it was developed on Gallie soil from Roman principles; another that it came from Asia through the Crusades, a theory which has little more to recommend it than the still wilder supposition that it is of Slavonic origin, and borrowed by the Angles and Saxons from their neighbours in Northern Europe. But all these theories on examination show that their inventors have either been misled by superficial coincidences, or argue on hypothesis only. The only principle which the systems on which the theories are built have in common is the use of the oath as an instrument of judicial procedure, and this use is universal. The truth seems to be that the inquest by sworn recognitors is directly derived from the Frank Capitularies, into which it may have been adopted from the fiscal regulations of the Theodosian Code¹, and thus own some distant relationship with the Roman jurisprudence. The Karolingian kings issued instructions to their Missi very much as Henry II issued instructions to his itinerant justices, and they gave special commissions of inquiry into fiscal and judicial matters to be answered by the oath of sworn witnesses in the district court². These answers then embodied the belief or knowledge of the local court as representing the community, every qualified member of the community being a member also of the court. The persistence of the inquisitorial system is proved not only by Norman charters and customs, but

¹ According to Brunner, pp. 11-19, the origin of the jury among the Welsh, from whom it was borrowed by the Anglo-Saxons, is maintained by Philipps (On Juries) and Probert (On the Ancient Laws of Cambria); Selden, Spelman, Coke, Turner, Phillips, and G. L. von Maurer regard it as a product of Anglo-Saxon genius. Of the authors who hold that it was imported from primitive Germany, Brunner mentions Bacon, Montesquieu, Blackstone, Savigny, and Nicholson in the preface to Wilkins' Anglo-Saxon Laws; Wormius and Worsaae held that it was derived from the Norsemen through the Danes; Hickes, Reeves, and others, that it was derived from the Norsemen through the Normans of the Conquest; and Konrad Maurer, who has investigated the analogous system in use among the Norsemen, argues for a common North German origin, from which the principle of jury has been developed in different ways by the several races in which it is found. Of those writers who allow that it is of Norman introduction, Daniels maintained that the Normans found it existing in France; Möhl derived it from the usages of the canon law; Meyer supposed that it came from Asia by way of the Crusades; Maciejowski claimed it for the Slavonic neighbours of the Angles and Saxons. The theory given in the text is mainly that of Palgrave, but corrected and adjusted by the recent writings of Dr. Brunner.

The Inquests
of the Frank
kings.

¹ Palgrave, English Commonwealth, p. 271; Brunner, p. 87. The following passages from the Theodosian Code are cited by Brunner: 'Super vacantibus ac caducis . . . certi etiam dirigantur qui cuncta solerter inquirent et ejus fuerint facultates, et si nemo eas sibi jure nititur retentare. Ac si locum fisco factum esse claruerit occupatis prius bonis et rerum omnium descriptione perfecta . . .' Cod. Theod. x. 10. l. 11. 'Ex privatorum . . . sollicitudine contractuum . . . illis . . . personis a quibus publici muneris injuncta curantur, nullum fomitem calumnie patitur litis accendi. Cur enim continentiam venditionis alienae inquisitio palatina rimetur?' Ibid. l. 29.

² The following instances show that this usage was applied primarily to cases in which the royal interests were concerned, and that the witnesses supplied the evidence of the neighbourhood: 'Item volumus ut omnis inquisitio quae de rebus ad jus fisci nostri pertinentibus facienda est, non per testes qui producti fuerint sed per illos qui in eo comitatu meliores et veraciores esse cognoscuntur, per illorum testimonium inquisitio fiat, et juxta quod illi inde testificati fuerint vel contineantur vel reddantur.' Capit. 829. § 2. 'Ut pagenses per sacramentum aliorum hominum causas non inquirentur nisi tantum dominicas.' Capit. 819. § 1; Brunner, p. 88; Baluze, i. p. 409. 'Ut in omni comitatu hi qui meliores et veraciores inveniri possunt eligantur a missis nostris ad inquisitiones faciendas et rei veritatem dicendam et ut adjuutores comitum sint ad justitias faciendas.' Baluze, i. 449. The best instances for comparison are the Assizes of Clarendon and Northampton, the Inquest of Sheriffs, and the Capitula of 1194; they may be compared with the capitula data missis in 802, e.g. 'de fidelitate jusjurandum ut omnes repromittant;' Baluze, i. 267. 'Inquiratur qui sunt qui debent domino regi homagium et non fecerunt;' Inquest of Sheriffs, art. xi. 'Item justitiae capiant domini regis fidelitates;' Ass. Northampton. art. 5. Or again on the subject of criminals, fugitives, strangers, forgers, the effects of war, abundant coincidences of the most striking character will be found in the capitularies of 802, 806, 819, 829, 854, 860, 865. The following extract from a capitulary of 868 is in close parallel with the instructions for the Domesday Inquest: 'Inquirant quoque quot (canonici, etc.) tempore avi nostri Karoli et domini genitoris nostri Hludovici unoquoque in loco fuerint et quot modo sint; et ubi loca a Nortmannis sive a quibuslibet aliis destructa et penitus adnullata, quot ibi nunc propter paucitatem rerum et devastationem eorundem constitui vel ordinari possint;' Baluze, ii. 139.

The Inquest perpetuated in Normandy from the Karolingian times.

by the existence of the kindred principle, undeveloped indeed and early forgotten, in the jurisprudence of the rest of France¹. The order to hold such inquest was a royal, or in Normandy a ducal privilege, although it was executed by the ordinary local officers; primarily it was employed to ascertain the rights and interests of the Crown; by special favour permission was obtained to use it in the concerns of the churches and of private individuals². Even under this system the sworn recognitors were rather witnesses than judges; they swore to facts within their own knowledge; the magistrate to whom the inquiry was entrusted was the inquirer, and he inquired through the oath of men sworn to speak the truth and selected in consequence of their character and local knowledge.

This was the source of trial by jury.

Such was the instrument which, introduced in its rough simplicity at the Conquest, was developed by the lawyers of the Plantagenet period into the modern trial by jury. Henry II expanded and consolidated the system so much that he was not unnaturally regarded as the founder of it in its English character. From being an exceptional favour, it became under his hand a part of the settled law of the land, a resource which was open to

¹ The continuance of the system in France from the Karolingian times and through the Norman period is proved by Dr. Brunner in his work so frequently referred to above. The most curious phenomenon in connexion with it is the fact that it was only on English soil that it gained much development, the Norman lawyers seeing themselves rapidly outstripped by those of England, and the institution withering away in the rest of France until it became extinct.

² The coincidences between the practice described by Glanvill and the usages of the Great Coutumier of Normandy have of course led to two opposite theories; one that the Norman usage was a faulty imitation of the English; the other that the system was transplanted full-grown from Normandy to England. Neither is true; the system of recognition existed in Normandy before it was brought to England, but it was developed in England, and that development probably had a reflex influence on Normandy. It would be wrong to suppose that the Great Coutumier affords an exact picture of the Normandy even of Henry II's reign, much more that the English system developed from a germ which is represented by the Great Coutumier. There are however in the minute legal peculiarities of the Norman recognitions as described in that work, signs of a primitive character, a simplicity and general applicability which seem to show that it had been naturalised there in a much earlier form than it was in England, and this confirms the historical and documentary evidence. The whole subject is interesting, but it involves a great quantity of minute legal details which have very slight connexion with our present inquiries.

every suitor. The recognitions are mentioned by Ralph Niger¹ as one of his expedients of tyranny; by Ranulf Glanvill as a boon conferred by royal benevolence on the people, and with the counsel and consent of the nobles. John, in a charter granted to the church of Beverley, forbids that the rights of that church should be damaged by assizes or recognitions, and adds that the pleas shall be held in the court of the provost as they were in the reign of Henry I, before recognitions or assizes had been ordained in the kingdom². So early had Henry II acquired the fame of having instituted the system, which he had indeed remodelled and made a part of the common right of his subjects, but which had certainly existed under his four predecessors.

Recognition by jury said to be an invention
of Henry II.

The application of the principle to legal matters—for we have already noticed its fiscal use—may be placed under two heads: the inquest in civil matters exemplified in the Great Assize and in the Assizes of Novel disseisin, Mort d'ancester, Darrein presentment, and others; and the inquest of presentment in criminal matters, which appears in the Assizes of Clarendon and Northampton. The Great Assize was, according to Glanvill, a royal boon by which wholesome provision was made for the lives of men and the integrity of the State, so that in maintaining their right to the possession of their freeholds the suitors may not be exposed to the doubtful issue of trial by battle. This institution proceeds from the highest equity, for the right which after much and long delay can scarcely be said to be proved by battle, is by the beneficial use of this constitution more rapidly and more conveniently demonstrated³. It is in fact the most distinct mark of the original equity with which the royal jurisdiction, as civilisation and legal knowledge advanced, was applied to remedy the evils inherent in the rough and indiscriminating formality of the popular tribunals: such the inquest had been under the Karolings, such was the recognition or assize under

His use of it in the assizes.

The Great
Assize.

An equitable institution.

¹ Above, p. 492, note 1.

² 'Ubi placita inde fuerunt et esse consueverunt tempore regis Henrici patris nostri vel tempore Henrici regis avi patris nostri, antequam recogniciones vel assisae in regno nostro essent constitutae . . . d . . 8^o Oct. anno regni nostri quarto.' Houard, Anciennes Loix, ii. 288.

³ Glanvill, de Legibus, ii. 7; above, p. 575.

Trial by battle disliked.

Process of the Great
Assize.

Oath of the
recognitors.

the Plantagenets. The trial by battle was in England an innovation; it was one from which the English recoiled as an instrument associated with tyranny, if not devised for the purposes of tyrants; and the charters of the boroughs frequently contain a provision, dearly bought no doubt but greatly valued, that the burghers shall not be liable to its use¹. In the place of this barbarous foreign custom, the following machinery is applied; the possessor of the freehold in dispute applies to the Curia Regis to stop all proceedings in the local courts until a recognition has taken place as to the right of the claimant²: and thereupon a writ is issued to the sheriff to that effect. The party in possession is thus said to have placed himself on the assize; and the next step is taken by the claimant, who demands a writ by which four lawful knights of the county or neighbourhood shall be empowered to choose twelve lawful knights of the same neighbourhood, who shall declare on oath which of the two litigants has the greater right to the land in question³. The writ accordingly is issued, addressed to the sheriff, directing him to summon four knights to appear at Westminster to choose the twelve. They appear in due course, and under oath nominate the twelve recognitors, who are then summoned to appear before the king or his justices prepared to make their declaration⁴. On the day fixed they present themselves, and the suit proceeds; if the twelve are acquainted with the circumstances in dispute and are unanimous, the transaction is complete; they are sworn 'that they will not speak falsehood nor conceal truth' according to knowledge gained by eye-witness or 'by the words of their fathers and by such words as they are bound to have such confidence in as if they were their own'⁵. The declaration made, the sentence is issued. If however the twelve knights or any of them are ignorant, or if they disagree, others are to be called in who have the requisite information; and when the complete number of twelve unanimous witnesses will depose to the fact,

¹ See the Charter of London, Select Charters, p. 103; Winchester, ib. p. 257; Lincoln, ib. p. 258; above, p. 425, note 1.

² Glanvill, ii. 7.

⁴ Ibid. c. 12.

³ Ibid. c. 10.

⁵ Ibid. c. 17.

their verdict is of the same account. The proceedings in the other assizes are of the same kind, save that the twelve recognitors are nominated by the sheriff himself without the intervention of the four knights electors¹.

The date of the original enactment of the Great Assize is unknown; but the use of recognition by twelve sworn witnesses is prescribed in the Constitutions of Clarendon for cases of dispute as to lay or clerical tenure². It there appears as a part of the work of the 'capitalis justitia.' From Glanvill it is clear that such litigation might be transacted before the itinerant justices; and the Assize of Northampton of 1176 places among the agenda of the eyre recognitions of the seisin of heirs, and of 'disseisin upon the assize,' under which descriptions we may detect the cases of Mort d'ancester and Novel disseisin³. In 1194 the grand jury of the hundred are empowered to act on all the business of the session, in which are included all recognitions and assizes ordered by the king's writ, and even recognitions under the Great Assize where the property in dispute is worth five pounds a year or less⁴. In 1198 the sum is raised to ten pounds, and the elections under the Great Assize are to be made before the itinerant justices. The great charter of John likewise retains the three recognitions of Novel disseisin, Mort d'ancester, and Darrein presentment, to be heard in the quarterly county courts by the justices and four chosen knights⁵: and the charter of 1217 orders the same rule to be observed once a year⁶, except in cases of Darrein presentment, which are reserved for the justices of the bench. The recognitions have become a permanent and regular part of the county business.

The development of the jury of presentment is, after its reconstitution or creation by Henry II, marked by corresponding stages of progress. But its origin is less clear. By some jurists it is brought into close connexion with the system

¹ Glanvill, lib. xiii. cc. 1, 2 sq.

² 'Recognitione duodecim legalium hominum.' Art. 9; Select Charters, p. 133.

³ Art. 5; Select Charters, p. 145.

⁴ Articles 2 and 18; Select Charters, pp. 252, 253.

⁵ Art. 18.

⁶ Articles 13 and 15; Select Charters, p. 336.

Theory of the origin of jury in criminal causes.

of compurgation, the jurors who present the list of criminals representing the compurgators of the accuser¹, and the jury which at a later period was impanelled to traverse the presentment, representing the compurgators of the accused. Others again connect it with the supposed institution of the collective frankpledge, the corporate responsibility of the tithing, the hundred, and the shire for the production of offenders, which has played so large a part in constitutional theories, but which rests on very slight foundation of fact². The frithborh was neither a body of compurgators nor a jury of presentment. As a matter of history it seems lawful to regard the presentment as a part of the duty of the local courts for which an immemorial antiquity may be claimed with at least a strong probability. The leet juries of the small local courts do not draw their origin from any legal enactment, and bear every mark of the utmost antiquity. By them ameracements are still made and presentments offered under oath, although their action is restricted and superseded by newer expedients. But their procedure affords some warrant for believing that the twelve senior thegns who swore in the county court to accuse none falsely were a jury of presentment. If such a theory be accepted, the mention of the juratores of the shire and hundred which occurs in the Pipe Roll of Henry I is accounted for, and with it the mention of a criminal jury in the Constitutions of Clarendon³. The obscurity of this side of the subject may be regarded as parallel with the scantiness of evidence which we have already noticed as to the recognition. From the year 1166 however the history of the criminal jury is clear. By the Assize of Clarendon inquest is to be made through each county and through each hundred, by twelve lawful men of the hundred and by four lawful men of each township, 'by their oath that they will speak the truth.'

Assize of Clarendon.

¹ This is the theory of Rogge, as stated by Brunner, pp. 25, 26. Hickes long ago stated the fact that there is no real connexion between jury and compurgation. The common use of the number twelve is misleading.

² The theory of G. L. von Maurer; Brunner, p. 26.

³ Const. Clar. art. 6: 'Et si tales fuerint qui culpantur quod non velit vel non audeat aliquis eos accusare, vicecomes requisitus ab episcopo faciet jurare duodecim legales homines de vicineto, seu de villa, coram episcopo, quod inde veritatem secundum conscientiam suam manifestabunt.'

By these all persons of evil fame are to be presented to the justices, and then to proceed to the ordeal: if they fail in the ordeal they undergo the legal punishment; if they sustain the ordeal, yet, as the presentment against them is based on the evidence of the neighbourhood on the score of bad character, they are to abjure the kingdom¹. The jury of presentment is reduced to a still more definite form, and receives a more distinct representative character in the Assize of Northampton², and in the Articles of Visitation of 1194: in the latter capitulary the plan used for nominating the recognitors of the Great Assize is applied to the Grand Jury, for so the body now constituted may be termed:—‘In the first place, four knights are to be chosen from the whole county, who by their oath shall choose two lawful knights of each hundred or wapentake, and those two shall choose upon oath ten knights of each hundred or wapentake, or if knights be wanting, legal and free men, so that these twelve may answer under all heads concerning their whole hundred or wapentake³.’ The heads on which they answer include not only the assizes which have been already referred to in connexion with the jury, but all the pleas of the Crown, the trial of malefactors and their receivers as well as a vast amount of fiscal business. The later development of these juries does not fall under our present inquiry, but it may be generally stated thus: at an early period, even before the abolition of ordeal by the Lateran Council of 1215, a petty jury was allowed to disprove the truth of the presentment, and after the abolition of ordeal that expedient came into general use⁴. The further change in the character of the jurors, by which they became judges of fact instead of witnesses, is common to the civil and criminal jury alike. As it became difficult to find juries personally well informed as to the point at issue, the jurors summoned were allowed first to add to their number persons who possessed the requisite knowledge, under Procedure on presentment.

Assize of Northampton, and eyre of 1194.

Later development of the jury.

¹ Assize of Clarendon, art. 1; Select Charters, p. 137.

² Assize of Northampton, art. 1; Select Charters, p. 143.

³ Hoveden, ii. 262; Select Charters, p. 251.

⁴ On the subsequent history of criminal jury, see Forsyth, Trial by Jury, pp. 199 sq., where the legal growth of the institution is traced with admirable clearness.

Later
character
of jury.

the title of afforcement. After this proceeding had been some time in use, the afforceng jurors were separated from the uninformed jurors and relieved them altogether from their character of witnesses. The verdict of the jury no longer represented their previous knowledge of the case, but the result of the evidence afforded by the witnesses of the fact; and they became accordingly judges of the fact, the law being declared by the presiding officer acting in the king's name.

*Judicium
parium.*

In all these points we see distinctly the growth of a principle of representation, especially applied to the work of the county courts or growing up in them. The 'judicium parium' however, which is mentioned in Magna Carta, has a wider application than this. It covers all cases of amercement in the county, the hundred, and the manorial courts, and exhibits a principle which, rooted in primitive antiquity, is capable of infinite development and beneficial application; and this we have seen exemplified in the assessment processes described above.

Connexion of jury with the representative system.

It remains then briefly to point out the direct connexion between the jury system and county representation. In the earliest existing records of recognitions, the way in which the jurors are to be selected is not clearly laid down¹. The recognitions of the Norman reigns are regarded as acts of the county court, and the possibility of election by the suitors is not excluded: it is however more probable that the recognitors were selected by the sheriff, possibly by rotation from a general list, possibly according to their nearness to the spot or acquaintance with the business in hand. On the institution of the assizes of Novel disseisin, Mort d'ancester, and Darrein presentment, the sheriff summoned the requisite number of jurors at his discretion, and the plea was held at a place named in the writ of summons, in such a way as to imply that it was to be heard not in the regular county court, but in a special session².

¹ In the early instances given by Palgrave, pp. clxxviii sq., we have (1) 'quibus (sc. scyris) congregatis, eligantur plures de illis Anglis qui sciunt quomodo terrae jacebant,' &c.; (2) 'Præcipio quod præcipias Hamonen filium Vitalis et probis vicinis de Santwic, quos Hamo nominabit, ut dicant veritatem.' See above, p. 395.

² Glanvill, xiii. 3: 'Ab initio eligendi sunt duodecim liberi et legales

The Great Assize was differently constituted: there the sheriff nominated four electors to choose the twelve recognitors, and the trial took place before the justices itinerant in the county, or before the court at Westminster¹. The articles of 1194 place the election of the recognitors, with all the other business of the eyre, in the hands of the grand jury²; those of 1198 direct that it shall take place before the justices in the full county court³; Magna Carta completes the process, enacting that the assizes shall be taken quarterly in the county court before two justices sent by the king, and four knights of the county, chosen by the county⁴. The constitution of the grand jury of inquest is similarly developed. The twelve legal knights of the shire, the twelve lawful men of the hundred, and the four men of the township mentioned in the Assize of Clarendon, may have appeared in rotation, or may have been selected by the sheriff or the hundredman or the reeve: but in 1194 they are nominated, through a process of cooptation, by four elected knights⁵. These elected knights may still have been nominated by the sheriff, but it is more probable that they were chosen by the suitors, first because the appointment of coroners, which is directed in the same document, was made by election of the freeholders, and intended as a check on the power of the sheriff⁶; and, secondly, because the term 'eligendi' may be reasonably interpreted by the clause of Magna Carta just referred to⁷. The mode of nominating the grand jury was modified in later practice, and

The Recognitions held in the county court.

Method of electing the Grand Jury.

Probably a free election by the suitors.

homines de vicineto secundum formam in brevi expressam.' The writ merely orders the sheriff to summon and 'inbreviate' twelve recognitors. Even here however there was room for a real election.

¹ Glanvill, ii. 10-12.

² Art. 2: 'Item de omnibus recognitionibus,' &c. Above, p. 617.

³ 'Et capientur coram eis electiones magnae assisae per mandatum domini regis vel ejus capitalis justitiae.' Hoveden, iv. 61.

⁴ Art. 18.

⁵ 'In primis eligendi sunt quatuor milites de toto comitatu, qui per sacramentum suum eligant duos legales milites de quolibet hundredo vel wapentacco, et illi duo eligant super sacramentum suum x. milites de singulis hundredis vel wapentaccis; vel si milites defuerint, legales et liberos homines, ita quod illi xii. in simul respondeant de omnibus capitulis de toto hundredo vel wapentacco.' Hoveden, iii. 262.

⁶ Ibid. p. 263. Art. 20.

⁷ 'Cum quatuor militibus cujuslibet comitatus electis per comitatum.' Art. 18.

Elective
principle.

Illustration from fiscal usages.

Magna Carta executed on inquest by twelve chosen knights of each shire.

Council at Oxford in 1213.

the element of popular election was altogether eliminated; in the period before us, however, it furnishes an important illustration of the usage of election which was so soon to be applied to parliamentary representation. In both the systems of judicial jury we have thus the same result, a body of four knights representing the county court for this special purpose, in one case certainly, and in the other probably, chosen by the county court itself. In the fiscal business we have another analogy; the carucage of 1198 is assessed before a knight and a clerk of the Exchequer acting on behalf of the Crown, and the sheriff and lawful knights 'electi ad hoc' acting on behalf of the shire: it was collected by two knights of the hundred, who paid it to the sheriff, and he accounted for it at the Exchequer¹. We are thus prepared for the great executory measure of 1215, under which the articles of the charter were to be carried out by an inquest of twelve sworn knights in each county, chosen in the county court and of the county itself²: and we understand the summons to the council at Oxford of 1213, in which the sheriff of each county is ordered to send four discreet men of his county to speak with the king on the business of the realm³. In the four discreet men of the shire we detect the old representative idea of the four good men of the township, who appeared in the shire-moot: now they are summoned to a national assembly which is itself a concentration of the county courts. It is not however yet certain whether the four discreet men, the predecessors of the two discreet knights of later times, were on this occasion elected by the shire. On the analogy of the other elections it might be presumed that they were; but the fact that only a week's notice was given to the sheriffs seems to preclude the possibility of a general election. Nor is it necessary to antedate the growth of an institution, when the later steps

¹ Hoveden, iv. 46 sq.; Select Charters, p. 249; above, p. 510.

² Art. 48: 'Statim inquirantur per duodecim milites juratos de eodem comitatu, qui debent eligi per probos homines ejusdem comitatus.' See also Patent Rolls, i. 180; Select Charters, p. 298.

³ Report on the Dignity of a Peer, App. i. p. 2: 'Et quatuor discretos homines de comitatu tuo illuc venire facias ad nos ad eundem terminum ad loquendum nobiscum de negotiis regni nostri.'

of its development are distinctly traceable. Whether or no the fourteenth article of the Great Charter intended to provide for a representation of the minor tenants-in-chief by a body of knights elected in the county court, we see now the three principles involved in such representation already in full working, although not as yet distinctly combined for this purpose. We have a system of representation, we have the practice of election, and we have a concentration of the shires in the great council. The struggle of eighty years which followed the act of Runnymede not only had to vindicate the substantial liberties involved in that act, but to sharpen and perfect and bring into effective and combined working every weapon which, forged at different times and for different purposes, could be made useful for the maintenance of self-government. The humble processes by which men had made their by-laws in the manorial courts and amerced the offenders; by which they had assessed the estates or presented the report of their neighbours; by which they had learned to work with the judges of the king's court for the determination of questions of custom, right, justice, and equity, were the training for the higher functions, in which they were to work out the right of taxation, legislation, and political determination on national action.

The elements of a representative system at work before the Great Charter.

The process of training.

165. The history of the towns presents some points of marked contrast with that of the shires; and these shed light on the later separation of interest between the two classes of communities. The whole period was one of great development in this respect; Henry II and the ministers of his sons encouraged the growth of the mercantile spirit, and reaped the benefit of it in a very great increase of revenue. The privileges of self-government and self-assessment, exemption from the interference of the sheriffs and their arbitrary exactions, the confirmation of guilds, the securing of corporate property, the free election of magistrates, and the maintenance of ancient customs, in many cases to the exclusion of the general reforms, are all of them matters of grant liberally bestowed or sold without reservation. The charters of Richard and John are very numerous; those of Henry II are fewer in number, and do not furnish us with a Growth of towns.

Their privileges bought by fines.

Charters of towns.

Privileges of towns obtained by fine and charter.

Charters of John.

due to any progressive policy on the king's part, such as might have been inferred from his general practice in other matters. In those few to which an approximate date can be assigned, the privileges granted are not much greater than was the case in the reign of Henry I: but the Pipe Rolls contain great numbers of instances in which the purchase of additional favours is recorded. In some of these, perhaps, the favour is obtained merely for the single occasion, and in such cases no charter need have been drawn up. In others, where a permanent privilege was bought, the charter in which it was contained must have been lost or destroyed, when its importance had been diminished by a new grant of still greater favours. The charters of Richard belong chiefly to his early years, especially to the first year, when he was anxiously raising money for the Crusade. Those of John, however, extend throughout the reign, and being enrolled among the royal records¹, have survived in great measure the dangers in which the earlier grants perished. They exhibit the town constitution in almost every stage of development, and in every part of the kingdom. Helston and Hartlepool are alike striving for municipal organisation²: one town is rich enough to purchase a constitution like that of Oxford or Winchester, another is too poor or too humble to ask for more than the merchant guild, or the firma burgi, or the condition of a free borough³. Amongst the more privileged communities great varieties of custom prevail, and provincial laws of considerable antiquity probably underlie the customs of the larger towns. London, Winchester, Oxford, Norwich, and others, appear as typical constitutions on the model of which privileges are granted to the more humble aspirants⁴; and to their

¹ Rotuli Chartarum, edited by Sir T. Duffus Hardy in 1837.

² Rot. Chart. pp. 86, 93; Select Charters, pp. 305, 306.

³ The Hartlepool charter confirms to the homines of Hartlepool that they be free burghers; that of Helston begins with a grant that it be a free borough, and have a merchant guild: a second charter to Helston contains the settlement of the ferm. The charter of Kingston lets the ferm to the homines; Rot. Chart. p. 52.

⁴ Hartlepool is to have the same rights as Newcastle; Beverley as York; Norwich, Lincoln, and Northampton as London; Winchester is the model town for Wallingford, Andover, Salisbury, Ilchester; Oxford for practice the newly-enfranchised boroughs are referred, in case of a dispute as to the interpretation of the charter. Thus, beside the common instinct which would lead the mercantile communities to act together in cases in which there was no ground for rivalry, and beside the common privilege which exempted them from the jurisdictions to which their country neighbours were amenable, they possessed in common a quantity of peculiar customs, which kept the burgenses of the kingdom as a class by themselves, although they never, as was the case in Scotland and in Germany, adopted a confederate bond of union or organised themselves in leagnes.

The boroughs under Henry I had probably, when they obtained any privilege at all, obtained the confirmation of the merchant guild, and by the agreement for the firma burgi had limited the exactions of the sheriff, so far as regarded the ferm, although the taxes properly so called, especially the tallage, were still collected by him. They had also in some cases obtained a right to have all causes in which they were engaged tried within their own boundaries. If then the sheriff still retained judicial authority over them he must come and hold his court among them. But such a practice, whilst in one respect it saved them from the risks of the county court, in another exposed them to the exactions of the sheriff, who might come and hold 'scotale' at his convenience, and so wring money from his entertainers. It was therefore a great point to exclude the sheriff altogether; and in order to do this, an independent magistracy must be founded, the right of election obtained, and a power to treat directly with the royal officers on the questions of taxation. These then are the points most commonly secured by fine or charter.

Growth of a burgher spirit.

The boroughs obtain the right of paying their own ferm and excluding the intermeddling of the sheriff.

The right of excluding the sheriff and having their own pleas decided on their own ground¹ involved their exemption from Yarmouth and Lynn; Winchester or Oxford for Portsmouth and Marlborough; Winchester or London for Wilton; Launceston for Helston; York for Scarborough; Bristol for Dublin; Northampton for Grimsby; Hastings for Romney.

¹ E.g. in the thirty-first year of Henry II the men of Cambridge pay 300 marks of silver and a mark of gold to have their town at ferm and

They are exempted from the shire-moot and hundred.

the ordinary sessions of the county court; and, as their customs were confirmed by the same act that served to exempt them, they lost the benefit, or escaped the burden, of innovation. The exemption of the citizens of London, Winchester, and other towns from the duellum¹, after it had been introduced into the shire-moot, no doubt arose in some degree from this: when the Assize of Clarendon, by introducing the inquest by presentment into the county court, abolished there the practice of compurgation, sending the accused persons directly to the ordeal, the burghers lost the benefit of the change, and long retained compurgation as the customary mode of defence guaranteed to them by their charters². From the visitations of the itinerant justices however they were not exempted; but in their courts they obtained special privileges. The burghers of Dunwich and other towns were represented by twelve lawful men just as if they were independent hundreds; and they were amerced by a mixed jury, six men of their own body and six strangers³.

They are represented in the courts held by the itinerant justices.

They obtain a right of electing their magistrates.

These privileges involved almost of necessity a remodelling of the local magistracy: the right of electing their own reeve or praepositus was not the least important of the royal gifts. This does not appear in the charters of Henry II; it is found occasionally in those of Richard⁴, and very commonly in those of John. It does not however seem certain that this difference implies an advance towards freedom in the matter; and it is not improbable that whilst the boroughs continued under the management of the sheriff, an office of so little practical import-

'ne vicecomes se inde intromittat;'¹ here inde may refer only to the ferm. John's charter (Rot. Chart. p. 83) grants to them 'quod nullus eorum placitet extra muros burgi de Canteburge de ullo placito praeter placita de tenuris exterioribus, exceptis monetariis et ministris nostris.' The charter to Dunwich grants that the burghers 'nullam sectam faciant comitatus vel hundredorum nisi coram justitiis nostris.' Ib. p. 51.

¹ 'Quod nullus eorum faciat duellum, et quod de placitis ad coronam pertinentibus se possint disrationare secundum consuetudinem civium civitatis Londoniarum.' Charter of Northampton, Rot. Chart. p. 45.

² See Palgrave, English Commonwealth, pp. 217, 259.

³ 'Et cum summoniti fuerint esse coram justitiis, mittant pro se xii legales homines de burgo suo qui sint pro eis omnibus; et si forte ameriari debuerint, per sex probos homines de burgo suo et per sex probos homines extra burgum amercentur.' Rot. Chart. p. 51. See above, p. 607.

⁴ 'Et cives Lincolniae faciant praepositum quem voluerint de se per annum, qui sit idoneus nobis et eis.' Foedera, i. 52.

ance as that of the reeve may have been filled up by election. When however the reeve and the probi homines became the governing body, it may well be supposed that the appointment would be a matter of serious question. The citizens of Lincoln are empowered by Richard to make their own reeve, who is however to be a person qualified to serve both them and the king; by John they are directed to choose two, who will be received as their representatives at the Exchequer. The burghers of Nottingham, according to John's charter, may appoint their reeve annually, but the king reserves the power of removing an unfit person: those of Shrewsbury choose two, of whom the sheriff presents one at the Exchequer: those of Northampton, by the common counsel of the town, are to choose two fit persons and present them to the sheriff, who will present one of them at the Exchequer to pay their own ferm¹. Both Lincoln and Northampton are to choose four coroners, to keep the pleas of the Crown and be a check on the reeves. Under these magistrates the old local courts retained their organisation, or modified it only by the mixture of the guild customs, which were also of great antiquity². The new borough courts were the old courts³ of the township, the hundred, and the shire under new names⁴.

Election of the procurator or reeve.

Election of borough coroners.

The financial arrangements of the towns have been already mentioned under the head of taxation. From the Pipe Rolls and the Dialogus de Scaccario we learn that they made their separate terms with the justices of the Exchequer. Besides the common payment however, the richer burghers were often Negotiations of the boroughs with the Exchequer.

¹ The Charters will be found in the Rot. Chartarum; that of Shrewsbury, p. 46; Northampton, p. 45; Nottingham, p. 39; Lincoln, p. 56; Gloucester, p. 57; Ipswich, p. 65.

² See above, pp. 412 sq. The passages in charters which refer to the men of the merchant guild as distinct from the body of burghers, as at Winchester and Gloucester, probably indicate that in those towns the private jurisdictions of the bishop or other lord remained apart from the general borough organisation, or were not consolidated with the guild.

³ John grants to the burghers of Leicester that all sales of land of the town that take place in the portmannote shall be valid; Rot. Chart. p. 32. The courts-leet of the Lancashire boroughs are often called lagh-moots: and there are many other forms. See above, p. 425.

⁴ I have not thought it necessary to recapitulate what was said above, pp. 416, 417, about the clause of enfranchisement: which became probably a part of the common law before the reign of John.

Taxation
of the boroughs.

prevailed on, by force or persuasion, to promise additional sums to relieve the king's necessities¹: as demesne of the Crown, for such most of them continued to be even by the terms of their enfranchisement, they were subject to tallage which, although it might be occasionally mentioned in the national council, was levied by the feudal right of the king as lord. Next to this the 'scotale' seems to have been the most burdensome local custom. The nature of this exaction is very obscure. It was however levied by the sheriff for his own emolument, probably as a reward for his services in maintaining the peace; and was raised by a process similar to that by which the guilds raised their common funds. Whether the sheriff could compel the burghers to make offerings of malt from which a 'scotale' was brewed, the proceeds of which went into his purse; or the name simply means a gathering of the burghers at which they were compelled to promise contributions to the same end, or at which heavy fines for non-attendance were inflicted, it is difficult to say². Whatever it was, however, it was a burden from which the towns were anxious to be relieved, and the relief was either a step towards, or a result of, the exemption from the authority of the sheriffs³. Free election of magistrates, independent ex-

The scotale.

¹ Like the benevolences or the compulsory loans of later times: e.g. in the 19th of Henry II. after the citizens of London had paid £666 13s. 4d. de novo dono, Reiner son of Berengar pays 100 marks de promissione sua. These promises are however more frequent in the cases of ecclesiastical persons, in which it might be more important to recognise the voluntary character of the payment. See Madox, Hist. Exch. pp. 404, 405.

² 'Scotales were abuses put upon the king's people by his officers, who invited them to drink ale, and then made a collection to the intent that they should not vex or inform against them for the crimes they had committed or should commit.' Brady, Boroughs, App. p. 13. The derivation of the word is questionable: Spelman thought that it might be derived from Scot and tallia, in the sense of a payment: it is possible that the latter syllable may be connected with hall (as in Gildhalla); but the connexion with the drinking customs is quite clear, so that the probability is in favour of the more obvious derivation from scot (payment) and ale. The Constitutions of 1236 forbid scotallae along with aliae potationes. Wilkins, i. 636. The later church-ale was a custom of collecting contributions of malt from the parishioners, with which a quantity of ale was brewed, and sold for the payment of church expenses. The custom of fining absentees and drinking the fines may also be connected with it.

³ E. g. see Richard's charter to Winchester, Select Charters, p. 258. Other officers however could make scotale besides the sheriff, and the prohibition is generally extended to the reeve and other royal officers. Sad exercise of jurisdiction in their own courts and by their own customs, and the direct negotiation of their taxation with the officers of the Exchequer, were no unimportant steps in the attainment of municipal independence. Nor was any such step retraced; every new charter confirmed, and many of them rehearsed in detail, the customs allowed by the earlier grants which they superseded.

Summary of town
privileges.

The city of London still furnishes the type of the most advanced privilege, and the greatest amount of illustrative detail. Yet even the history of London is obscure. We can trace changes in the constitution of the sheriffdom, we have the date of the foundation of the communa and the mayoralty; we come upon occasional marks of royal jealousy, and exaggerations of civic independence; we can see two parties at work, the one moved by the court, the other by the municipal instinct; we can discern the points at issue between the rich and the poor. Still these features scarcely blend into a distinct picture, or furnish a consecutive story.

Changes in the constitution of London.

London was represented at the Exchequer, during the first fifteen years of Henry II, by two sheriffs, instead of the four who appeared in 1130, and who reappear in the sixteenth year. In 1174 the smaller number recurs: from 1182 to 1189 only one sheriff acts¹. At the coronation of Richard I the two sheriffs are Richard Fitz-Reiner and Henry of Cornhell, the latter of whom was Master of the Mint and sheriff of Kent²; the former was the head of a great civic family; his father Reiner had been sheriff from 1155 to 1170, and Berengar his grandfather may not improbably have served before him. In the struggle between John and Longchamp in 1191 these two

The sheriff's of London.

to say, even the archbishop of Canterbury occasionally did it, as is shown by the following passage from Somner on Gavelkind, which further illustrates the nature of the burden: 'Item si dominus archiepiscopus fecerit scotallam infra boscum, quilibet terram tenens dabit ibi pro se et uxore sua 52 ob. et vidua vel kotarius 1 ob.;' 'memorandum quod predicti tenentes debent de consuetudine inter eos facere scotalium de 16 den. et ob. ita quod de singulis 6 denariis detur unus denarius et obolus ad potandum bedello domini archiepiscopi supra dictum feodum.'

¹ See the thirty-first Report of the Deputy Keeper of the Records, pp. 307, 308; Madox, Firma Burgi, pp. 164, 165.

² Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 631; Hoveden, iii. pref. pp. lxxvii, lxxviii.

Two parties
among the citizens.

magnates are found on different sides: Richard Fitz-Reiner is the host and supporter of John, Henry, as his duty to the court compelled him, takes the part of the chancellor. When accordingly in the midst of the struggle John took the oath to the communa of London and was followed by the whole body of barons who adhered to him, it is probable that he acted at the suggestion of Richard Fitz-Reiner, and gave completeness to a municipal constitution which had long been struggling for recognition¹. Immediately after this confirmation of the communa we find Henry the son of Alwyn mayor of London²: the sheriffs cease to be the ruling officers, and become merely the financial representatives of the citizens, who are themselves properly the 'farmers' or sheriffs of London and Middlesex³. It is a saying among the citizens, that 'come what may, the Londoners should have no king but their mayor.' Henry Fitz-Alwyn is mayor for life: two years after his death, when John, a month before the Great Charter was extorted from him, was buying help on every side, he granted to the 'barones' of the city of London the right of annually electing the mayor⁴. The privilege was ineffectual so far as it was intended to win the support of the Londoners, for a fortnight after it was granted they received the barons with open arms⁵. The duty of sustaining their privileges fell accordingly on the barons: their customs were guaranteed by the thirteenth article of the Charter, and a clause was added preserving like rights to all the cities, boroughs, towns, and seaports of the realm. Lastly, as one of the twenty-five barons chosen to execute the Charter, appears the Mayor of London.

Establishment of the communa under a mayor.

The mayor annually elected.

Supremacy of the mercantile element.

The establishment of the corporate character of the city under a mayor marks the victory of the communal principle over the more ancient shire organisation which seems to have displaced early in the century the complicated system of guild and franchise. It also marks the triumph of the mercantile over

¹ Gir. Camb. Ang. Sac. ii. 397. Cf. R. Devizes, p. 38; R. Diceto, p. 664.

² Liber de Antiquis Legibus, p. 1. He was one of the treasurers of the sum raised for the king's ransom; Hoveden, iii. 212.

³ Madox, Firma Burgi, p. 165.

⁴ Rot. Chart. p. 207; Select Charters, p. 306. It is dated May 9, 1215.

⁵ On the 24th of May. M. Paris.

the aristocratic element. Henry Fitz-Alwyn may have been an hereditary baron of London, but his successors, Serlo le Mercer, Ralph Eswy the goldsmith, and others, were clearly tradesmen¹. It would, doubtless, be unsafe to argue that mercantile pursuits were at this time regarded with anything like contempt in England. The feeling is one of the results of the growth of fictitious and superficial chivalry in the fourteenth century. The men of London had made their pilgrimages to Palestine, and fought their sea fights on the way, in company or in emulation with the noblest of the Norman lords. The story of Gilbert Becket may be fabulous, but Andrew of London and his fellow-citizens in 1147 had done good work for Christendom at the capture of Lisbon, the only real success of the second Crusade²; and in 1190 William Fitz-Osbert and Geoffrey the goldsmith of London were among the chief men of the fleet which saved the infant kingdom of Portugal from Moorish conquest³. The struggle, so far as we can trace it, was not between nobility and trade, but between the territorial franchise and the mercantile guild. Nor was the victory of the communa to any appreciable degree a victory of the Englishman over the foreigner. The population of London was less English probably than that of the other great towns such as Winchester and York. The names of the leading citizens who are mentioned throughout the twelfth century are with few exceptions, such as Henry Fitz-Alwyn, of alien derivation. Richard the son of Reiner the son of Berengar was very probably a Lombard by descent: the influential family of Bucquinte, Bucca-uncta, which took the lead on many occasions, can hardly have been other than Italian⁴; Gilbert Becket was a Norman. The form of the communa in which the corporate life asserted its independence was itself

Mercantile interests in the city.

Expeditions
of the citizens.

Foreign element
in
the city.

¹ Liber de Antiquis Legibus, pp. 2, 3, sq.

² Expugnatio Lyxbonensis, p. cxliv. Henry of Huntingdon specially remarks that this great victory was won not by the nobles, but by men of middle rank.

³ Hoveden, iii. 42: Bened. ii. 116.

⁴ Andrew of London, the leader of the Londoners at Lisbon in 1147, is not improbably the Andrew Bucquinte whose son Richard was the leader of the riotous young nobles of the city who in 1177 furnished a precedent for the Mohawks of the eighteenth century. Benedict, i. 155. Cf. Pipe Roll 31 Henry I, pp. 145, 147.

foreign. From the beginning of its political importance London acts constantly as the purse, sometimes as the brain, never perhaps in its whole history as the heart, of England. The victory of the communa is no guarantee of freedom or fair treatment to the poorer citizens; we no sooner find it in supreme authority than the riot of William Fitz-Osbert occurs to prove that an oligarchy of the purse has as little of tender mercy as an oligarchy of the sword. The real importance of London in this region of history is rather that it affords an example of local independence and close organisation which serves as a model and standard for other towns, than that it leads the way to the attainment of general liberties or peculiarly English objects. Still its position and the action of its citizens give it no small political power, and no insignificant place in history.

166. The action of the clergy in the great struggles of the period has been already noted, in its proper proportion to the general detail. They by their vindication of their own liberties showed the nation that other liberties might be vindicated as well, and that there are bounds to the power and violence of princes. They had fought the battle of the people in fighting their own. From them too, as subjects and not merely as churchmen, the first movements towards national action had come. They had bound up the wounds of the perishing State at the accession of Henry II; they had furnished the first if not the only champions of freedom in the royal councils, where S. Thomas, S. Hugh, and Archbishop Geoffrey had had courage to speak where the barons were silent. They had, on the other side, not, it may be fairly allowed, without neglecting their spiritual work, laboured hard to reduce the business of government to something like the order which the great ecclesiastical organisation of the West impressed on every branch of its administration. What the Church had borrowed from the Empire in this respect it repaid with tenfold interest to the rising State system of Europe. And this was especially the case in England. We have seen that the Anglo-Saxon Church made possible and opened the way to national unity: it was the common Church which combined Norman and Englishman

A mercantile oligarchy.

Importance of the clergy.

Their independence.

Their sense of unity.

in one service, when law and language, land tenure and political influence, would have made them two races of lords and slaves. Their systematic routine. It was the action of Lanfranc and Anselm that formed the strongest link between the witenagemot of the Confessor and the court and council of the Conqueror and his sons. It was the hard and systematic work of Roger of Salisbury that gave order to the Exchequer and the Curia. The work of Becket as Chancellor is thrown into the shade by his later history, but he certainly was Henry's right hand in the initial reforms of the reign, and the men who carried out those reforms in a direction contrary to the policy which Becket as archbishop adopted, were men who trod in the footsteps of his earlier life. Hubert Walter, the administrator of Henry's system, who under Richard and John had completed the fabric of strong government by means of law, and Stephen Langton, who deserves more than any other person the credit of undoing the mischiefs that arose from that system, maintaining the law by making the national will the basis of the strength of government, were both representative men of the English Church. Evil of secular employment, No doubt there were evils in the secular employments of these great prelates: but if for a time the spiritual work of the Church was neglected, and unspiritual aims fostered within her pale, the State gained immensely by compensated by usefulness. being administered by statesmen whose first ideas of order were based on conscience and law rather than on brute force. Nor was the spiritual part of the work unprovided for. Three archbishops of Canterbury, Anselm, Ralph, and William, all of them belonging to the religious rather than the secular type, had sanctioned the employment of Bishop Roger as justiciar; and without the consent of the Pope, it is said, he refused to bear the title¹. Innocent III, when he insisted that Hubert Walter should resign the like office, showed that the growing sense of the age forbade what so great a saint as Anselm had connived at; but that growing sense had been educated in great measure by the system which it was soon to discard.

It is however in the details of mechanical work that these remarks help to illustrate the subject of this chapter. The

¹ W. Malmesb. G. R. v. § 408; R. Diceto, c. 606.

Bearing of clerical influence on method :

systematic order of the growing polity was not a little indebted to the fact that there existed in the Church system a set of models of work. The Church had its ranks and degrees, codes of laws and rules of process, its councils and courts, its central and provincial jurisdictions, its peculiar forms of trial and arbitration, its system of writ and record. In a crisis in which representation and election were growing into importance, and in which all forms were manipulated by clerical administrators, the newer forms must needs be moulded in some degree on the older. The legislation of the period, the assizes and constitutions, bear, in common with the Karolingian capitularies, a strong resemblance to ecclesiastical canons, a form which was universal and vigorous when the capitulary was forgotten. The local and territorial divisions of the dioceses made indelible the civil boundaries which feudal aggression would have gladly obliterated. The archdeaconries, deaneries, and parishes preserved the local unities in which they had themselves originated, and the exempt jurisdictions of the convents were in their nature an exact parallel with the franchises of the feudal lords, and in the case of great ecclesiastical establishments, possessed both characters. The assemblies of the clergy kept up forms that were easily transferred to the local moots: the bishop's visitation was a parallel to that of the sheriff; the metropolitanical visitation to that of the Curia or Exchequer; spiritual excommunication was parallel with civil outlawry; clerical procurations with royal purveyance and the payments to the sheriff for his aid; the share of the clergy in determining their assessments suggested the like action on the part of the lay communities, or at least familiarised men with a system of the kind.

on legislation ;

local organisation :

legal practice ;

on representation.

In no particular is this more apparent than in the very important question of election and representation. In the latter point we shall be able to trace, as we proceed, very close analogies: the fact that the early representative members in the national council were frequently, if not always, invested with the character of procurators or proxies, bearing letters of credence or ratification that empowered them to act on behalf of their constituents, suggests at once that the custom was borrowed from the ecclesiastical practice of which such procuratorial representation was a familiar part, in negotiation with the Holy See, and in the formation of Church councils at home. The appearance of the proctors of the cathedral and diocesan clergy in the central assemblies of Church and State precedes by a few years the regular incorporation of the knights of the shire in parliament; and Convocation as well as the House of Commons owes its representative character to the great period of definition, the reign of Edward I. In the case of election the connection is perhaps less close: but there can be little doubt that the struggles for ecclesiastical freedom of election kept in use forms which made the extension of elective liberty possible in other quarters. The Church recognised three modes of election: the 'via compromissi,' by which the electors deputed to a small committee of their body—an uneven number, three or five—the function of choosing the bishop or abbot; the 'via scrutini,' in which the several votes were taken in order and the choice determined by the majority; and the 'via inspirationis Spiritus Sancti,' in which at one moment, and in one breath, the whole body uttered the name of the same person, just as in the court of justice the compurgators took their oath. The last-mentioned method in its exact form was of course inapplicable to the cases of popular election; but the acclamations of the crowd of suitors at the county court represents a similar idea; the show of hands corresponds with the 'via scrutini'; and the 'via compromissi' has its parallel doubtless in the gradual reservation of the choice of members, both in town and shire, to a small deputed body¹. who in the former case finally engrossed the right of election.

Clerical use of representation and election.

Modes of clerical election.

Analogy of lay elections.

The common arrangement of the early medieval courts, by which the king's chapel was made the depository of writs and records, and his clerks or chaplains the framers and writers of such documents, illustrates another side of the same general truth. The ecclesiastical system of writ, summons, and record

System of record.

¹ It is not perhaps too much to say that the election of the sworn knights to nominate the recognitors of the Great Assize was a distinct parallel with elections made 'via compromissi.' The deputies of the convent at Canterbury who carried full powers to the Curia Regis or to Rome were compromissarii, proctors in fact of that church.

Records and Registers.

was probably, in England, derived from the extensive documentary machinery of the Church of Rome, which in its turn was derived from the similar practice of the later Empire¹. The writs of the Norman Curia may not improbably have been drawn by continuous practice from the formulæ of the imperial system of the Franks, great stores of which are to be found in the collections of Marculf and other jurists². The growth of the system is accordingly complex, the written forms of procedure, both lay and clerical, being developed side by side, or in constant entanglement with one another, as might well be the case when they were drawn up by the same writer. It is however interesting to observe that the custom of registering the acts of court, and retaining copies of all letters issued by the king, seems to have been introduced either late in the reign of Henry II or under Richard and John, under whom, as has been already mentioned, the great series of national records begin. William Longchamp, the chancellor and justiciar of Richard, who with all his great faults must have also had a great capacity for business, and who, as we learn from the Red Book of the Exchequer³, took pains to make himself familiar with its details, must have authorised, perhaps suggested, the enrolment of the acts of the Curia: it was carried out under his vice-chancellor and successor Bishop Eustace. The enrolment of charters and of letters patent and close begins in the chancellorship of Hubert Walter, and is carried out by Walter de Grey, afterwards archbishop of York, who has left in the register of his archiepiscopal acts one of the earliest existing records of the kind. The Lincoln registers begin with the acts of Bishop Hugh of Wells, who had been a deputy of the chancellor from 1200 to 1209⁴.

Increase after the accession of John.

Episcopal registers.

¹ On the registration of papal letters see the preface to Jaffé's Regesta Pontificum, and also to his Monumenta Gregoriana. Gregory VII, in a letter to Hubert of Terouanne, mentions his own register. The practice existed at Rome from the days of Gregory I or earlier; the most ancient remains however are those of the registers of Gregory I, John VIII, and Gregory VII. The series from Innocent III to Pius V is complete.

² Illustrations of this will be found in Brummer, as quoted above, p. 391.

³ Quoted above, p. 431, note 4.

⁴ Of course there may have been episcopal registers, as there may have been royal records, earlier, but there is no evidence that such existed. The York and Lincoln registers are the most ancient: those of Canterbury

If the episcopal registers were drawn up in imitation of the royal rolls, the latter owed both idea and form to the papal registry, the influence of which was under Innocent III supreme in Europe, and which could trace its method through the 'regesta' of Gregory VII and the earlier popes, to the practice of the ancient republic. In such matters it would not be fair to say that Church and State borrowed from each other; each had a vitality and a development of its own, but each gained strength, versatility, and definiteness from their close union; and that close union was made closer still whilst the business of the two was conducted by the same administrators.

Papal Registers.

167. We have now, however imperfectly, traced the process of events by which the English nation had reached that point of conscious unity and identity which made it necessary for it to act as a self-governing and political body, a self-reliant and self-sustained nation,—a power in Europe, basing its claims for respect not on the accidental position or foreign acquisitions of its kings, but on its own internal strength and cohesion, its growth in good government, and its capacity for a share in the common polity of Christendom. We have also tried to trace the process by which its internal organisation had been so framed, modified, and strengthened, that when the occasion came it was able to answer to the strain: by which, when the need of representative institutions made itself felt, the mere concentration and adaptation of existing machinery supplied all that was required. The century that follows Magna Carta was an age of growth, of luxuriant, even premature, development, the end of which was to strengthen and likewise to define the several constituent parts of the organic whole. The three estates made their way, through this time of training, to a realisation of their distinct identity, and gained such a consciousness of their

Summary of the steps of national growth and organisation.

begin in 1278; Winchester in 1282; Exeter in 1257; Hereford in 1275; Worcester in 1268; Salisbury in 1297; Lichfield in 1296; Norwich in 1299; Carlisle in 1292; the other sees have records beginning early in the next century. The collection of letters, such as those of Lanfranc, Anselm and Becket, seems to have been a literary work and not a registration, although in many points it answers the same purpose.

Summary of the points of national
growth.

distinct spheres of work as enabled them to act without entanglement of machinery or waste of power. The constitution which reached its formal and definite maturity under Edward I had to learn easy and economic working under his successors. In that lesson it had also severe experiences of struggle, defect, and failure: its representative men lose the grace and simplicity of the earlier times; personal and territorial aims waste the energies of the better and wiser, and divide into permanent factions the ignorant and more selfish. Yet the continuity of life, and the continuity of national purpose, never fails: even the great struggle of all, the long labour that extends from the Reformation to the Revolution, leaves the organisation, the origin of which we have been tracing, unbroken in its conscious identity, stronger in the strength in which it has persevered and grown mightier through trial. The further investigation of this history in its political as well as in its mechanical aspect must begin from Magna Carta, as a new starting-point.

JN 118

S78

1875

v. 1

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

AA 001 141 701 1

UNIVERSITY OF CA, RIVERSIDE LIBRARY

3 1210 01260 2858

